Mr. COLES did not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of the bill referred to by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who seemed to be of opinion that it would not occupy the time of the House. He (Mr. C.) was of a very different opinion. He considered the bill by no means simple in its provisions, but very intricate indeed, and which must necessarily create discussion. As for the communications from the Secretary of War, he did not consider the information transmitted of that importance which required immediate action, especially when it was considered that so many other subjects were demanding our attention. He hoped the House would not consent at pesent to go into committee on that bill.

Mr. PROFFIT having called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules, they were ordered, and were—yeas 110, nays 94. So the rules were not suspended, there not being two-thirds.

Mr. W. THOMPSON inquired of the CHAIR whether it would be in order to suspend the rules for this day only; if so, he made that motion.

Mr. ATHERTON suggested to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] that, if he would permit the business to take its regular order, his object could be accomplished much sooner. This was resolution day; and, if he would permit resolutions to be received, that which he gave notice, on Saturday, he would offer this day, for the repeal of the rule, could be adopted in a very few minutes, and it would then require but a majority to go into committee on the Florida bill, instead of two-thirds. But if this resolution was not passed to-day, to give it into the power of the members of the House to take up whatever bill it pleased, it would not again be in order for two weeks to offer it, without a suspension of the rules, which would require a vote of two-thirds. Therefore, those who are in fact in favor of passing upon the Florida bill immediately, and without delay, would accomplish that object by voting against suspending rules at that time, for the purpose of passing the resolution indicated by him, so as to put it in the power of a majority of the House to take up the bill at any time. He hoped the House would not suspend the rules till the resolution was adopted.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to suspend the rules for this day; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered and were—yeas 116, nays 85.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. HUNT said whatever might be the views of gentlemen as to the policy of the managment of war, there could be but one view as to the sufferings of the people of Florida. He therefore moved to suspend the rules for two hours.

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. PETRIKIN submitted whether it was in order to make this motion to suspend the rules for two hours, the House having refused twice to suspend for any time, on the principle that the major absorbed the minor proposition. These motions were evidently made to waste the time of the House, and to prevent action on the resolution of Mr. ATHERTON, which proposed to place it in the power of a majority of the House to take up this bill, or any other bill they may wish. This sudden sympathy by the Whig party for the suffering people of Florida was as unusual as it was unnatural to them; and it was merely feigned for the occasion, to defeat the resolution above indicated, which, if it were passed, would place the business of the nation in the hands of a majority of the Representatives of the people, and thus take it out of the hands of this factious minority, who are now trying to defeat the resolution by the power they have under the rules—the power which it is proposed by the resolution to be repealed to-day. If the rules were to be suspended for two hours, or for the whole day, they would get up a debate on the bill and stave it off, for the purpose of defeating other legislation. The people understand this stratagem of that party, and he hoped that the proposition to suspend the rules would be voted down, as it ought to be, by those who are sincerely sympathizing with the suffering people of Florida, and who are anxious now, as they have been anxious at other sessions, as well as at the early part of this session, to pass measures to alleviate their sufferings; but the majority of the House are powerless, and will remain so until the resolution to alter the rules, which is proposed to be offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] to-day, shall be passed.

The CHAIR decided that the motion to suspend the rules for a given time was in order.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the motion to suspend the rules, were—yeas 101, nays 98.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. TRIPLETT, in accordance with notice previously given, moved to suspend the rules to enable him to report the bill amendatory of the act granting pre-emption rights to the settlers on the public lands; which was passed by the House a few days ago.

Mr. ATHERTON inquired of the CHAIR whether it would not be in order for the gentleman to report the bill when his State was called, without any suspension of rules.

The CHAIR replied that it would.

Mr. TRIPLETT demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 72, nays 121.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. CUSHING, after some preliminary remarks, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which, on Saturday last, the House decided that the report of Mr. HILLEN, from the Committee on Commerce, in relation to the pilot law, should be received as the report of the majority thereof.

Mr. C. explained that, when he voted, on Saturday, he considered he was voting on the point of order, and not on the merits of the bill. If that vote was to be considered as deciding the merits of the bill, he should wish to change his vote; as, although he agreed with the point of order, he was against the bill. With the exception of some three or four gentlemen, he was surprised to see that the vote on Saturday was a pure party question. How that was, he did not pretend to say; but he moved to reconsider the vote, with a view of giving gentlemen an opportunity of again examining the matter. Mr. C. at some length, adverted to the extreme inconvenience of many of the rules in Jefferson's Manual, which had been adopted by the House.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. GRINNELL moved a call of the House, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 26, nays 128.

So the call was not ordered.

Mr. PROFFIT moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 70, nays 120.

So the House refused to lay it on the table.

The question then recurred on the second to the previous question.

Mr. PROFFIT having demanded tellers to ascertain that fact; and Messrs. CHAPMAN of Alabama and W. C. JOHNSON having been appointed such, reported that there were ayes 112, noes 51.

So the previous question having received a second—and the question, on ordering the main question, being next in order,

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays which having been ordered, were—yeas 118, nays 63.

So the House having determined that the main question should be then put—which main question was, Shall the vote on the reception of the report be reconsidered?

Mr. PROFFIT called for the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 84, nays 108.

So the House refused to reconsider the vote—Mr. CUSHING, who made the motion to reconsider, having voted against it.

The House took its usual recess at half past two o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

Mr. SMITH of Maine rose to ask if resolutions were then in order from the State of Maine.

The SPEAKER answered in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH. Then I wish to offer the following resolution, which I desire may be read by the Clerk.

Mr. STANLY moved to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH. I have the floor, and do not yield it for the motion to adjourn.

Mr. STANLY insisted on having his motion to adjourn put.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to adjourn could not be entertained, inasmuch as the gentleman from North Carolina had no right to the floor to make the motion, the floor being in the possession of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. SMITH said he was certainly entitled to the floor, and so long as he kept it, no gentleman could make any motion. He had risen in the first place and asked the SPEAKER if resolutions were in order from Maine. The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative. That being the case, he now offered the resolution he held in his hand, and on it he moved the previous question.

Mr. PROFFIT rose to a point of order. The gentleman from Maine could not offer a resolution, and move the previous question upon it before the resolution was read.

Mr. EVANS said he wished also to state a question of order.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to more than one question of order being entertained at a time.

The SPEAKER said that the point of order of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] could not be entertained until after the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana should have been disposed of.

After some remarks from Mr. BELL in relation to the rules for governing such proceedings,

Mr. EVANS persisted in urging his objection, which was, that the rule required the SPEAKER to call for resolutions, whereas the gentleman [Mr. SMITH] had offered the resolution without such call.

The SPEAKER again reminded Mr. EVANS that but one question of order could be raised at a time.

In relation to the point of order raised by Mr. PROFFIT, after some further debate,

The SPEAKER decided that it had been his first impression that the spirit of the 23d rule required a resolution to lay over, if any member intimated a wish to debate it, although the previous question had been called. But in compliance with numerous suggestions from members in the House, the practice had been changed, and it was decided on the Monday before, on the Cumberland road memorial, that if the previous question were called and seconded, the memorial would not lie over, although a member expressed the wish to debate the motion to commit with instructions, because the previous question would cut off such debate, should the main question be ordered.

From this decision, Mr. PROFFIT took an appeal, which appeal the SPEAKER decided was not then in order.

Mr. SMITH explained that the resolution he offered was the resolution of which notice had been given on Saturday by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON.] Mr. S. contended that although the notice had been given by a member from another State, yet he, with the permission of that member, had a right to submit the resolution.

Mr. ATHERTON here stated that he had given his consent.

The SPEAKER decided that the gentleman from Maine had no right to offer a resolution, notice of which had been given by a member from another State.

From this decision Mr. SMITH took an appeal, and on that appeal moved the previous question; which being seconded, the main question was ordered, and being put, the decision of the CHAIR was not sustained—yeas 89, nays 92.

The SPEAKER was about to divide the House to ascertain whether the previous question was demanded, when

Mr. BELL submitted the following as a question of order:

"The gentleman from Maine offered a resolution, and, before it was read or stated from the chair, moved the previous question. The point of order was, that it was not in order to move the previous question on a resolution before it was read or stated from the chair."

The SPEAKER stated that it was in conformity with the former decision and practice of the House, to move the previous question when the resolution was moved, for the reason that the member who offered the resolution was entitled to the floor upon it before any other could obtain it; and therefore it saved time, without violating the right of any other member, to enable him to offer the resolution, and call the previous question at the same instant, without going through the form of announcing the proposition before the floor was given him to demand the previous question upon it.

From this decision Mr. BELL took an appeal.

The question being on the appeal of Mr. BELL,

Mr. CLARK moved a call of the House.

On that motion Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 48, nays 139.

So the call was not ordered.

The question was then taken on the appeal, and being put as follows: "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand?" it passed in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 85.

YEAS—Messrs. Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Wagener, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—85.

Mr. BELL then demanded that the question, "Will the House now consider the resolution," be put, and stated that he desired to debate the resolution. He also demanded that under the 22d rule, which provides that "all resolutions that give rise to debate, shall lie over for discussion," &c. the resolution should lie over.

The SPEAKER decided that the call of the previous question did not deprive any other member of the right to raise the question of consideration. This could not be demanded according to rule, until the proposition was announced, and the mover of the proposition might defeat this indispensable right of another member by calling the previous question, if that is to be construed as cutting off the demand for the consideration. So far as the previous question precluded debate upon the resolution itself, it was no violation of the rights of any other member to permit the mover to call the previous question, because, under any view of the case, he would be entitled to the floor to make this demand, before another could get it to debate the main question. And here, too, he was sustained by a previous decision of his predecessor: "At the third session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, Mr. GRANT of New York moved a resolution, and demanded the previous question, when objection to the consideration of the said resolution being made, it was laid on the table, under the rule."—House Journal, page 398.

This resolution would, therefore, lie over.

Mr. SMITH appealed from that decision, and on that appeal moved the previous question.

Here much confusion arose, from many members attempting to speak at once; and it was some moments before order could be restored.

The SPEAKER said the appeal was not debatable.

Mr. PROFFIT asked whether, in case the resolution should be entertained, and debate arose, it would not necessarily lie over. He gave notice that he objected to it

The SPEAKER said it would be quite time enough, when the question on the appeal should have been decided.

Mr. BANKS desired the CLERK to read the rule which related to notice of resolutions; which was read accordingly.

Mr. SMITH repeated his call for the previous question on the appeal, which was seconded, and the main question being ordered, the question "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand?" was decided in the negative—yeas 94, nays 115.

The previous question moved by Mr. SMITH, when he submitted the resolution, was then seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put—yeas 119, nays 83, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, A. G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H.Butler, William O. The main question on the adoption of the resolution was then put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 119, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. H. J. Anderson, John W. Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Anson Brown, Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Jas. Cooper, Crabb, Crockett, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Fillmore, James Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Wagener, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Jos. L. Williams, and C. H. Williams—87.

So the resolution was adopted as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the one hundred and twenty-seventh rule of the House, as is in the following words: "nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present," be, and hereby is so far rescinded and changed, that the House may, at any time, by a vote of the majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders of the House, for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. PROFFIT then claimed the floor for the purpose of moving a reconsideration of the vote which had just been taken.

Some altercation here ensued between Messrs. PROFFIT and SMITH as to their right of the floor, which resulted in the SPEAKER awarding it to Mr. PROFFIT.

Mr. SMITH appealed from this decision.

Mr. OGLE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. WELLER called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which having been ordered, were—yeas 85, nays 117.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH of Maine said, for the purpose of saving the time of the House, he would withdraw the appeal.

Mr. PETRIKIN here rose from his seat and said he would aver that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] was not in his seat when the result of the vote was announced by the CHAIR. He was standing up many minutes before he asked the floor. Therefore, according to the rule, he was not entitled to the floor; but Mr. P. concluded that he was entitled to the floor, having risen from his place.

The CHAIR said he had recognised the gentleman from Indiana; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PETRIKIN] could not be entitled to the floor, unless he took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, and the House reversed the decision.

Mr. PETRIKIN did not press his right to the floor.

Mr. PROFFIT said he wished to debate the motion to reconsider; and was about to proceed, when

Mr. BELL objected to his proceeding at that time, and founded his objection on the 22d rule, which rule prescribes that, on resolution day, such resolutions as excite debate must lie over.

The CHAIR said the question of reconsideration was a privileged question, and takes precedence over all other rules: therefore, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] could proceed in his remarks.

Mr. PROFFIT then spoke at some length of the tyranny of subjecting a minority to be governed by a rule which gives it into the power of a majority to pass to any matter of legislation they pleased. He argued that it was unconstitutional in principle, and that it would deprive the minority of that protection which the Constitution had peculiarly guarantied to it, and which had scrupulously been provided for.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he was willing the gentleman from Indiana should have all the benefit he could derive from his extraordinary speech. He would not dispute such laurels with him. All he had to say was, that it was evident no good could arise from prolonging debate in the present excited state of the House. It would be obvious that the sooner the debate was ended the better. He would, therefore, conclude by moving the previous question; which received a second, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. PROFFIT called for the yeas and nays on the main question, which was, "Shall the vote on the adoption of the resolution be reconsidered?"

The yeas and nays having been ordered, were—yeas 89, nays 116.

So the House refused to reconsider.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved that the House adjourn, but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. CUSHING, who asked the general consent of the House to have the joint resolution of the Senate relating to the Imaun of Muscat, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; but

Mr. STANLY objected to the reference; and then, on his motion,

The House, at 8 o'clock, p. m. adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 2, 1840.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut presented the credentials of the Honorable JABEZ W. HUNTINGTON, elected by the Legislature of Connecticut, a Senator of that State for the unexpired portion of the term of six years, commencing on the fourth of March, 1839.

Mr. HUNTINGTON appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Gen. Duncan L. Clinch, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. CLAY presented the memorial of James C. Reynolds, late postmaster at Reynoldsburg, Ohio, stating that he was removed without cause, and asking Congressional action thereon; and after a debate in which Messrs. CLAY of Kentucky, ALLEN, and CRITTENDEN participated, its further consideration was postponed until to-morrow.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The question being on the motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, to strike out all relating to banks and corporations—

Mr. CALHOUN addressed the Senate at length, and in a very forcible argument advocated the motion, and declared his opposition also to the remaining portions of the bill—the voluntary part—as being, in fact, an insolvent law, which Congress had no constitutional power to pass; and the compulsory part as inexpedient, because of the destructive effect on the debtor portion of the community in the present disordered state of the currency.

The question then being taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, it was agreed to—ayes 28, noes 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentcky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Huntington, Henderson, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, and Webster—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Grundy, Hubbard, Pierce, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—16.

Mr. CRITTENDEN now moved to refer the bill to a select committee.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke briefly in favor of this motion, in order that the compulsory clause might be modified before the final vote upon it.

Mr. GRUNDY and Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, spoke in favor of first taking the question on the admission of the principle of compulsion at all into the bill; and after some further remarks, Mr. CLAY of Kentucky moved to strike out the 18th section, being the compulsory clause.

Mr. WRIGHT intimating a wish to make some remarks on the subject before the vote was taken,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, June 2, 1840.

Messrs. BELL and DAVIES of Pennsylvania made some remarks in reference to amending the journal; and the latter made a motion to change the phraseology of a part of the record; which was disagreed to by the House.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina rose for the purpose of asking the general consent of the House to submit a motion, that the House would then resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the bill for raising sixteen hundred troops for the protection of Florida. He was satisfied that the discussion on the bill would not take up more than this day.

Mr. GRAVES hoped the House would not consent to the motion; and after some suggestions,

Mr. THOMPSON said he would not press the motion until after the expiration of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER announced that the first business in order during the morning hour was the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] to recommit to the Committee on Commerce the bill reported from the committee by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HILLEN,] to repeal the law regulating pilots.

Mr. CURTIS, who was entitled to the floor, assumed that the motion to recommit opened for discussion the whole merits of the question. He desired to discuss the question in that way; and as he believed that it would be debated during the morning hour for two days, and as many of the standing committees were anxious to report, he would suggest that the further consideration of the subject be laid over till to-morrow morning, for the purpose of receiving reports of committees; to which suggestion the House yielded.

Mr. GRAVES inquired of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. CURTIS] when a bill would be reported (in pursuance of the recommendations made by the President and Secretary of War) making appropriations to pay for sites selected by the board appointed for that purpose, for the building of Marine Hospitals in the West.

Mr. CURTIS entered into some explanations in regard to the condition of this question before the committee, and from which it appeared that the delay in the action of the committee arose from the conflicting claims of Wheeling and Pittsburg, and the conflicting reports in relation thereto. [The act of 1837 authorized the purchase of seven sites; six of them were accordingly selected; and the difficulty is, as to the seventh, whether Wheeling or Pittsburg shall be fixed upon.]

Mr. GRAVES urged the propriety of reporting a bill as to the six selected sites, leaving the disputed one to be acted on hereafter.

Mr. MORGAN of New York spoke of the injustice done to one of his constituents, who had made a contract with the Government for the sale of land in Pittsburg for the site of one of these hospitals, but who was kept out of his money.

Mr. BIDDLE rose; but

The SPEAKER remarked that there was no question before the House, and discussion was irregular.

Mr. BIDDLE moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to say a word on the subject; which being accorded by a vote of two-thirds, he declared it was not his purpose to enter upon any contest as to the comparative claims of Pittsburg and Wheeling; to do so in the House now, could lead to no useful purpose, and would only tend to shift responsibility from the proper quarter. The act of 1837 had rendered it the duty of the President to make the selection. Mr. B. was unwilling the committee should be goaded into premature action. A communication from the Executive, he had reason to believe, would be made to the committee. He entertained a deep conviction that there had been great and inexcusable delay in the Executive action. The course which the Executive had now tardily taken, at the close of the session, even supposing it at all necessary to a just decision, might have been taken, and ought to have been taken, six months ago—yes, long before the present session commenced, when the report of the second Board of Surgeons reached the President. But he would not draw the subject from where the responsibility properly lay. The West would hold the President ultimately to a strict account.

Mr. STEENROD said he must ask the indulgence of the House to enable him to make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] on this subject. It was true, he said, that another board of commissioners had been ordered by the proper authority to ascertain which of these two points, Pittsburg or Wheeling, was the proper and appropriate place for the Marine Hospital. And it is true that the appropriation must be suspended for these improvements, until the further action and return of this board. But with what propriety or justice could the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] charge this consequent delay on the President? How, said he, could any censure or improper imputation be justly cast on the President? The law of 1837 imposed on the President the selecting of the respective sites for the hospitals ordered to be established on the Western waters by the law. In pursuance of this law, they authorized a board to be appointed by the President, which board selected and contracted for the site at Wheeling: so far the President was not unmindful of his duty, nor was he tardy in discharging it. But what was the course of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] or those whom he so ably represents. This decision of the board was then challenged, the President was remonstrated with, and his authority invited to interpose, and to give the constituents of the honorable gentlemen another hearing, that their claims might again be presented for consideration. They petitioned that another board might be appointed. This was granted. For this delay—for this concession to meet the request of the gentleman, or petition of his constituents, of course he will not complain, or censure the President. It must then be the cause of the recent delay. The other board of commissioners, appointed on the remonstrance of the gentleman, (Mr. BIDDLE) or his constituents, selected and recommended Pittsburg as the proper and appropriate place. Mr. S. said that it was then rendered his duty to interpose and petition the President, and present to his consideration such reasons as, in justice to those he represented, might induce him to appoint another board, whose decision should be final on the subject. If, then, there has been unusual delay in concluding this matter, the blame must rest on others, but certainly not on the President.

The SPEAKER called the committees for reports; when

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back to the House, with an amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to refund to Noah Miller and others a part of the proceeds of the sale of the British sloop Mary and cargo, which were captured by them, and libelled by them for the benefit of the United States; which bill and amendment were ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations for the erection of a custom-house in the city of Richmond, in the State of Virginia; which was read twice, and,

On motion of Mr. BANKS, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the bill ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS also reported from the same committee a bill to establish a port of entry at St. Joseph's, in the State of Florida; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HABERSHAM, from the same committee, reported a bill making appropriations for the completion of the marine hospital at Mobile, and furnishing the same; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS, from the same committee, reported a bill for the protection of the commerce on Lake Michigan; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. BURKE, from the same committee, reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of Jacob Parnell and others, owners of the Eliza of Brunswick; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. CRARY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same, passed 18th April, 1836.

Mr. C. moved that the bill be read the third time, and be put upon its engrossment.

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved the commitment of the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CROCKETT hoped that this bill would not be permitted to be referred to the Committee of the Whole; but that it would be read the third time, as proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, and put upon its passage. The bill had been before Congress for twelve years, and had been frequently reported upon favorably. It had received the sanction of the three or four standing committees of the Senate, and three committees of the House of Representatives. He hoped if it was the desire of any gentleman to examine the bill, that they would permit it to lie on the SPEAKER'S table, and take occasion to examine it there; but if there was no objection, he would be glad if the bill would be put upon its passage, and to effect that object, and if in order, he would move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] for the third reading of the bill.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS objected to such a course. It was a very important bill, and hoped that it would be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON made some remarks explanatory of the principles of the bill, and urged its immediate passage.

[The motion for the previous question operating on the motion to commit, and not on its passage of the bill, it was not pressed.]

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON urged the propriety of committing the bill. He regarded the bill as the first step towards the surrender of the whole public domain. It was a bill of the utmost importance, and should have full investigation. It was a measure involving a question of revenue, and the rights of all the States. He believed there was something wrong in the bill, otherwise the friends of it would not wish to press it through in such a hurried manner.

Mr. CRARY considered the motion of reference as tantamount to a motion for rejection. It was evident that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had very much abused its privileges. We had already spent a month of the session in the discussion of one bill in that committee. It was a place where debate was almost interminable. It took from the majority all their power and gave it into the hands of a few individuals. If this bill went to that committee, it would not be considered this session. We had bills enough there already to occupy our time till August, and we had yet other bills to refer, that should receive consideration. By referring the bill before us, the whole question of the public lands will come under discussion. We shall have speeches on the right of pre-emption, on the subject of graduation and distribution, and all these on a bill that does not involve the principles of either of those great measures.

This bill proposes to do for the State of Tennessee what should have been done long ago. In that State we have had public lands for near fifty years, but we had never surveyed them, had never sold an acre of them, and we never would. Such was their situation that it was no object to survey them. This bill proposed giving the control of them to the State on certain conditions, too onerous to the State, it was true, but such as she was willing to accept. He would have willingly given conditions more favorable, but he had yielded to the wishes of others, in the hopes that the present bill would meet with approval from all sides of the House.

He repudiated the insinuation of the gentleman than from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON.] He did not wish to take any advantage of those who were opposed to the bill. He only desired action, and action was the duty of the House. The new States have nothing to gain by voting for this measure. Their interests were to be promoted by keeping the State of Tennessee in her present vassalage, until they were able to effect a cession of the lands of the Government within their own borders. The passage of this bill will soon place Tennessee at the side of the old States. Reject it, and her interests and feelings must remain with the new. He should vote for the bill, not from any motives of policy which governed his views in regard to the public lands, but because its passage was due to a sovereign State of this Union.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky spoke of the political organization of the Committee on the Public Lands. It stood four and four when this question was before it; but the bill had received the unanimous sanction of that committee. The bill was not intended as an inroad on the public domain, as was stated by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] Mr. W. spoke of his scrupulous regard for the protection of the public domain. He had always opposed any inroad upon it; and referred to his past course in proof of that fact. He said that this bill was a measure of protection; a measure to preserve that domain; and he believed if the character of it was understood by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and if he was to take a statesman-like view of the subject, he would vote for the bill. He adverted to the great injustice which had been done the State of Tennessee by the course which the National Government had practised towards it. Whilst the lands of all the other States and Territories had been surveyed by the United States, and brought into the market, the State of Tennessee had been patiently waiting for more than fifty years, either to have the land surveyed and brought into market, or to relinquish it to her, that she might survey it herself. But that State had been compelled to witness the cream of the land picked out by the State of North Carolina, to locate her military land warrants—picked out not by quarter sections, but by acres. He thought it a measure of great hardship to Tennessee. The Government had never surveyed the land, and it will never dare risk the expense of a survey; this bill should pass as a matter of right and of justice. The lands were worth nothing to the Government, and should be given up to the State of Tennessee. The bill did not involve an expenditure of money, and he hoped it would not be committed.

After a few remarks by Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland, in reply to Mr. WHITE, Mr. CRABB was understood to say that this bill differed very little from the graduation bill. He was not distinctly heard, but was understood to be opposed to this bill.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky said the protection of the public domain was a measure near and dear to his heart. This was a measure of protection. The bill had been already discussed freely at other times, and had cost the Government more than $100,000 by such discussion. He hoped it would not be committed. The morning hour having expired,

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. W. THOMPSON of South Carolina moved to amend that motion, so that the House go into committee on the bill to raise troops for the protection of Florida.

The CHAIR suggested that if the House went into committee, a majority could take it up.

Joint resolution of the Senate, authorizing the President to receive the presents from the Imaum of Muscat and the Emperor of Morocco, having been read twice, was,

On motion of Mr. CUSHING, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Other Senate bills were read twice, and appropriately referred.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, on the bill to raise troops for the protection of Florida.

The CHAIR suggested that if the gentleman made that specific motion, it would take two-thirds.

Mr. THOMPSON then said he would not make it.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and took up the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. LEET, being entitled to the floor, addressed the committee at much length in favor of the bill, and in reply to the several objections urged against it. He contrasted the benefits which would arise from this measure with the injurious effects of the deposite system, and showed that it was impossible to suggest a more safe, convenient, and constitutional mode of keeping the public money. After illustrating and establishing his positions with numerous references to facts, he proceeded to show the fallacy of the charge that the Government was distinct from the people. He contended that such could never be the case. It was against the very nature of things for the people to be separate from the Government. Their interests were inseparable, and always were and would continue the same. He then drew a glowing picture of the fatal consequences which would result in case of a war, if Government had its funds in the hands of the banks.

The bill, he said, should pass, and he ventured to assert that it would pass. It was a plain, simple, and constitutional measure, and would impart into the currency health, by infusing into it more gold and silver. If this was not the best measure to meet the condition of the country, and if it did not meet the approbation of the Opposition, he challenged them to bring forward their plan. What better plan than this have the Opposition; what measure have they to present to the country? Echo answers, where? We have heard them reproach the President for not relieving the country by a proper measure, and they will not suggest that better measure, as one antagonistical to this. The Bank of the United States has been tried—the State deposite banks have been tried—all have failed. The Independent Treasury, then, is the only safe, just, and constitutional measure which the President could recommend. Mr. L. then went into an analysis of the bill, and commented on its different provisions, showing that it fully accorded with the position he assumed above. The bill prohibited the loaning or using of the public money. It was the loaning and using of the public moneys that created all the ruin of which the Opposition now complain.

Mr. L. also adverted to a variety of other matters in connection with this bill, which remarks will be hereafter given in full, as early as convenient.

Mr. BROCKWAY had just entered upon an argument in opposition to the bill,

When the usual hour having arrived, the House took a recess until 4 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BROCKWAY denounced the bill as calculated to blight the prosperity of the whole country. He was confident it would blast and wither the interests of the New England States. It would bring ruin upon the manufacturer, and reduce the laboring man to starvation. In fact it was impossible to foresee the extent of the disastrous consequences which must result from the adoption of the measure. Mr. B. then examined the bill in detail, and contended, among other matters, that under its operation every deputy postmaster would be a Sub-Treasurer, etc. and contended that the bank deposite system was the safest one, etc.

Mr. EASTMAN said: Mr. Chairman, there is probably not a member of this committee, whose views were not fully known upon the bill now under consideration, previous to his election. In many instances the opinions entertained in regard to the measure, were made the touchstone by which the political faith of gentlemen was tested; and upon those opinions depended their election or rejection by the people. For one, I should have been perfectly willing to have given my vote in favor of the bill, without the least discussion from either side of the House; but, inasmuch as it has been, and from present appearances, is to be, very fully discussed, I desire to state some of the reasons which have operated to form my opinion in regard to it.

That the good faith of the Government must be kept in meeting promptly and satisfactorily all pecuniary demands upon it, cannot be questioned by any one. Our civil officers who are scattered throughout the whole extent of the Union, in all the several States, must be paid for their services. Our army and our navy must be honorably and honestly supported; and all who contract with this Government, and do service for it, in whatever capacity, must be compensated. If this be not the case, of what value is our Government? Sir, it would not stand a day. It would virtually be dissolved. It would resolve itself into its original elements and the security of the whole people over their persons and property would at once be lost.

For the convenience both of the Government and its creditors, it must be obvious that the funds with which payments are to be made, must be in different sections of the Union. In all our States, the judges and officers of the United States Courts, the jurymen that attend those courts, and many of the witnesses also, are to be paid by the Government. For these services, satisfaction must be made where they are rendered. Portions of our army are accommodated, by being paid at one point, and other portions at another. So also with our navy. So with our list of pensioners; with our mail contractors; with those employed upon our public works, and with all, indeed, that do business for the Government.

And, sir, not only is it necessary that the Government should meet, with promptitude and certainty, all demands upon it, but it is right that those demands should be paid in a currency that shall be entirely satisfactory to the creditor. It should be done in a currency that is not only not depreciated, but in one that is incapable of being depreciated.

Now, sir, let us examine this bill, and see how far its provisions are calculated to keep inviolate the public faith, and preserve untarnished the national honor. For, however much gentlemen may differ as to the provisions of the bill, and the effect which it will have, should it become a law, none will deny that one of the very first, if not, indeed, the foremost object of every administration, should be the honest and prompt fulfilment of all its contracts.

What, then, are the objects of the bill? Simply these. They are for the collection of the money that may, from time to time, be due to the Government—for its safekeeping before it shall be paid out after its collection—for its transfer from one point to another, where it may be required to pay the public creditors, and for the payment of those creditors as their demands may fall due upon the Government.

To carry out these objects, the bill provides that four officers shall be appointed, to be denominated receivers general, who shall have offices located at Boston, New York, Charleston and St. Louis; the offices at Boston and New York to be kept in the new custom-houses of those cities; the office at Charleston to be kept in the custom-house of that city, if suitable rooms can be procured—otherwise, a building to be erected; and at St. Louis, a building is to be procured or erected. In all of the offices, sufficient vaults and fire safes are to be used, that the money may be as secure from felons and fire as the wisdom of man can make it. Besides these four gentlemen, two others, who are now officers of the Government, (the Treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia, and the Treasurer of the Branch Mint at New Orleans,) are to perform the duties of receivers general at those respective places, in addition to their present duties.

Let us now see how these four officers are to be appointed. They are to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. They are to be selected from the whole people of this Union, for their weight of character, their standing in society, their thorough and efficient business habits, and, in a word, for their qualifications for such responsible stations. Will it be said here, sir, as has been declared by the gentleman from Connecticut, that mere political partisans will be selected, that qualifications will not be taken into the account, but that he who has worked the hardest and pulled the truest, will receive the nomination to the Senate? Sir, let me tell gentlemen that were I the President of these United States, I would recommend no man to an office of this importance, who had not worked hard and pulled true in the Democratic ranks. Yes, sir; pulled true through the whole of his political life, or else should give such evidences of a true conversion to the Democratic faith, as would leave no fears of his backsliding; and, sir, when I say this, I should have no apprehensions that any one who was not honest, not perfectly upright, not fully qualified for the station, would be recommended by the President. Is it to be supposed that among the hundreds of thousands of Democrats who are scattered throughout the whole extent of this Republic, there cannot be found four, whose honesty, integrity, and capability are sufficiently elevated to make them fit nominees for the station? No one would undertake to entertain a doubt upon the subject. Sir, I have not that horror of party men which some gentlemen profess to have. I see nothing unbecoming the independence of men for those who entertain the same political principles, to concert as to the best measures to carry out those principles. I see nothing improper in their comparing views, and agreeing upon the plans of operation. I can discover nothing censurable in adhering to these plans, and supporting those men for public stations, who will sustain those principles; and, sir, I should view it to be a duty which the President owed, not only to himself, but to his political friends, that he should nominate his own supporters to fill these offices. Besides, sir, what object could a President of these United States have in appointing to such a station a bad and unqualified man? Sir, let a President of this great people be ever so ambitious and corrupt, he would never venture to nominate to the Senate one whom he did not himself fully believe to be both honest and capable; for his own prudence, his love for his own reputation, if nothing else, would deter him from pursuing such a course. And, sir, when we have in the chair of state a man of wisdom and integrity, as I trust and fully believe we now have, we can have no apprehension that one unsuitable, in any particular, would receive a nomination.

But, sir, let it be borne in mind that these officers are not to be appointed by the President. They are to be nominated by him, and, before they can be commissioned, have to pass through the ordeal of the Senate, and be confirmed there. In that body, second to none perhaps in the world, the whole character of the nominees, and their fitness for the stations, can be fully and freely discussed. Nor is it believed that any one, who is incompetent or unfit for the place, would receive a confirmation. In making the selections, then, we have not only the knowledge, experience, and skill of the President, but a full review by the Senate, before a ratification of the nominations.

Let us now examine the guards which this bill throws around the conduct and course of these officers. By the seventh section, it is provided, that they "shall respectively give bonds to the United States, in such form, and for such amounts as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the President, with sureties to the satisfaction of the Solicitor of the Treasury; and shall, from time to time, renew, strengthen, and increase their official bonds, as the Secretary of the Treasury, with consent of the President, may direct." Not only, then, do they have to be confirmed by the Senate, after their selection by the President, but they have to pass through another trial, that of procuring sureties to their large and heavy official bonds, which are required to be signed by men whose responsibility shall be unquestioned. Now, sir, is it to be supposed that they will be able to obtain such satisfactory sureties, unless their honesty and integrity is beyond all suspicion and reproach? What man of responsibility would sign such bonds, unless he believed his principal to possess a character for business and uprightness that could not in any way be impugned? No one, sir; no one.

But the security stops not here. The twelfth section of the bill substantially provides, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to cause an examination to be made at any time into the books, accounts, and all matters and things connected with these officers. And not only has the Secretary of the Treasury this general power, as given by the twelfth section, but the thirteenth section expressly provides, that it shall be the duty of each naval officer and surveyor, of each register of a land office, of the director and superintendent of each mint, that they may act as checks upon their several depositories, at the close of each quarter of the year, and as much more frequently as they shall be directed by the Secretary of Treasury to do so, to examine the books, accounts, returns, and money on hand of their several depositories, and to make a full, accurate, and faithful return to the Treasury Department of their condition.

And here, sir, it might be supposed, by those who believe in the common honesty of man, that the bill might stop—that men who are honored with the confidence of the President—who receive not only his approval, but whose characters and qualifications pass through the close review and strict scrutiny of the Senate; who, after being commissioned, are compelled to call upon their friends to stake their all as guarantees for their fidelity, and who are subjected to a general and special supervision of all their acts, might be trusted, without going further. But such is not the case. In addition to all the previous precautions and guards, the 17th section requires that these officers shall keep an accurate entry of each sum received, of the kind of money in which it is received, and of each payment or transfer, and of the kind of currency in which it is made. And, sir, as if "to make assurance doubly sure," it further provides, "That if any one of the said officers, or of those connected with the Post Office Department, shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use, by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan, with or without interest, any portion of the public moneys entrusted to him for safekeeping, disbursement, transfer, or for any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of the said moneys as shall be thus taken, converted, invested, used, or loaned, which is hereby declared to be felony; and any officer or agent of the United States, and all persons advising or participating in such act, being convicted thereof before any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than five years, and to a fine equal to the amount embezzled."

With these four officers thus appointed, and around whom so many guards and checks are thrown, together with the Treasurers of the Mints at Philadelphia and New Orleans, who are to give similar bonds and be subject to similar scrutiny and penal provisions, are the moneys of the United States to be deposited, instead of the United States and other Banks as heretofore. With them the several collectors and all officers of the Government of every character and description who recive money for the Government and reside in the several districts where these offices are situated, are required to deposite with the receiver general of their respective locations, at least as often as once a week, and as much more frequently as they shall be directed, all moneys which they may collect.

Upon these officers, with the funds in hand, the Secretary of the Treasury can draw his drafts, and every class and grade of the public creditors receive their pay at such points as they may be best accommodated.

With regard to the provisions of this bill, a great mistake has pervaded the public mind. To whom this is to be attributed is, perhaps, not for me to say. I cannot forbear remarking, however, that in many sections of the country the Opposition press, either from ignorance or from some other cause not so excusable, have endeavored to create the impression that the public funds were to be scattered in a manner wholly unprecedented, among an almost innumerable number of officers, unsafe and irresponsible. Even every deputy postmaster has been heralded forth as a Sub-Treasurer.

But, sir, I believe I have shown that this bill creates four new offices, and four only, who are denominated receivers general. I have shown, too, that with these officers, and the two treasurers of the mints at Philadelphia and New Orleans, are to be deposited, forthwith, all the moneys of the Government collected in their respective locations. This, with the exception of receipts by deputy postmasters, will embrace almost the entire amount of the collections of the Government.

I wish now, sir, to examine the arrangements of the Post Office Department, as they will be under the provisions of this bill, and compare them with the former practice, that we may see how its funds are to be managed, and with how much truth these allegations are made against this Department. There are, I believe, some thirteen thousand deputy postmasters in the United States at the present time. Of these about eleven thousand will pay over immediately, as they now do, on each quarter day, the amount in their hands, to the contractors on the routes where the post offices are established—the contractors having an order to that effect. The others, being the larger offices, and situated in the neighborhood of the receivers general, are to deposite with them; the moneys to be kept in a separate account from the other money of the Government, and to be used by the Postmaster General where they shall be needed. So that, by the operations of this bill, the money is to be taken from the hands of the deputy postmasters, immediately upon its collection. If one dollar is appropriated by them to their own use, we have seen that, by the provisions of the 17th section, they thereby subject themselves to fine and imprisonment. Now, sir, how has it been under former arrangements? Almost the entire amount was deposited in banks, scattered throughout the country, and the balance paid by drafts in favor of contractors. The Metropolis Bank, situated in this city, collected of the other banks the sums deposited with them, and paid many of the contractors here. Under such an arrangement, deputy postmasters, situated in remote places, in many instances retained the funds in their hands for weeks. The gentleman from Connecticut states that many of these became defaulters. This I do not deny. But, sir, I contend that the provisions of this bill will be effectual to prevent such delinquencies for the future. The banks, too, could retain them, enjoying the benefits not only of the deposites, but of paying out their own bills to contractors; the Government, in the mean time, having no adequate security therefor. With how much truth, then, can it be alleged that deputy postmasters, by the provisions of this bill, are to have any more control over the moneys that pass through their hands than heretofore, when, in fact, they do not have so much, and are guarded by much more strict provisions of law?

Let us now look, for a moment, to the situation of the public moneys when deposited in the United States Bank. During the time of the deposite of the moneys of the Government in that institution, all the revenues of the country, whether collected upon imports of goods, or from the sales of the public lands, or from whatever source, were deposited there. These moneys, amounting to hundreds of millions, during the series of years that they were deposited in that institution, were taken by the Bank, and discounted upon to its customers and officers. It is believed that, in many instances, those collected at New York, which amounted to a great portion of the whole, were shipped to England, to form there a fund by which the Bank could deal in exchanges from country to country. In fact, the moneys and whole treasure of the nation were under the entire control of the Bank, and were used by it as suited the pleasure of its officers. It is true that the drafts of the Government in favor of its creditors were paid by the Bank; and it is also true that these drafts were paid in the notes of the Bank.

And now, sir, let me ask, will not the money of this Government be as safe under the provisions of this bill as when deposited in the United States Bank? Will it not be as secure from felons without or felons within? Will it not be as well protected by the bolts and bars and vaults in the buildings provided for the receivers general, as in a bank? And may it not, with the strongest confidence, be asserted, that men appointed as these officers are required to be, and surrounded by checks, by bonds, by penal laws, who have not only the reputation and interests of those who have reposed confidence in them at stake, but their own personal honor, honesty, and even liberty, involved, will be as honest and as trustworthy as a corporation without soul, and with no object in view but the distribution of dividends and the accumulation of a surplus? The receiver general has the honor of his Government at stake—the bank the interests of its stockholders. The receiver general has every inducement that a man can have to be faithful and honest—the bank has but one only, that of interest. The receiver general is a man, with all the feelings of a man, with hopes and fears, and all the sensibilities of a responsible being—the bank is a body politic and corporate, a mere machine, with individual responsibility resting upon no one. But, says the gentleman from Connecticut, Swartwout absconded. True, sir; he deserted the Democratic party, joined the Conservatives, and ran away with the money. Tis to prevent a repetition of similar occurrences that this bill is needed. Had such a law as this bill proposes to enact been in force, that money would never have been lost to this people.

But, sir, let us go a little more into particulars, and see the situation of the funds of the Government, while in the hands of the United States Bank. I will not discuss the exclusive privileges which the Bank enjoyed, and the immense dividends which it made during the continuation of its charter. It is sufficient for my purpose to examine into the scurity of the public moneys while under its control.

The capital of that institution, it will be recollected, was thirty-five millions; seven millions belonged to the United States, and the remaining twenty-eight millions to the stockholders, $8,405,500 of which was publicly owned by foreigners. It had twenty-five directors, five of whom were appointed by the President of the United States, and the remainder were chosen by the stockholders. It will be very easy to conceive that this Bank could be entirely controlled by a foreign Government; for notwithstanding the charter provides that no person not a citizen of the United States shall be a director, and that no foreign stockholder should have a vote in the choice of directors, yet how easy would it be for the foreign stockholders to transfer their stock for the time being to citizens of the United States, and have directors chosen to suit themselves? And, sir, in case of a war with a foreign power, where would the funds of our own Government be? What control could five Government directors have over twenty others? Who can answer that the Bank would not suspend specie payments, and the nation at once become bankrupt? Who can tell what would become, not only of the Government deposites, but of the Government stock, even? Is it said that no citizens of this country could be found who would lend themselves to such devices? Sir, I should hope there could not be; but when we reflect upon some of scenes that occurred during the last war of this country with England, when we remember that the Legislature of one of the States of this Union could so far forget itself, and the duties it owed to this Government, as to pass a resolution, that it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice at our victories, as was done by the Federal Legislature of Massachusetts in June, 1813, it is not too much to believe that, in times of high excitement, men might be found who would lend themselves to almost any or every thing, to accomplish their ends.

But, sir, let us proceed a little further. In December, 1834, a committee of the Senate of the United States, previously appointed to investigate the affairs and conduct of the Bank, made a report. To some of the facts contained in that report, I desire to call the attention of gentlemen; and I desire that they will bear in mind that this report, and the facts therein stated, are based upon an actual examination of the books and papers of the Bank.

It will be recollected that during the session of Congress which commenced in December, 1831, and continued till the 16th of July, 1832, the Bank applied to Congress for a new charter. It will be recollected, also, that Congress yielded to the application, and passed a bill rechartering the Bank during that session, and that General Jackson vetoed it. It will also be remembered, that in the summer and fall of 1832, the elections for members of the next Congress were held, and also that the Presidential election took place in the autumn of the same year. Now, sir, what was the course of the Bank during that campaign? Why, sir, in the last six months of that year, it expended sixteen thousand four hundred and ninety-nine dollars and ninety-four cents, for (as the committee called it) "extraordinary printing." And what was this extraordinary printing? Sir, let me read some of the details to gentlemen:

"Jesper Harding, for printing review of the veto, and expenses incident thereto, and 200 handbills ordered by Col. J— - - - $821 78

Edward Olmstead, bank documents - $624 11

4,000 Ewing's speech, Webster's speech, and other documents, relating to the Bank - $328 88

Edward Olmstead, printing review - $418 25

Wm. Fry, printing two editions of questions and answers - - - - $304 84

22,300 copies of Webster's speech on the veto message - - - - $892 00

40,800 copies of Webster's speech on the veto message - - - - $816 00"

"John Metcalfe of Kentucky, for printing 1,400 extra copies of Protector, containing sundry bank documents and articles in favor of Bank, and analysis of veto message - - $295 00"

"D. N. Hewlings, for printing Webster's speech - - - - 250 00"

"R. Coneynham, for printing Mr. Webster's speech - - - - $200 00"

"Thomas Clarke, for printing Webster's speech, and other articles on veto message, and distributing them - - - - $1,512 75

Sergeant Hall, printing Webster's speech, and other articles in Schuylkill County Advocate, etc. - - - - $100 00"

"Nathan Hale, printing 40,000 copies of Webster's speech at Worcester Convention, 12,500 copies Webster's speech on Bank veto, and stitching, boxes, freight by packet and stages, packing, and sending away - - - $2,422 65"

"R. Bannan, for printing extracts of Webster's speech, and other articles in English and German, on the veto message, and distribution - $200 00 Conrad Zentler, for publishing in German extracts of Webster's speech, and other publications, and distributing them - - $566 40"

Sir, I could proceed, but I will not detain the committee in enumerating the remaining items. Those who have a curiosity and are not already familiar with the transactions, can look them over at their leisure. They can examine not only the several items and see to whom the amounts were paid, but they can notice the prices also. They will find that in one case twenty-one cents were paid for each single copy of a newspaper.

Again, sir, how was it in 1834? In this year also a new Congress was to be elected. The charter of the Bank was to expire in March, 1836, and unless this Congress could be chosen favorable to the institution, unless the people could be sufficiently enlightened to elect Bank men, the die was cast and the charter must expire. This was indeed a desperate effort, and how unscrupulously the means of the Bank were used, let the facts stated in this report answer. In six months of that year, during the long session of Congress, the Bank spent twenty-four thousand two hundred and fifty-two dollars and fifty-one cents. And what was it for? Sir, it was for speeches and documents favorable to the Bank and Bank party. The account is a long one or I would read it all. It was for the speeches of Mr. Webster, Mr. Clay, Mr. Adams, Mr. Southard, Mr. Binney, and other distinguished gentlemen of the Opposition party. Seventy-five thousand copies of Mr. Webster's speeches were taken at one time, besides many thousands at other times; fifty thousand of Mr. Adams's at one time; twenty-five thousand of Mr. Clay's at another, and fifty thousand of Mr. Binney's at another. And, sir, during these six months, the Bank took, of these speeches and documents, if I have added them correctly, no less than 649,500. Sir, how many voters were there in the whole Union at that time? If we suppose the whole population to be thirteen millions, and one in every five of that number to be a voter, we shall have two millions, six hundred thousand voters—and, sir, about one speech to every four voters of the whole United States. Will gentlemen undertake to justify such a course? Will they say that it is all a "fair business transaction?" and that the Bank, in purchasing political speeches sufficient to supply every family in the Republic, is confining itself within its proper sphere?

In looking over this account for "extraordinary printing" for these six months in 1834, when nearly twenty-five thousand dollars are expended in so short a time, for 649,500 Bank speeches, it will perhaps be a matter of no little surprise to some, to find that nothing, no, sir, not even a farthing, is charged for distributing them. In the six months of 1832, above alluded to, several items of charge, amounting to some hundreds of dollars, are to be found for distribution; and the question very naturally arises, why, in the six months of 1832, these charges should be made, while in 1834, not a dollar should be expended for that purpose? Sir, I will undertake to solve the matter. The reason which I shall give, may be an erroneous one, but, nevertheless, it is that which has suggested itself to me. During the six months alluded to in 1832, Congress was not in session. It was the latter half of the year; but in the six months of 1834, when these 649,500 speeches were bought by the Bank, Congress was in session, and many, if not all, of these very speeches were then made. Sir, were they scattered abroad throughout the country, under the franks of gentlemen then members of Congress? Was the Bank of the United States then furnishing funds to purchase the speeches of its political friends, and were those friends distributing those speeches by virtue of the franking privilege which they enjoyed? Were the Bank and the Opposition acting in concert—scheming together, planning together? Were they bound by the same ties, united by the same interests, and engaged in the same league against Gen. Jackson and the Administration party? Sir, I will not undertake to answer the questions; I will leave it for those who have a more familiar and intimate acquaintance with that institution and its management than I have.

But, sir, this is not all. I have before stated that the United States owned one-fifth of the capital stock of this Bank; of course one-fifth of all the expenditures of the institution were borne by the Government; and, consequently, of the $24,252 51 expended for "extraordinary printing," in six months only of 1834, one-fifth, or $4,850 50, was the money of the people of these States. By this "extraordinary" management of the Bank, not only do we find it entering the arena of politics, and waging war against the Administration, but actually compelling the Government, by the control which it had over its means, to contribute, in the short space of six months, the sum of $4,850 50 to purchase the speeches of political partisans, with which to carry on operations against the Government itself—yes, sir, compelled to furnish the very weapons with which it was to receive the stabs of its enemies.

Sir, gentlemen may wish to know the aggregate amount which was expended in this extraordinary manner. I will give it to them as stated in this report. It was $94,708 25; one-fifth of which, let it not be forgotten, was the money of this Government.

I wish to call attention to another fact stated in this report. Under the head of "Loans made by Bank of United States and officers to members of Congress," I find that, during the session of Congress in 1834, when so many of these speeches were made and purchased, members of Congress were indebted to the Bank in the sum of $238,586. On going back to 1831, I find that this indebtedness amounted to $322,199; and, in 1832, to the very moderate sum of $478,069. Upon this, sir, I will make no comment; I will let the facts speak for themselves. I will simply observe, as before stated, that it was in the session of 1831–'32, that the application was made by the Bank for a new charter, and that a bill for that purpose actually passed both branches of Congress during that session, and would have been fastened upon this people, beyond all hope of redemption, had not Andrew Jackson vetoed that bill.

One thing more and I am done with this report. We have, during the past few years, heard much said about the manner in which the Bank has tampered with the public press, and of the favors and accommodations extended to editors of newspapers in various sections. I do not propose to go over these in detail, as set forth in this report. I will allude to one case only—I mean the National Intelligencer, published in this city. At the time this report was made in 1834, this establishment was indebted to the Bank in the sum of $57,107; and sir, if I am not misinformed, the records of this city now show a deed from that establishment to the Bank, of type, press, and all. So that even now, the head of the Opposition press, which is doing battle most manfully under the Harrison and Tyler flag, is owned by the Bank.

What the private management and conduct of the Bank have been since it passed beyond the reach of inspection by the people, of course cannot be known.

I do not undertake to say that it is now more active, more desperate, more unscrupulous in furnishing funds in this, its death struggle, than ever; that if success attends its efforts, a recharter is the reward, and it is again triumphant; that if a failure ensues, it may as well go down with a loud crash as with a small one. I do not undertake to say, that so wrapped up in the fate of that institution are the interests of some of the leading Opposition politicians of the country, that they are virtually pledged for a recharter. I charge not that its foreign stockholders, recollecting the palmy days of immense dividends, are now pouring in their money, to influence our elections and break down the Democracy of our country. I do not undertake to say that British influence and British money are now actively employed to crush the administration of this Government, that the Federal party may be brought into power, and the State debts held abroad be forced upon, and assumed by the General Government. But, Sir, should I make these assertions and charges, I am by no means certain that I should not be fully justified by the facts.

Sir, I was not a little amused to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] allude to the last suspension of the banks in 1839. I had supposed that that gentleman was possessed of a little too much shrewdness to invoke such facts to sustain him in his argument. Sir, does not every one know—is it not, in fact, a matter of history—that the United States Bank, and its speculations, brought about that suspension? And does not the gentleman know that it was the banks of the city of New York—ay, sir, the Democratic city of New York, that prevented the suspension North and East? Does he not recollect with what subserviency the gallant little State of Rhode Island, with more banks than she has towns, whipped in to the track of "the Great Regulator?" And does he not know that the banks of his own proud State were ready, willing, and even anxious, to follow in the same train, had they dared to in opposition to the Democratic city of New York? Yes, sir, had they dared to; for, had they suspended, they well knew that the trade of the North would have left the city of Boston and gone to New York.

But, sir, I will pursue these remarks no further; and I will ask now, where are the moneys of the people safest? To whom should they rather be entrusted? To faithful officers of their own choosing, surrounded by all the guards and checks that are wont to insure honesty and fidelity in public servants, or to an irresponsible and party Bank—a Bank that has sought, and, perhaps I might add, is now seeking, not only to control the business and enterprise of the country, but to govern its whole civil power?

But, sir, the expense, it is said, is a strong objection to the passage of this bill. Have gentlemen, who urge this as an objection, carefully examined the various sections of the bill? If so, sir, I should hardly think they would come to such a conclusion. The offices at Boston and New York, it will be recollected, are to be kept in the custom-houses of those cities, buildings belonging to the Government. The only expense, then, at those two cities, for accommodations to transact the business, will be the procuring of safes, and the preparing of vaults. So it will be, sir, at the mints in Philadelphia and New Orleans. So also will it be at Charleston, at the custom-house, if rooms in it can be found and obtained. At St. Louis an office will probably have to be erected; and, perhaps, also at Charleston; and for the purchase of sites, and the erecting of offices at these two places, the bill appropriates ten thousand dollars. Under the provisions of this bill it cannot take but a very moderate sum to procure the safes and prepare the offices in the manner designated. Sir, it may do very well in electioneering speeches against this bill, to talk about splendid palaces, and the hundreds of thousands that will have to be expended to prepare these offices; but permit me to say, that if gentlemen are disposed to electioneer in this way, they must be careful that their constituents never see or read this bill. They must be careful, also, not to tell them how much the United States banking house in Philadelphia cost. They must never name the $413,081 19, that were expended for that edifice. They must be careful, also, to keep out of view the large sums that it cost to erect the numerous branch banks that were scattered throughout the Union. They must say nothing of the $116,777 02 that the Boston branch cost; nothing of the $110,657 34 that the Baltimore branch cost; nothing of the $87,000 00 that were paid for the New York branch; nothing of the hundreds of thousands that were paid for the remaining branches, but most especially nothing of the $1,221,942 19 that the whole cost. And, sir, they must be still more careful not to inform them that the United States was charged with one-fifth of the cost of erecting all these edifices. And so, sir, with regard to the salaries that are to be paid to the receivers general. Gentlemen urge that there is so much money expended. It is not believed that they will complain that their salaries are too high for the services rendered—at least that complaint has not yet been made—but that so much is yearly expended. And here let me suggest to them again, to say nothing of the amount paid to the large number of officers, the presidents, the cashiers, the tellers, the book-keepers, the discount clerks, and other clerks, and messengers of the United States Bank, and its numerous branches. Don't tell them, gentlemen, that these twenty-eight institutions, each of them had a set of all these officers; by no means inform them that one-fifth of all the salaries of this large horde of officers was paid by the Government of the United States; and least of all, sir, let gentlemen never intimate that the people paid one-fifth of all the incidental expenses of the Bank, and one-fifth of all its "extraordinary printing."

Will gentlemen say that the Government owns its share of these edifices? Very true, sir; and so will the offices of the receivers general be owned by the Government. There is this slight difference, however, that while the banking houses cost $1,221,942 19, the offices of the receivers general may cost from ten to twenty thousand.

But, sir, the great objection after all, which is urged against this bill, and that which it is asserted and predicted by the gentleman from Connecticut, is to ruin the country, is to be found, I suppose, in the provisions of the 19th section. And what are those provisions? Substantially these; that after the 30th of June instant, one fourth of the revenues of the Government shall be paid in gold and silver; after the 30th of June, 1841, one-half; after the 30th of June, 1842, three-fourths, and after the 30th of June, 1843, the whole shall be paid in that currency. This, sir, is the obnoxious section. It is this operation, if we are to believe the gentleman, that is to prostrate all credit; ruin all business; bankrupt the merchant; throw out of employment the mechanic; stop the wheels of the manufactory; beggar our planters and farmers, and drive to the poorhouse our laborers. Sir, is it possible that the gentleman can be serious and sincere in his predictions? Let us look a little at this mighty section that is to be so withering in its influences. For the current year, it is believed that the revenues of the Government will amount, in round numbers, to about twenty millions. One-fourth of this, or five millions, is to be collected in specie. This is to be done at the various receiving offices, in different sections of the country, at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, &c. The specie in the country is supposed to amount to about eighty-five millions; so that five out of eighty-five millions are to pass through the receiving offices the present year. I say pass through, sir, for it must be borne in mind that it is not to be collected and hoarded up for private or public speculation—it is not to be lent out to friends, or discounted upon to special favorites, but to be paid out to the creditors of the Government. The increase is to be gradual for the succeeding years; and if more specie is needed in the country, depend upon it, sir, you cannot keep it out. We have every thing to purchase it with; and it will as assuredly flow in upon us as that our cotton, wheat, and tobacco shall continue to grow. And yet, if we are to believe the predictions of gentlemen, this operation is to paralyze all the springs of industry, and spread universal prostration and distress throughout the land. Sir, have the muscles of man become stiffened, that he cannot work? Has the sun ceased to pour forth its rays upon our land? Have the streams that water the earth become dried up, and has the rain ceased to fall? Are the labors of the husbandman not blessed with a reward? Are not the wants of mankind constantly increasing with an increasing population? Do we not require dwellings to live in and clothes to wear, as formerly? And is every thing to be stopped, prostrated, ruined, and annihilated, because out of eight-five millions of specie in the country, five are to pass through the hands of Government officers the coming year?

Sir, let gentlemen talk about reduction of prices and the wages of labor as much as they choose. I can tell them that the farmers and the laboring men of the country understand that thing perfectly well. They have heard it before now. They know that it is a bait with which the Federal party have sought to entrap them again and again. There is always a time when that party is exceedingly anxious about the welfare of the laboring classes, and they well remember when that time is—it is just before the elections. Sir, the laboring classes are not to be gulled by any such shallow device—they know full well that the Democratic party, made up, to a very large extent, of themselves, has always striven to promote their interests and protect their rights by every possible means. And they know too, sir, that the only time that the Federal party can descend to notice them, is when they wish to use them.

Sir, I grant that in the large cities, where the greater part of our revenues are collected, the provisions of this section will have a restraining influence upon banking operations. And, for one, I trust they will. If the operations of this bill shall check that mania for speculation and monopoly—that thirst for sudden affluence, without corresponding effort—I shall rejoice in its effects.

Sir, who is it that, in past years, has scoured our wheat-growing country, purchased the immense crops, and then advanced the price to suit his own cupidity? It is the bank favorite or bank officer, who has taken out of the institutions his hundreds of thousands of paper to carry on his speculations. Who is it that has suffered by this monopoly? Sir, it is all branches of community; but none so much as the poor man, who is suddenly called upon to pay advanced prices for the actual necessaries of life, without a corresponding advance in the price of his labor.

Who is it that has sought to monopolize the cotton trade of the South, and indeed of the world? Need I tell you that it is the United States Bank? Need I tell you that it is beneath that very load that it is now staggering? Sir, if banks shall keep themselves within their proper spheres; if they will confine their operations to their legitimate objects; if their paper shall be what it purports to be, the representative, the true representative of gold and silver, this bill cannot injure them. Solvent banks cannot be injuriously affected. It is the insolvent bank that may feel its power—it is the speculating institution, whose reins will be checked. Such institutions may not dare to extend their operations beyond their legitimate powers, for their bills may be returned upon them for specie. And, sir, can any one who regards the stability of trade and the honesty of mercantile transactions, regret that such should be the fact? Can any one who would see industry and fair dealing triumph over indolence, improvidence, and gambling, regret the effects of such a measure?

Sir, in all the aspects in which I have been able to view this bill and its provisions, I cannot but think that our public moneys will be more securely kept; our public creditors more promptly and satisfactorily paid; and that so far as it may have any effect upon the trade and business of the country, that that effect will be most salutary and desirable.

But, sir, suppose this bill should not pass; I ask gentlemen of the Opposition what would they have as a substitute. Will any one deny that it is a United States Bank that they desire? Have not some of the more bold already avowed it? Others, not so courageous, do not dare, openly, fearlessly, and honestly to declare it to the world, but seek, on all occasions, to proclaim distress, ruin, prostration of all business, and desolation throughout the land. Thus it is, that the timid become alarmed—credit becomes weakened—business is consequently checked, and a panic is produced. And thus, too, it is, that the Opposition expect by and by to be able openly to declare for a United States Bank, drive the country into its support, and place beneath its thraldom. And, sir, this is the question which the people of this free Republic have again to decide Once, twice, thrice, is not enough. With all the evils and sins of the old Bank before them, with the Constitution of their country staring them in the face, they are again to say whether they will fasten upon themselves and posterity a monopoly, that shall swallow up all the efforts of individual enterprise, and not only control the business and industry of the country, but which shall hold within its grasp its political existence, and even liberty itself. Sir, can it be that the people of these united States are prepared for such an act? Are not aristocracy and wealth sufficient, in all conscience, to contend single handed against industry and moderate means, without the aid of combined corporate millions? And when you give to those millions the power to create ficticious money to the amount of millions more, what has he who depends solely upon his own hard hands and honest heart to expect? What but a complete subserviency to corporate wealth?

It is expected that most men interested in banks and corporations will be opposed to this bill. There is a sympathy existing throughout the whole Bank and corporate communities. When you touch one, you touch the whole; and although solvent institutions may be rather benefited than injured, there is, as they fancy, an injury in prospect. It is to be expected that bank officers, whose living is dependent upon and grows out of the monopoly granted to those institutions, imagining that their privileges are to be encroached upon, will be opposed to this bill. It is to be expected that bankrupts, whose very existence has been wrapped up in the favors which they have received from moneyed institutions, and all whose chimerical schemes have vanished into thin air, will attribute all their failures to the operations of this bill. But especially, sir, is it to be anticipated that the dependants of the United States Bank should raise their voices in opposition, for their interest in its defeat is most palpable. Let this bill be defeated—let the United States Bank be rechartered, or another Bank established, and the revenues of the Government be deposited in it as formerly, and a basis is formed, upon which millions of paper promises are thrown into circulation, for which the people are taxed—taxed, too, for lending their own money for the benefit of the special favorites of the Bank. Sir, there are some, who are always willing to blame every body and every thing but themselves, but nothing so readily as the Government under which they live. And, should this bill pass, let gentlemen return to their constituents and tell them that every case of adversity throughout the length and breadth of this vast country is caused by the passage of this bill. Let them go to the manufacturer, who has pursued his business with recklessness unparalleled; to the importer and wholesale merchant, who, in his haste to grow rich, has overlooked the responsibility of his debtors, and is consequently involved in inextricable difficulties; let them go to the monopolist in trade, who, in his anxiety to control the market, has forgotten that his success depended upon sales as well as purchases, and whose merchandise is now upon his hands; to the spendthrift, who has lived upon the forbearance and indulgence of his friends; to the man whose extravagance has reduced him to want, and to the gambler of every grade. Let them go to the disappointed politician, to every species of discontent, and to every nook and corner of distress, and tell them that it is all caused by the passage of this bill. And, sir, if the coming season should prove unfruitful, tell them that the drought and the flood, the mildew and the frost, have all been caused by the operations of the Sub-Treasury. And, for a remedy for all these evils, tell them to elect General Harrison for President, and establish a United States Bank. Should any one be so impertinent as to ask what are his principles, proclaim it upon the housetops, that it is deemed unnecessary and impolitic to avow them—that it is sufficient for the people to know hat he is a candidate—that he must be taken "with something akin to generous confidence," and must be elected, without any declaration of principles. And, sir, when it shall be said that the Administration party is opposed to local internal improvements, to a United States Bank, to the assumption of the State debts, to any greater tariff than the wants of the Government require; and that it is in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution, of the preservation of the rights of the States, and of bringing the Government back to the days of Jefferson; let it again be proclaimed that these principles are all to be kept out of sight till after the election, when "all the interests of the great Opposition party" will be harmonized. Let it be declared from one end of the nation to the other, that the only principle that binds the Opposition party together is that avowed by a gentleman from New York two or three weeks since—"war upon this Administration."

Such, sir, has been the case with one of the parties of this country, from the foundation of the Government until the present time. In most, if not all elections, while one party has held up to view the principles by which it is governed, while it has taken its stand upon those principles, and, trusting to the intelligence of the people, has been willing to rise or fall, as their verdict should be rendered upon them; the other party, with a perseverance worthy of a better cause, underrating the good sense of the people, has sought to draw off the public mind upon collateral and immaterial issues, and to keep out of sight the great questions that are actually involved. Sir, do I err when I say that such is the case now? Why is it, that tens of thousands, ay, sir, hundreds of thousands of pamphlets, said to contain the life of General Harrison, are sent forth under the franks of gentlemen, and scattered throughout the country? But, especially, sir, why is it that nothing is contained in those pamphlets, indicating the political principles of the General? Is it to draw off the public mind from the great issue that is to be tried? Is it to turn attention to his military services, that in their supposed blaze his political principles may be kept out of view, and his civil qualifications be forgotten? Why is it that there is an apparent anxiety to seize every opportunity to pour out indiscriminate denunciation upon the Administration, that it may be rendered unpopular and obnoxious? Why is it that thousands of dollars are wasted by delays in discussing the most minute and trifling matters? Why, sir, I ask, but to draw off public attention from the great principles of the parties, and to keep out of view the real issue to be tried—"an Independent Treasury or a United States Bank."

Sir, it is of little consequence to me whether General Harrison, in his military career, won laurels that a conqueror might be proud of, or whether his fame is any thing but desirable. I care not whether, as a shrewd and experienced commander, he encamped his troops at Tippecanoe upon the most advantageous ground, or whether he was induced by a wily foe to select the very spot that his enemy pointed out to him. I ask not whether, at that battle, he mounted his own steed or that of a brave comrade, that his own person might not be recognised. I ask not whether that comrade, while upon the horse of the General, fell upon that battle field, and gave up his life for his country. I care not whether the battle of the Thames was won by Gen. Harrison, or whether another gentleman now in the Senate chamber, serving his country as her second officer, is entitled to all the honor and glory of that victory. I care not whether fort Stephenson was evacuated by his order, or whether it was defended by a man whose name will never be forgotten in the annals of his country. Sir, I will not enter into a discussion of these matters. When about to select a man to preside over the destinies of this great Republic—when we are to place at the helm of state one upon whom the happiness and welfare of so many millions depend, it is not military fame alone that is to insure his success—it is not talents, nor education, nor general information that are to make him acceptable—but it is principles. They will be sought for, scrutinized, canvassed. And although a candidate may have the military fame of a Cesar, or an Alexander; although he may have served his country in her greatest peril, yet his reuptation and his services can never answer as a substitute for correct and fundamental political principles.

Sir, let me tell gentlemen that they miscalculate entirely the intelligence of the people, if they suppose they can be humbugged by parade, or led off from the great principles which they have supported for years, by the empty sound of a hurrah. No sir, no. The people understand their rights, and dare maintain them. No bank bribes can seduce them. No corporation combinations for the reduction of wages can intimidate them. No hypocritical sympathies can deceive them. But the working men of this Union, who have always proved true to the Constitution of our country, and have again and again rescued it from the threatened ruin, will not fail to do their duty in the great contest before them. It is by their efforts, the efforts of the true Democracy of the country, that the perpetuity of our institutions has been preserved. It is by the farmers, the mechanics, the workingmen of our Republic, that this Administration has been and will be sustained. It is by those who would see equal rights and equal privileges bestowed upon all. It was such men that poured out their blood upon the battle fields of our Revolution. It was such men that won for this country its freedom and independence. They were the men who brought Jefferson into power. They were the men who stood by Madison in the dark days of the last war. They were the men who effected the political revolution of 1828, and who have maintained the Democratic ascendency since that time. And, sir, so long as they shall govern, so long will the Republic be safe.

Mr. OSBORNE of Connecticut obtained the floor, but gave way for a motion to adjourn.

And then the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Wednesday, June 3, 1840.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of the Legislature of Michigan, praying for a donation of lands, or money, to aid in the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Mary; which was laid upon the table.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the petition of Micajah T. Williams; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Alexander H. Everett, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, made an adverse report on the bill for the relief of William A. Cuddeback; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. W. in pursuance of notice, introduced a bill for the relief of William R. Davis; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROBINSON gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce a bill the better to expedite the great Southern mail.

Mr. FULTON presented the petition of Samuel Morris and Frederick Saugrave; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. F. gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Clinton T. Dixon.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred

A bill for the relief of Jacob Adams; and made adverse reports thereon.

A bill for the relief of Joseph Bailey;

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on the Militia, to which was referred so much of the report of the Secretary of War as relates to the organization of the militia, made a report thereon, concluding with a resolution that they be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill concerning prisoners of the United States committed to the jail of the county of Providence, and State of Rhode Island, reported the same without amendment; and after some remarks from Mr. W. it was considered, as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The unfinished business of yesterday, being the motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, to lay the memorial of James C. Reynolds on the table, being taken up, Mr. CRITTENDEN addressed the Senate, and was replied to at much length by Mr. ALLEN; when the question being taken, the petition was laid on the table.

The Senate then went into the consideration of of Executive business, and afterwards

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, June 3, 1840.

On motion of Mr. BELL, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the consideration of so much of the President's message, and the report of Secretary of War, as relates to Indian Affairs; and the subject was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PETRIKIN presented, from the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds, a certain communication which had been referred to that committee; which was ordered to be printed.

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order during the morning hour, was the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] to commit to the Committee on Commerce the bill reported from that committee by the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. HILLEN, to repeal the act regulating pilots.

Mr. CURTIS, who was entitled to the floor, said he believed the committee were mistaken in their views on the subject committed to them; which he was prepared to show by an examination of the report. The report was ordered to be printed on yesterday; but was not on the table this morning. He was anxious that every member should have the report before him, before he proceeded to the discussion; he would therefore suggest that the subject should by general consent be laid over till to-morrow, at which time the report would be on the table.

Mr. HILLEN said he could not object, if it was the full understanding that the question should be taken up to-morrow.

The suggestion was agreed to by general consent.

The CHAIR announced that the next business in order was the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands, authorizing the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described; and to settle the claims to the vacant unappropriated lands within the same, passed April 18, 1836. The question was on its commitment.

Mr. PETRIKIN, who was entitled to the floor, considered it very wrong to keep a large body of land in that State, and yet that that State should have no control over it. The lands lie there unsettled, and the State has no power to take it. The bill had been often discussed by both Houses; and notwithstanding the measure was perfectly just in itself, yet by the process of staving off action on it in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it has been defeated. That was the mode its enemies pursued to kill the bill, and it is the mode now proposed to be resorted to—that is, to refer it to the Committee of the Whole, where they know, in consequence of the mass of business before that committee, it will not be reached this session. He did not believe that, by the rule, it was required to be commited; and he was therefore opposed to placing it in a situation where it could not be acted on. To bring the House to speedy action on it, he moved the previous question.

Mr. LINCOLN inquired of the CHAIR what would be the effect of the previous question?

The CHAIR replied, that it would bring the House to a vote on the motion to commit.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House; which was refused.

Mr. EVERETT was understood to say he could not see wherein this question differed from the decision on the pre-emption bill; and if it did not differ, he did not see how the previous question could be made to apply to the motion for its commitment.

The CHAIR said there was a manifest distinction between the principle of this bill and the pre-emption bill; and the previous question would be on the motion to commit; and, if the gentleman thought proper to take an appeal, he would explain his reasons, and show the distinction. Does the gentleman take an appeal?

Mr. EVERETT said he would probably take an appeal.

The previous question was seconded—yeas 98, nays not counted.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" which were ordered.

Mr. EVERETT inquired of the CHAIR what the main question would be, if ordered.

The CHAIR replied that it would be on the commitment of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. EVERETT. Then I take an appeal from that decision.

The SPEAKER said that, upon examination of the bill, to see whether, under the rules of the House, it ought to be committed, he found that it contained a donation of lands—it cedes to the State of Tennessee all the lands within its limits: therefore, on that ground, the bill must necessarily be committed, and the previous question was on the commitment.

Mr. EVERETT contended that the previous question was not on the commitment, but on the third reading of the bill, and on that ground appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

And the question being on the appeal,

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment was the House?" was then taken by tellers, and resulted—yeas 94, noes not counted.

So the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed, and the previous question decided to be on the commitment.

The question then recurring on the commitment of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. MONTGOMERY demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were—yeas 104, nays 65, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Banks, Baker, Beirne, Black, Bond, Brewster, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Anson Brown, Calhoun, Connor, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Dana, Davies, John Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fletcher, Floyd, Galbraith, James Garland, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hall, Hammond, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hoffman, Hook, Hopkins, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, James, Joseph Johnson, William C. Johnson, John W. Jones, Kempshall, King, Lewis, Lincoln, Lucas, McKay, Marchand, Marvin, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Naylor, Newhard, Nisbet, Ogle, Paynter, Peck, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Rhett, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Russell, Shaw, Shepard, Simonton, John Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Steenrod, Storrs, Strong, Sumter, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Weller, Wick, and Lewis Williams—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Beatty, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Davee, John W. Davis, Duncan, Eastman, Gentry, Goode, Hand, Henry, Howard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kille, Leonard, Lowell, McCarty, McClellan, McCulloch, Mallory, Miller, Montanya, Calvary Morris, Parrish, Parris, Petrikin, Prentiss, Reynolds, Ridgway, Albert Smith, Stuart, Swearingen, Sweney, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Peter J. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—65.

So the bill was ordered to be committed.

Mr. HUBBARD said that he had not a correct understanding of the decision of the CHAIR on the first question, and that he had therefore voted in the affirmative with a view of moving a reconsideration, so as to put himself right. He did not rise for the purpose of discussing the bill, but merely to state what its provisions were. Mr. H. then read the bill, and contended that it made no appropriation of money, but merely ceded to the State of Tennessee, certain lands to enable her to settle certain claims of North Carolina. It made no appropriation whatever, and therefore ought not to go into committee. For these reasons he moved a reconsideration of the vote, by which the decision of the SPEAKER, to the contrary, had been sustained. He also made some allusion to the pre-emption bill, which was passed a short time ago, and wished the present bill to be treated on the same principles. The pre-emption bill was not referred to a committee of the whole, and why should this be subject to a different rule? For his part, he wished them treated both alike. He had no idea of making fish of one and flesh of the other; if he was right on the pre-emption bill the other day, he was right now.

Mr. HOWARD of Indiana gave notice that if the vote on the commitment was reconsidered, he would move to reconsider the vote on the appeal. He had voted to sustain the CHAIR under a misapprehension.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider; which received a second, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. MONTGOMERY inquired of the CHAIR, if the House refused to reconsider the vote on the commitment, whether it would be in order for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOWARD] to move to reconsider the vote on the appeal.

The CHAIR replied that it would not.

And the questson now being on the motion to reconsider,

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked for the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 82, nays 90, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, J. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Bell, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, William B Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clark, Clifford, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Dana, J. W. Davis, Garret Davis, Duncan, Earl, Ely, Everett, James Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Goode, Hammond, Hand, Henry, Howard, Hubbard, Jameson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Kille, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, McClellan, McCulloch, Mallory, Mason, Miller, Mitchell, Montanya, Calvary Morris, Parish, Parris, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Reynolds, Ridgway, Robinson, Sergeant, Albert Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, J. T. Stuart, Swearingen, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Vanderpoel, Warren, Watterson, Edward D. White, John White, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and John T. H. Worthington—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Banks, Baker, Beirne, Black, Brewster, Briggs, Anson Brown, Butler, Calhoun, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Davies, John Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Doig, Dromgoole, Edwards, Evans, Fletcher, Goggin, Graham, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hook, Hunt, Jackson, James, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kempshall, King, Lewis, Lincoln, Lucas, McKay, Marchand, Marvin, Montgomery, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Paynter, Peck, Ramsey, Randolph, Rayner, Reed, Rhett, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Simonton, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Strong, Sumter, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Wagener, Weller, Wick, and Lewis Williams—90.

So the House refused to reconsider.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and toook up the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. OSBORNE, who was entitled to the floor, spoke at some length of the origin, tendency, and principles of the bill. He denounced the bill as a remarkable project, and contended that it was anti-Republican, and opposed to the habits of the people. That it made war upon the banks by draining them of their specie; and that it might be used as an engine to harass and destroy the banks. He dwealt upon the state of the currency generally, past and present, and attributed it to the policy of the past and present Administrations.

Mr. HUNT next obtained the floor, and denounced the measure as one of war upon the great business interests of the country, and even its liberties. He adverted to the policy of the past and present Administrations; and, in the course of his remarks, made some remarks in reference to an investigation which was gravely going on, on charges made against certain Government officers, for purchasing public stores from Whig merchants of Baltimore; when he was interrupted by Mr. HILLEN of Maryland, who said it was notorious that the charges against the Government officers were not only that they had been dealing with Whig merchants, but that they had been paying those merchants higher prices than the goods could be purchased for elsewhere. These charges, he would also inform the gentleman, were made by the Whigs themselves against these Government officers.

Mr. HUNT was understood to be thankful for the correction, and proceeded in his remarks till the hour for the recess, half past twoo'clock, without finishing.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. HUNT resumed his remarks in opposition to the bill, and concluded at a few minutes before seven o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN having then given to floor to Mr. H. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts, the committee rose, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, June 4, 1840.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial signed by seventy citizens of the Territory of Oregon, praying the extension of the jurisdiction and laws of the United States over that Territory; which was read, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER presented two petitions from citizens of Natchez, in relation to the subject of the joint resolution, introduced into the Senate a few days since for the relief of the inhabitants of the city of Natchez; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of members of the bar of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Mississippi, remonstrating against the removal of the said court from Jackson to Vicksburg; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PRESTON presented a supplemental memorial from Mary W. Thempson; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Nathaniel Pryor, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. FULTON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Epraim D. Dixon; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the report of the Secretary of the Navy on the expenses of the Navy Department, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the bill for the relief of Robert T. Wainwright.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred bills from the House

For the relief of Reuben Murray;

For the relief of Sarah Oakley;

For the relief of Joseph Bailey; and made unfavorable reports thereon.

For the relief of Jacob Adams;

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of James Phelps and John Lathram, made unfavorable reports thereon.

Mr. TAPPAN moved to take up the joint resolution for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, by limiting the tenure of office of the Judiciary; which, after some remarks from Messrs. MERRICK, WEBSTER, SEVIER, WRIGHT, and TAPPAN, was agreed to; and then, on motion of Mr. T. its further consideration was postponed until Thursday next.

The bill concerning prisoners of the United States committed to the jail of the county of Providence, and State of Rhode Island, was read a third time and passed.

HEIRS OF ROBERT FULTON.

The report of the Committee on Claims, adverse to the claim of the heirs of Robert Fulton, was then taken up, and Mr. MERRICK renewed his remarks in opposition to the report, and in favor of the claim.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the further consideration of the subject was postponed until tomorrow.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill for the establishment of a general system of bankruptcy throughout the United States was taken up, the question being on the motion to strike out the 18th section, providing for compulsory bankruptcy.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky addressed the Senate in favor of the motion, and was replied to by

Mr. WRIGHT, who opposed the motion, at length, contending for the necessity of including the compulsory principle, to make the bill "uniform," as contemplated by the Constitution, in its operation on the debtor and creditor. He also replied to the remarks of Mr. CALHOUN on the motion to exempt banks from the provisions of the bill.

Mr. W. having concluded,

Mr. WEBSTER intimated his intention to reply, and moved an adjournment.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, June 4, 1840.

By general consent, Mr. PETRIKIN offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the Public Buildings and Grounds inform this House, forthwith, how many superintendents, assistant superintendents, foremen, bosses, and workmen, of different kinds, are employed, at this time, at the Treasury and Patent Office buildings; and the salaries paid each of the aforesaid superintendents, assistant superintendents, foremen, and bosses, designating which building each individual attends to, his name, and occupation.

On leave given, Mr. HOPKINS presented certain additional testimony in relation to a case before the Committee of Claims, which was referred accordingly.

On leave, Mr. H. submitted a motion that the papers in relation to the case of Joseph Ramsey be printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. WICK asked leave to submit a motion discharging the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of a bill in relation to a certain tract of land in Indiana, with a view to put it on its third reading.

Mr. ANDREWS objected.

Mr. WICK gave notice that he would renew the motion to-morrow morning.

Mr. ANDREWS gave notice that he would oppose the motion.

PILOT LAW.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the motion heretofore made by Mr. RANDOLPH, to recommit to the Committee on Commerce the report and bill providing for the repeal of the law commonly known as the Pilot law.

Mr. CURTIS, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House during the morning hour in favor of the motion to recommit.

The report and bill, he contended, ought to be recommitted, because the facts presented before the committee did not tend to justify the conclusion to which the report had come. The act of March, 1837, which it was now proposed to repeal, made it lawful for the masters of vessels coming into or going out of any port situated on the waters conterminous with or dividing the two States of New York and New Jersey to take a pilot from either of the two States. The law was simple in its terms, and he presumed no man would infer that injury had resulted to any one from its passage. Its tendency was to free trade, and to give to those "who go down into the sea in ships" the choice of pilots to direct and guide their course.

The report before the House set forth that the act of 1837 was an unjust, injurious, and oppressive law. If such was the fact, the law ought to be repealed; but if, on the other hand, a careful examination of the testimony which was directed by this House to be sent to the Committee on Commerce should lead to the conclusion that the commercial interests of this country, that a vast amount of property afloat and a great number of lives were, by this law, guarantied against the perils of a dangerous monopoly, then he thought the House would agree with him that it ought not to be repealed.

Who were they that were so dissatisfied with the provisions of this act, and who now asked for its repeal? The complaints came to us in memorials from New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston; they were signed by the pilots; and they alone, so far as he knew, asked the repeal of the law.

The memorial from the pilots of Virginia set forth an extraordinary reason for the repeal of the law; it was, that the law was designed to interfere with and nullify certain State laws to break up monopolies. So far from this being a cause complaint, it was with him a cause of great congratulation. The pilots of Virginia did not complain of any practical evil; and the same remark was applicable (Mr. C. contended) to all the memorials which had been referred to the committee from the pilots of all the States, and which he examined seriatim with some minuteness.

What led to the enactment of the law of 1837? The report now under consideration stated that the application was made to Congress for its passage, on account of certain remarkable disasters which had occurred in or about the port of New York, the blame of which was unjustly imputed to the New York pilots—and that, under the excitement which those disasters created in the public mind by the loss of those vessels, and of several hundreds of lives, Congress, partaking of that excitement, passed the law. How was the fact? He was sorry to say, as a citizen of the State of New York, that the date of the complaint was not correct. He was sorry that that complaint did not date correctly, on the 3d of January, 1837. The complaint of the inefficiency and neglect of the pilots of New York was of long standing. It had been a matter of reproach to New York for more than ten years—a reproach not only at home, but throughout the United States, and throughout the commercial world. It was a common reproach to say that a man was more lazy than a New York pilot. The neglect of duty by those pilots was a matter of public notoriety. He would not say whether the loss of the ship "Mexico," on the 3d of January, 1837, was justly imputed to them or not, for he did not wish to go into that matter; the complaints against them had been open and notorious for ten years prior to the loss of that ill-fated vessel. So general, indeed, had the complaint become for a considerable period prior thereto, that Governor Marcy, on the 3d of December, 1836, in his annual message, called the attention of the Legislature of the State of New York, to the subject. The "Mexico" was lost in January, and on the 3d of December previous, the Governor called the attention of the Legislature to the condition of the pilot system, which he spoke of as reproachful to the State. The reason and foundation of these complaints were to be found in the close and odious monopoly given to pilots by the law of the State of New York, passed in the year 1819. On this law and its injurious results, Mr. C. commented at some length; showing what the actual condition of things was when the law of 1837 was passed. The complaints were general, and he would show that there was sufficient testimony before the Committee on Commerce to have satisfied the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. HILLEN) who made this report, that these complaints were not only general, but had been continued for years, and that the application for the passage of the law which it was now proposed to repeal, and its passage, were not to be traced to any excitement growing out of the loss of the "Mexico."

To this end, Mr. C. here introduced and had read the testimony of sundry persons, shipmasters and others, detailing the numerous calamities which had occurred, and the vast number of lives that had been sacrificed on the coasts of New York, New Jersey, and the adjacent waters, (where the bones of hundreds of gallant ships lie buried,) prior to the wreck of the "Mexico."

There was another point to which Mr. C. would ask the attention of the House. The "Mexico," as had been stated, was lost on the 3d of January, 1837; on the 12th of the month of December previous, a gentleman then representing in part the city of New York, (Mr. MCKEON,) introduced a resolution on the subject, referring it to the Committee on Commerce; and a very able and interesting report was made upon it. A similar resolution was introduced into the Senate a few days afterwards; and the whole facts were laid before Congress.

One word as to the report of Mr. MCKEON. Was that report confined to the wreck of the "Mexico?" Not at all. On the contrary, it detailed the condition of the pilotage of New York for several years previous to the date of the report; and, that gentlemen might see from what grevious evils the law of 1837 had delivered the commerce of the port of New York, and of the United States, and of the commercial world, he would request the Clerk to read an extract from the report.

Certain portions of Mr. MCKEON's report were here read; and also the finding of the grand jury of the city of New York after the loss of the "Mexico;" which latter document also speaks in very emphatic terms of the evils resulting from the combination system of pilotage.

Mr. C. then referred to the only act passed on this subject prior to that of 1837, and by which act the power over it was given to the several States, until there should be further national legislation thereon. He doubted very much the constitutionality of that part of the act which attempted to give the power to legislate in future on this subject of commerce to the several States. It was a matter which the Constitution of the United States had committed to Congress, and upon which the States had no concurrent jurisdiction.

But the Legislature of New York had refused to interfere to put an end to one of the most odious, grinding, property and life destroying monopolies that had ever existed on earth—the monopoly of the pilotage of the port of New York. After years of suffering without redress, Congress had at last come forward, under the power conferred by the Constitution, to relieve the city of New York and its commerce from the destructive influences of that combination. He appealed to the House to say whether a law which had conferred such benefits, was to be repealed on any slight excuse or any insufficient reason? He believed that better reasons than the report of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILLEN] had brought forward, must be laid before the House before it would take upon itself the responsibility of repealing a law, the repeal of which would again expose the property and the lives of all those connected with the navigation of the port of New York to the dangers and perils of this revived monopoly.

Mr. C. concluded just as the morning hour expired, and Mr. ATHERTON called for the orders of the day.

Mr. HOFFMAN was understood to ask the House to take up a bill, of a single section, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise with the sureties of Samuel Swartwout.

Mr. GRAVES was understood to object, but the ground of the objection the Reporter could not hear.

Mr. HOFFMAN asked a suspension of the rule, merely with a view, he said, to take the sense of the House. He would not ask for the yeas and nays.

No action was had, for Mr. SERGEANT rose and asked leave to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Objection was made.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on state of the Union (Mr. BANKS of Virginia in the chair) on the bill (from the Senate) to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Massachusetts being entitled to the floor, addressed the committee at much length in favor of the bill. After recapitulating its principal features, he proceeded to contrast it with that of the deposite banks. This bill proposed that, by a certain period, all the money of the Government should be received and disbursed in gold and silver; also, that the revenue should be under the control of Government. On the other hand, the Opposition were in favor of the employment of banks to perform this duty, in which case all the revenues of the country would be in the hands, and under the control, of those institutions, and where it would be used for the benefit of the stockholders and borrowers. These were the two propositions, at which they were at issue. The issue was not merely on a choice of measures, but it was an issue involving the fundamental principles of Government. It involved two contrary and antagonistical principles. One of the propositions was founded on a distrust of the people, while the other, the present bill, acknowledged the capacity of the people for self-government, by the choice of their own agents, responsible to them. The issue was, in fact, a question between a responsible and irresponsible power. This bill expressly recognised the principle that the people had the capacity of self-government, and acknowledged to the fullest extent their sovereignty. But the deposite system, for which the Opposition were so anxious, restricted and denied the sovereignty of the people, by placing the revenue in the power of banks, which were irresponsible, and would convert the money into their paper, for the benefit of themselves and customers. Was this surrendering the revenue to soulless corporations, and whose bodies could not be touched, calculated to give supremacy to the popular will? No. Sovereignty was not the design of the banking system. All they wanted was to get the control of the revenue, and then, where would be the power of the people? It was an ancient, but true maxim, that "by dividing sovereignty, you destroy it." And so if the revenue of the country was to be given over to the banks, our Government would cease to be a Government of the people. The moment the control of the public money was lodged with the banks, that moment the sovereignty would depart from the people and be transferred from the many to the few.

He admitted that such a thing might not be inconsistent with other Governments. It might suit very well the aristocratic Governments of Europe, but its introduction into our country would never be tolerated. It was anti-Democratic in its tendency, and aimed a fatal blow at the roots of the tree of liberty. Besides, the very same principle would lead to a direct transfer of every other power belonging to the people. By the same rule the banks might claim a control over the Executive, the judicial, and every other officer of the Government. For, if the people had no right to control the revenue, they had no right to control any thing else. The very same principle which deprived them of the one, must necessarily deprive them of every other power. This measure of the Opposition, was then clearly repugnant of the first great principles of our Government, and to the equal rights and sovereignty of the people.

Among other objections to the Independent Treasury bill, it was urged that it would injure the manufacturer, and rob the laborer of his hard earnings. If he thought so, he would assure the committee and the country that he would be the last to stand up in its defence, as there was no class so worthy the protection of Government as the laboring men. That class of men was the true source of all our greatness and glory. It was the laboring men of our country who had achieved her greatest triumphs; they were the true foundation of her greatness, and the real architects of her fame; to them was to be attributed the growing cities, and all the works of enterprise in every State. Therefore, he would repeat that if he thought this measure would act injuriously upon them, and rob them of the fruits of their industry, he would be the last man to say a word in its defence. But how was the charge sustained? Where was the proof that it would produce such injurious effects? What portion of the bill was it that contained this fearful evil? It was urged that it would destroy the banks. This was erroneous, for the bill made no war upon the banks. It merely dissolved the partnership which formerly existed, and left them to themselves. The operation of this bill could not injure the banks in the least, provided they had a solid basis to rest upon. If the banks came to ruin after the passage of this bill, it would arise solely from their own weakness and rottenness, and not from any hostility from Government.

This Independent Treasury bill, was purely a defensive, instead of an offensive measure. It was a defensive measure necessary to the safety of the people, and the proper administration of Government. What! he would ask, could any one desire a repetition of the humiliating scenes of recent years, when, by a similtaneous suspension of the banks, the Government was unable to touch thirty millions of its money, and was laughed and sneered at into the bargain for its poverty?

This bill proposed to save us in future from such danger and degradation, by placing the revenue at the disposal of the representatives of the people, at the disposal of their own officers, instead of leaving it under the control of speculating institutions, who used it in their own business. This measure was not only necessary to the efficiency of Government, but to the soundness of the banks themselves. Its tendency would be to confine the banks to their own resources. They would then do a safe business, without relying upon the uncertain contingency of receiving the public money in deposite.

It was also objected to, as calculated to withdraw the public money from the business of the country. But what right, he would ask, had the banks or the merchants to the use of the public money? They had no right whatever. Such a power had never been delegated to the Government to allow private individuals and corporations to trade on the public revenue. Yet we were constantly abused for not permitting the public money, raised from the great body of the people, to be used by bankrupt speculators and irresponsible corporations. Why it would be, in fact, levying a contribution upon the poor, for the benefit of the rich. It would be taxing the laboring classes to fill the pockets of the privileged few. It would be a most odious system of favoritism, unworthy of a free and intelligent people.

Another objection was, that the revenue would be collected in gold and silver. All that it would be necessary to say in reply to this objection was, that there was no other currency recognised by the Constitution, nor was there any other currency in which Government could meet the demands upon the Treasury. Every citizen had a right to exact the payment of his debts in specie, the only legal and constitutional currency. It was charged, also, that this measure would create one currency for the Government and another currency for the people—that the officers of Government would receive a better currency than others. But how could the office holders be benefited, when the Government paper was to be redeemable in specie? In that case, it would confer no benefit upon the office holder; and admitting, for the sake of argument, that the money did become depreciated, even his colleague [Mr. CUSHING] admitted that it could not then be admitted into the Treasury.

It was also said that the effect of this bill would be to drain the banks of their specie, and accumulate it in the vaults of the Treasury. But from a calculation made by those best able to judge, it was ascertained that the amount of specie would be so small, that it could not affect the business of the country. According to an estimate of the Treasury Department, it appeared that only five millions would be wanted. Now, if that amount were withdrawn from circulation in a single year, it would not be more than was abstracted by the operations of commerce alone. But this sum would be taken gradually, and in such a way that no inconvenience could be felt.

Mr. W. then proceeded to notice the charge, that the policy of the Administration in this respect was owing to the low prices of provisions, and the distress which prevailed in the country. In confuting that charge, he referred to a table of prices of flour during different Administrations, and contended that if high prices were any sign of merit, then the price of flour during the present Administration was a conclusive answer to the cry of the Opposition. As for the distress in the country, how could it be shown that the Administration was in any way responsible for it? If there was a stagnation of business, he contended that it was but the natural consequence of overaction and mad speculation. The States had run into debt beyond the means of payment, and that was one great cause of their embarrassment. What hand had the Administration in producing such results? Had the Administration been in any way instrumental in running up the enormous amount of State debts for internal improvement? Did it charter the swarm of State banks which deluged the country with their paper? Did it induce the banks to favor the rage of speculators? These were not the acts of the Administration, nor was it responsible for the debts of the States. It was to the State Legislatures alone that the embarrassment was to be attributed, and to them alone belonged the responsibility.

But it was said these things were done by a majority of the Administration party in each State. Such was not the case. The assertion could not be proved. A reference to the facts would show that they were done by a majority of the Opposition, with perhaps a few interested Democrats who aided them by their votes.

It was also charged that the policy of the Administration tended to degrade the laborers of this country to the level of the laboring classes of Europe. But this Administration advocated no such policy. The charge was as groundless as it was ridiculous. As for degrading the laboring classes of this enlightened country to the condition of the laborers of Europe, it was not possible for any Administration to do it, even if they could entertain so unholy a wish. Gentlemen who made this charge must keep in sight that there was a vast difference between our Government and the Governments of Europe. Under our free institutions, it would be morally impossible to reduce the laboring portion of the community to the level of the oppressed operatives in monarchical countries. Mr. W. then illustrated his position at some length, by a reference to the causes producing a reduction of the price of labor in European countries, and which could never apply to us. Before such could ever be the case, there must be a complete revolution in our form of Government, and a revolution in the condition of the people. Before the bright star of our freedom could descend in the shades of European darkness, the intelligence of the working classes, beaming forth in characters of living light, must be extinguished: and that would never be the case.

Throughout the whole of this discussion, the Opposition had taken the ground that the interests of labor were identified with the banking system. But was this assumption just and well founded? Could they adduce any proof that a paper currency was calculated to promote the interests of the laboring classes? One of the ablest writers on political economy contended that "stability" was one of the essentials of a good currency. But had the paper system any stability? Did not experience show that it was perpetually changing, and was unstable as the waters of the ocean—variable as the ebb and flow of its tides?

Mr. W. then read several extracts from the address of the late President of the United States Bank, showing the effects of a sudden expansion and contraction of paper issues, which could never exist when the currency of a country was of gold and silver, and possessed the quality of stability.

Mr. W. then drew a glowing picture of the effects of this paper system on the country, in producing the existing distress; how it had robbed the poor man of the fruits of his industry, and encouraged the rich to run into debt beyond the means of payment; and yet this was the system now so urgently contended for by the Opposition.

He then referred to a number of tables, showing the almost incredible losses sustained by the depreciation of bank paper, which loss must, from the very nature of things, continue so long as the paper system was kept up. After so doing, he then went on to show that, under a system having specie for its basis, no such loss could ever occur.

He also proved that the paper system operated unequally at the expense of the laborer. He showed, by a reference to documents, that notwithstanding all that had been said about the sympathy of the manufacturers for the poor, these manufacturers, with large capitals, ground down the poor man to the dust, and that while in a rise of prices his wages were the last to be raised, at a fall of prices his wages were the first to be reduced.

After adverting to a variety of other objections, Mr. W. proceeded to notice the argument of his colleague, [Mr. CUSHING,] in relation to the good effects of the paper system in England, as compared with other countries. He said a full and impartial examination into the condition of the working classes in those countries when that system was established, would soon enable any one to see the fruits of it.

Mr. W. then adverted at some length to the degraded condition of laboring classes in Sweden, Austria, Denmark, etc. When under a paper system, they were bought and sold with the land like beasts. He compared this with the condition of the laborer in Cuba, who, under a hard money currency, received from sixty to seventy dollars per month.

What, he asked, was the actual condition of the laboring classes in England, on which his colleague had passed so glowing a eulogium, as a beautiful specimen of the good effects of a paper system? What was the true condition of the great mass of the English? Were they not the degraded victims of toil, slavery, and low prices? Was it not notorious that the very pauper had a better living than the honest and industrious operative? Was it not well known that even condemned criminals were better fed than the virtuous working man? Yes, the Foreign Quarterly Review showed that the pauper had a greater allowance of food than the laborer, the suspected thief had more than the pauper, the convicted thief more than the suspected one, and the transported felon three times as much food than the independent laborer was able to procure by his most strenuous exertions.

By way of confirmation of these statements, Mr. W. read from a number of English writers of authority, showing the great degradation of the working classes in that country, whose labor was all swallowed up to maintain the pomp, extravagance, and splendor of the few. He also read parliamentary documents, showing the rapid and fearful increase of pauperism, and crime, as a natural consequence of such degradation.

He then argued that this lamentable state of things could not be attributed to the poverty of the country, for the amount of aggregate wealth had increased; but it was to be traced solely to the expansions and contractions of a paper system effecting the prices, and always falling upon the devoted heads of the poor.

Mr. W. here read several tables, showing the connection between expansion and pauperism. He was astonished that his colleague should have selected England as an instance of the good effects of this paper system. It was a most unfortunate selection. What was the true condition of the "happy people" of that "mighty empire?" He would not go to the starving millions in her possessions in India, but he would call attention to the suffering millions in her "own green isle." He would call attention to the extracts which he had read. He would ask gentlemen to pause and reflect upon the state of things there set forth, and then say whether they were desirous that the enlightened laborers of this country should be placed in the same situation, by the introduction of a similar system. No: he was sure there was no patriot who would for a moment entertain the idea. It was, therefore, due to the American laborer that the connection between bank and State should exist no longer. It had existed already too long, and it was high time that a connection should be dissolved, the tendency of which was to outrage the liberties of the people.

He did not mean to say that there should be no paper, and no credit, but that it should be on such a plan that would not deprive the laborer of the fruits of his toil, nor industry of its reward. He wished it regulated so that it would secure to labor the true amount of its earnings, and establish justice between the employer and the employed.

This measure would do all that. It would give us a uniform currency, create a demand for specie, and make the currency more sound and stable. It would secure to the manufacturers a specie standard of true value, and check excessive importations.

Mr. W. after showing various other benefits that would arise from the passage of the bill, said it must be evident that the President, so far from being an enemy to the laborers, as had been charged, was friendly to their interests, as his anxiety for the adoption of this measure fully proved. It was the desire of the President and his friends to establish a uniform specie standard, under which it would be impossible for such ruinous fluctuations again to occur.

The remarks of Mr. W. with the numerous tables and authorities to which he referred, will be published in full as early as convenient.

Mr. SMITH of Vermont made some remarks in relation to the contest in his district, and concluded by saying that his opponent was voted for by the Whigs generally, on the ground that he was in favor of a National Bank, and that he (Mr. S.) received the support of the Democratic party, on the ground that he was opposed to such a bank, and in favor of the Independent Treasury system. The principles of this measure, he said, were fundamental—it reached the currency—the business and industry of the country—that it would vitally affect the political and social condition of the country, so long as it shall hereafter continue in operation—that it would protect the political character and morals of the country. It would impart healthy action in the currency, by infusing into it a larger basis of specie—it would prove beneficial to the business and industry of the country, by keeping the currency stable, and preventing unnatural stimulation and overaction in trade, and by so regulating the industry of the country, as to keep labor constantly employed, in contradistinction to the ruinous fluctuations under the banking system.

Mr. S. argued that the contest was the same now between the two great contending parties that it was in the year 1800. It was a contest of the mass of the people against the moneyed few, to sustain the Constitution in all its purity, to preserve the Republican form of Government, and the just balance of power which exists between all its departments, and to secure to the present, and to perpetuate to future generations those equal rights guarantied in the Constitution, and an equal distribution of the blessings of our great political system. The people are of the impression that the opposition by the Whig party to this measure, is from something more than meets the eye. There is something masked under it. The people remember well that the contest in the Revolution was between the oppressor and the oppressed. The contest is the same now. It is one between the mass, for an equal distribution of the blessings of Government, with the moneyed power who wish exclusive privileges, such as will secure to them more power than even accumulated wealth gives them, to enable them through that power to oppress the people.

The House at the hour of half past two, took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of Vermont continued his remarks. He contended that the antagonist measure to the Independent Treasury bill was a National Bank. The Opposition are in favor of a National Bank; they are sincerely devoted to such a measure, notwithstanding they will not directly and openly avow it. He would not discuss the constitutionality of a bank; it was sufficient for him that such an institution was altogether inexpedient. It was not suitable to the character of the people, or the principles of our Republican system. It was no reason that such an institution should be established in this country, because one was suitable to the English Government and people, or any other monarchical Government, or the subjects of such a Government. The Bank of England lends all its aid to sustain the nobility. The moneyed power of all the European Governments naturally concentrate, and combine to sustain those Governments, and in consequence to the same degree to oppress the people.

He argued that in this country the Executive needed no such sustenance. Therefore, the banks and the Government should be kept separate. It would be dangerous to Republican liberty to ally the Executive to the moneyed power, by giving him the control of the whole banking system. To make such a bank as the Opposition wish to have, to control the State institutions, and to regulate the business, the exchanges, and the industry of the country, it would have to be constituted of a capital of one hundred millions of dollars. Such a bank, to regulate nine hundred State banks, with a combined capital of four hundred millions, all in active operation, allied to the Executive, would be a most potent and fearful power indeed. If such a bank be allied to the Executive, and give it all the potency it should have, and which the Whig party desire that it should have to regulate these nine hundred State banks, it would control every channel of society. If such an institution be allied to the Executive, with the power and patronage of the Government, and the time would not be in the future that the people would be able to throw off the shackles, except by a fearful and bloody revolution. The banking institutions are not satisfied to control the business and commerce of the country, but the Whig party wish to give them a control of the Government itself, by giving them charge of the fiscal operations of the Government—by depositing with such institutions the revenues of the nation, to discount with, and to speculate upon. Such a union would be fearful indeed. But he had no idea that any Administration would ever again consent that these institutions should be employed as fiscal agents. No friend to his country could consent that the Executive should be allied to the tremendous and fearful power of a National Bank, or the concentrated power of all the State banks.

Mr. S. spoke of the opinions of Washington and Jefferson against a Bank and in favor of an Indepedent Treasury; they were in favor of an Independent Treasury, the same in principle as this. He then adverted to the fact that the Opposition, who are attributing to this measure such fearful evils, were strenuous in the support of it a few years ago. He then argued that the State which he in part represented had an Indedendent Treasury in operation, with an unimportant exception in its details. He said the provisions of this bill were strictly in accordance with the Constitution; and that no system could be devised that could make the money more safe and secure. It is guarded by bonds, with heavy penalties for default. If the bill was not safe, he thought it the duty of the Opposition so to alter the details as to make it more guarded and secure. To strike out the enacting clause, was no way to perfect the bill.

He inferred by the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] that the measure would favorably affect the manufacturing interests of the East. If by any measure, the tendency of which would beneficially affect the interests of the section of country he represented, it would be an additional reason why he would be in favor of it. Mr. S. then showed the effect the unnatural expansion of the circulating medium (which the Independent Treasury will correct) had in causing overimporting, and keeping the balance of trade against the United States. If the manufacturing interests were injuriously affected by overimportation, as the convention of the manufacturers maintained, then this measure, which appreciates the currency by contracting it, will prevent this overimportation, and will, to that extent, operate as a protection to the manufactures of the North. Unless a modification of the tariff, or some such measure as this should be passed, to check these large importations, the manufacturing interests of the country would be prostrated. The labor of Europe would be employed, (as it was employed when the currency was so inflated in 1837,) to the exclusion of the labor of our own country. This measure, then, will be greatly beneficial to the laboring classes of this country, by securing to them a steady employment and regular and good prices.

Mr. S. then adverted to the efforts making by the Opposition to create the impression that the working classes would be injuriously effected by this measure. He believed sincerely that it would operate most beneficially to the whole laboring community. It would operate as a protection to the labor of this country of all kinds, to the exclusion of the product of foreign labor. He then adverted to the distress and pauperism produced in England by the banking system at the present time, and at past periods. He touched upon many other topics in the discussion, which it is impossible to give a summary of; but it will be published soon in full.

Mr. BROWN of New York obtained the floor, and spoke about three quarters of an hour in opposition to the bill, contending that it would not strengthen the banks, or improve the currency, but that it would, on the other hand, weaken the banks by draining them of specie. That it would not restrict their circulation. He advanced many objections to it, which had been refuted in the previous part of the debate.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. STANLY, on whose motion the committee rose, and then

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, June 5, 1840.

The CHAIR presented a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the sale or exchange of Government drafts for bank notes;

Also a message from the President, transmitting a report from the Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, in relation to the payment of Government creditors in depreciated currency;

Also, a report from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a copy of Captain Sanders's report on the improvement of the Falls of the Ohio river;

Which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN presented the memorial of citizens of Buchanan county, Missouri, praying for a post route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, praying that a report may be made by the Committee on Agriculture, on the comparative value of the fruits of the United States for the table, and other branches of Agriculture, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORVELL presented the memorial of 386 inhabitants of the city of Washington, praying for the renewal of the charter of said city, with certain designated amendments thereto; which, after a debate, in which Messrs. NORVELL, MERRICK, ALLEN, LUMPKIN, CLAYTON, CLAY of Alabama, SEVIER, TAPPAN, KING, and CRITTENDEN, participated, was referred to a select committee of five, to be appointed by the CHAIR.

The following Senators were appointed said committee:

Messrs. NORVELL, KING, PRENTISS, PIERCE, and CLAY of Alabama.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill for the relief of Auguste Davezac, William P. Jones, and Nathaniel Niles; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill for the relief of the heirs of Matthew Lyon, and

The bill for the relief of Benjamin Fry, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. W. from the same Committee, to which was referred

The claim of Saunders and Porter;

The claim of Joseph Wallis, and the heirs of Robert Leckie;

The claim of the heirs of Thomas Atkinson, deceased;

made adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of William R. Davis, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bills from the House reported the same to the Senate, and recommended that they do not passs.

For the relief of the administrator and heirs of John Lindsey, deceased;

For the relief of Elizabeth Case, widow of James Case, deceased;

For the relief of Conrad Widrig;

Mr. PRESTON, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the memorial of Alexander Vattemare, reported a bill in addition to acts now in force for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MERRICK moved that when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SEVIER objected, and demanded the ayes and noes; which were ordered, and the motion was carried—ayes 34, nays 8.

Mr. SEVIER then moved that the motion fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress sine die be taken up; which, after some remarks from Messrs. SEVIER, GRUNDY, WALKER, and CLAY of Kentucky, was disagreed to.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Philip Barbour, deceased, was considered as in committee of the whole, and on the question shall be engrossed, the vote was—ayes 20, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Fulton, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, White, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Wall, Williams, and Wright—20.

The VICE PRESIDENT voting in the affirmative, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill making provision for the payment of pensions to the executors or administrators of deceased pensioners in certain cases, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

The bill to establish a general system of bankruptcy was then taken up, the question being on the motion of Mr. CLAY of Kentucky to strike out the 18th section, containing the compulsory clause.

Mr. LINN said, that by the courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER) who was entitled to the floor, he was permitted to ask the attention of the Senate, for a very brief period.

Some few days since, when that portion of the bill, embracing banking corporations, was under consideration, and whilst the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) was speaking on that question, he had stepped into the room of the Committee on Private Land Claims for a few minutes, to seek for a paper connected with some business which he had to transact at one of the public offices. During his brief absence from the Senate chamber, the vote was taken, and this important portion of the 18th section was stricken out without his name appearing among the ayes and noes. He did not think proper then to ask the indulgence of the Senate, to permit his name to be recorded, nor would he do so now; although during the period he has been a member of the Senate this indulgence has been granted to one or two gentlemen. But he thought this was improper, and he would not ask it in his own case, as he believed a rigid adherence to the rule, a security to the country, and the immediate constituents of a member, for his regular attention to the important duties of his station. His immediate friends and associates could bear witness, that in private conversation he had expressed himself very strongly in favor of making banks responsible to the provisions of this bill, and that he made it almost a sine qua non, whether he would vote for any bankrupt bill that did not contain it. Had he been present when the vote was taken, he most certainly would have voted in favor of retaining the clause adverted to; and perhaps in the future course of the discussion, he would submit his reasons for so doing.

Mr. WEBSTER then addressed the Senate at length in favor of the motion of Mr. CLAY, and on the general merits of the question, and was replied to by Mr. WRIGHT, who contended that the effect of a bill containing merely the voluntary provision, would leave the creditor without remedy, and would seriously affect if not destroy the credit of our citizens in foreign countries.

After some further remarks by Messrs. WEBSTER, CLAY of Kentucky, and WRIGHT, the question was taken on triking out the 18th section, and decided in the negative—ayes 17, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Grundy, Huntington, Knight, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—25.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved that the subject be referred to a select committee.

Mr. HUBBARD moved that the further consideration of the whole subject be indefinitely postponed. In making this motion, Mr. H. said that it was not his object, nor was it his wish, to prevent any further discussion of this subject that might be desired. He was anxious to hear all that might be said. But it was his entire conviction that no bill could be matured at the present session. To a portion of the Union the subject had not engaged as yet much of the public attention, and he was unwilling that any bill should be passed until more time should be allowed for the consideration of this question in all its bearings. The bill from the committee, and the bills of other Senators, had been printed, and the subject had been debated, and he was now disposed to leave the whole matter for the consideration of the American people. In his opinion no bill could be passed at this session, and it seemed to him that the time had arrived when the Senate should, by their vote, determine whether it was prepared to adopt a bankrupt system, based upon the principles which had been sanctioned by the votes already given. The Senate has distinctly, by its vote, determined to exclude all corporations from the provisions of a bankrupt system. It had also determined, by its vote, to include the voluntary and the compulsory principle. These opinions have been so clearly expressed by the votes of the Senate, that the committee, who, it is proposed, shall now take the subject into their further consideration, will undoubtedly feel themselves bound to report back a bill embodying those principles, and providing for their improvement by such details as they may consider necessary. He therefore thought the Senate had now better determine whether it is prepared to adopt a bankrupt system, embracing exclusively the principles already settled by the action of the Senate. He might be entirely mistaken, but he was not prepared to believe that a majority of the Senate would yield its assent to such a system. With these impressions, and believing that the Senate ought to express its opinion upon the question, he had made the motion for indefinite postponement. He was well satisfied that no bill, matured upon the principles already settled, could be passed at the present session through both Houses of Congress. He thought, therefore, it would be advisable now to take the question involved in the motion he had submitted; and that is, would it be proper to pass a bankrupt bill based exclusively upon the principles as settled by the vote already taken in the Senate? He thought not.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed the hope that what had been done would not be lost, but that the bill would be referred, made as perfect as possible, and, even if it could not be now passed, be sent forth for information to the people.

Mr. CLAY spoke in favor, not of the indefinite postponement, but of taking the vote upon it now, to determine whether a majority of the Senate was in favor of a bill, in any form, on this subject.

Mr. WEBSTER spoke with great earnestness against the indefinite postponement. The Senator from New Hampshire might well vote for it, because he was opposed to the bill in every form. But Mr. W. entreated Senators who were in favor of such a bill at all, not to delay its passage to another session.

Mr. NORVELL also spoke emphatically against the postponement.

Mr. CLAY said his sole object in desiring the vote to be taken on this question now, was to see if a majority of the Senate were in favor of passing the bill in any form.

Mr. HUBBARD said that he entertained a very different opinion from that expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts. Much has been accomplished, and that much will not be lost. The bill reported by a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary has been for some weeks before the Senate. It has been most ably sustained by some of the most distinguished members of this body. Their speeches have been printed. The bill and their speeches have already attracted the attention of some portions of the country. In some of our largest commercial cities, that bill, and the views of those Senators who have embarked in the support of that measure, have excited no inconsiderable degree of attention. The memorial presented to the Senate by the Board of Trade of the city of New York, is full evidence of that fact. That bill has also been opposed by Senators, and their views will be given to the public. And can it be said that all this is for nought?—that unless the measure is now perfected, what has been done will be lost to the country? This will not be the case. The American people are by no means indifferent to this measure. The memorials upon the table of the Senate, calling for the passage of a bankrupt bill, show that the attention of one portion of the community is awakened to the importance of this measure. The remonstrances upon the table show that another portion is alarmed at the consequences of any action upon the measure at this time. By one memorial it is recommended that no bill should pass, to take effect until after the first day of January next. These things show that the public mind is not entirely prepared for any particular bankrupt system. He therefore thought the whole matter had better be postponed. And, as it respects the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Jersey, that had also been printed, and the views of that Senator had gone forth to the public. It was then idle to say that all this would be lost, if the Senate left the subject unperfected. He thought differently. Senators themselves are divided, and much divided, not only upon the constitutionality, but upon the expediency of the measure. He therefore was clearly of the opinion that the Senate should proceed no further at this session. Let what has been done go to our constituents, and in a very few months the Senate will reassemble and be fully prepared to assert and maintain the opinions of the American people upon this important question. He hoped the Senate would agree to his motion.

Mr. LUMPKIN said he should vote against the postponement; for, although he could vote for the bill in no form in which it had yet been presented, he was not prepared to say he would be against it in every form.

Mr. ALLEN and Mr. WALL also having spoken briefly against the postponement,

Mr. HUBBARD said he would withdraw his motion; but Mr. WALKER objecting, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, it could not be withdrawn.

Mr. WALKER spoke emphatically in favor of speedily passing such a bill, (including the banks, if it could be done,) and insisted that public opinion would soon render it inevitable.

Mr. HUBBARD, in reply, said, that he had signified a wish to withdraw his motion, to oblige his friends, and for the very reason that no test vote could be taken. He was utterly surprised, that the Senator from Mississippi should interpose any objection. Does he suppose that he [Mr. H.] had expressed a willingness to withdraw it, for the reason that he was unwilling, or not prepared, to meet the question? That Senator would find himself mistaken. As it respected himself, it was matter of perfect indifference to him, whether the motion was withdrawn or not: he was ready to vote upon it; and if there was not another member of the Senate voted as he should, he was content that his vote should stand alone. The Senator will recollect, that while this bill was under debate, he suggested his purpose of moving, after the debate should be closed for the day, to lay the whole matter upon the table.

He was anxious to ascertain the opinion of the Senate as to the propriety of passing a bill embracing exclusively the principles which had been sanctioned by the votes of the Senate. The Senator suggested an objection to the course proposed; and intimated that it was his purpose further to debate the subject. As soon as the Senator had intimated his wish, he gave him to understand that he (Mr. H.) would make no such motion. He did this to accommodate that Senator, and to afford him the opportunity further to debate the subject if he pleased. And when he had offered his motion to postpone, he expressly said that the motion was not made to prevent discussion; and now the Senator objects to his withdrawing the motion because he wishes to test the opinion of the Senate, when he must be satisfied, from the remarks made by different Senators, that no test vote can be given. But as it respected himself, it was of no earthly importance. He should have been willing to have withdrawn his motion, as that is objected to. He hoped the yeas and nays would be taken; and the result will show at least one vote given with great pleasure for the motion.

After some further remarks by Messrs. GRUNDY, CALHOUN, CLAY of Kentucky, and SMITH of Indiana,

Mr. PIERCE said: Mr. President, I would have no Senator suppose, after the elaborate discussion that has taken place upon this bill, that I rise to present any poor arguments of my own. Much less, sir, is it my desire to expatiate upon the sympathy I feel for the debtor, or the desire I entertain to see the creditor fairly and justly protected in rights, which have accrued under existing laws of the land. I do not, however, admit a less lively regard on my part for the true interests of both classes, than is cherished by those who are more profuse in their professions.

Sir, in this stage of the bill I rise for another purpose; it is to say to the Senator from Indiana, that neither he nor any other gentleman can prescribe to me what is to be regarded as a test question. No man shall make up for me an issue here or elsewhere without my participation. I take a practical view of things; take them as they are—as they happen to be presented at the time, when I am called upon to vote; not as by possibility they may be at a future time and on another occasion. My colleague has moved to postpone indefinitely—what? Not the whole subject of a "uniform system of bankruptcy," but, after full argument and various important amendments, the bill in its present shape. He has, so far as I have heard, expressed no opinion against such a system, sufficiently broad and suitably guarded, but he has moved to postpone this bill in its present form, and no other. Upon that question I am called upon to record my ay or no. After all that has been said upon both sides of the chamber, I would have been better pleased, if my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] had allowed my colleague to withdraw his motion, because it is perfectly apparent, that the vote will express nothing, literally nothing, relative to the ultimate fate of this bill. Perhaps I am mistaken—it may foster hopes never to be realized. It may raise the expectations of the indebted class to the pinnacle of hope to-day, to be plunged to the depths of despair to-morrow. This no Senator desires to do, and I appeal to all, whether the vote will not probably carry out to the public mind a false and delusive impression.

What have we done? We have stricken out corporations, in my judgment, the most important, if not the redeeming provision of the bill, and we have sustained the voluntary and compulsory features, and this embraces all the material principles settled—but various provisions have been erased and some sections stricken out—besides, no question has yet been taken on the amendment of the minority of the committee, as amended. Now, in this state of things, I fully appreciate and acknowledge the force of the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN.] He does not believe a bankrupt bill can be so framed in this body, as to secure his vote; but he desires to examine it in its best shape; in its perfected form, after the labor of its friends shall have been exhausted. He desires, before he votes, to see it embodied and compact, so that its provisions, whatever they may be, can be readily comprehended by his constituents and mine. I should be glad to have it thus presented, too, although I do not believe that any great change can be made by the committee—that is, no change affecting materially the principles involved—and in this conclusion I am warranted by the votes that have already been taken. Now, sir, although I could desire precisely what the Senator seeks, I am compelled to vote upon the state of facts as they exist. My colleague is not permitted to withdraw his motion. Let no man suppose that any advantage is to be gained by insisting upon this vote. I, for one, shall give it cheerfully and unflinchingly; and gentlemen on both sides who favor the measure are at liberty to regard it thus far forth as a test vote; but they must, for me, neither enlarge nor diminish the provisions already sanctioned.

I must, Mr. President, be permitted to express my surprise at the remarks of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN.] He is disposed, as I understand him, to vote against the postponement, lest his views in relation to the bill, if corporations were included, may be misapprehended or misconstrued. Sir, I have no such apprehensions. How do we stand here?

There we are, that Senator and myself, upon the record, in a minority of sixteen to twenty-eight. That record will neither be obliterated, nor wear out. The vote will stand there until the tribunal of highest appeal in this country shall either reverse or affirm the judgment of those who happen to be opposed to us. Of the character of that decision the Senator entertains not stronger convictions than myself; it may be proclaimed earlier or later, but it can neither be controlled nor indefinitely postponed. I rose, sir, merely to protest against any man making an issue for me, or saying what shall or shall not be a test vote in this chamber. My vote will be given upon a real, tangible state of facts, involving certain defined principles, and upon no supposed case.

Mr. BUCHANAN had but a few words to say. He had been, in a great degree, anticipated by the remarks of his friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE.] With that gentleman he protested against any attempt which had been made, or might be made, to present the present as a test question to him.

He did not consider the motion to postpone the present subject indefinitely, as any test question. Under what circumstances had it been made? Several weeks ago, the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary had reported a bill, confined in its provisions to cases of voluntary bankruptcy. The minority of the same committee had presented another bill, which extended to compulsory bankruptcy, and offered it as a substitute for the bill of the committee. This amendment had been discussed at great length, and amended in several important particulars; and now the friends of a bankrupt system moved to refer the original bill, together with the amendment, on the adoption of which, as a substitute for the original bill, no vote had yet been taken, to a select committee. They desired in this manner to perfect the details of the system, and to present it, in one uniform bill, to the Senate and the country. It was at this stage of the proceeding, that the motion for indefinite postponement had been made. For his own part, he believed that ordinary courtesy to the friends of the measure required that they should be permitted to amend their bill, and present it to the Senate in such a form as they preferred. He would not deprive them, by his vote, of this opportunity. After they had presented the bill to the Senate, in its matured shape, then, and not till then, would he consider the question of indefinite postponement as a test question, and such he believed had been the practice of the Senate.

But higher considerations than mere courtesy had brought him to this conclusion. He held strong opinions against any bankrupt bill, founded upon the English system. These opinions he had expressed at length, nearly twenty years ago, in the other House of Congress. Although his sympathies were strongly enlisted in favor of the suffering debtors throughout the United States, still his impressions were unfavorable to the bill. He should gladly be convinced that he had been wrong. The Senate of his own State had passed a resolution, with but a few dissenting voices, in favor of a bankrupt bill. It was not an instruction, but a strong expression of opinion. Under such circumstances, with so many meritorious individuals interested, he thought it would be both a harsh and unjust measure for him to deny to the friends of the bill the opportunity of perfecting its details. And this was more especially the case, when every person, who had studied the subject, must acknowledge that the details of any bankrupt bill essentially entered into its merits. He himself was not opposed to adopting the principle of releasing honest insolvent debtors, who had surrendered all their property to their creditors, provided such a law could be framed by Congress as would not introduce evils in practice to the community which would more than counterbalance all the good proposed to be accomplished. He was, therefore, entirely willing to recommit the subject to a select committee of its peculiar friends.

It was highly probable that no bankrupt bill would become a law at the present session. Let its friends, therefore, place the subject in its best form. Let them in this manner present a distinct issue before the people of the country. He himself would obey the voice of public opinion in his own State, expressed in the constitutional manner. Should he not be instructed, at the present session, by the authority which he felt himself bound to obey, it was his strong impression that he should, acting upon his own responsibility, vote against the measure, in any form in which it would probably be presented by the committee. Still, he was willing to give its friends every fair opportunity of offering it to the public in the form which they might deem the most perfect.

Mr. ALLEN said that the object of his former remarks had been attained. He desired that gentlemen, in giving their votes on this question, should not be placed in a false position. They had accordingly explained their views in the votes they were about to give, and this was the object he had in view when he was up before. He would himself most cheerfully vote for the indefinite postponement of the whole matter.

Mr. SEVIER and Mr. LINN expressed their views on the whole question somewhat at length, (a report of which will be given hereafter,) and the question being taken, the motion to postpone indefinitely was lost—ayes 16, noes 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, and Tappan—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—28.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the whole subject was then referred to a select committee of seven, to be selected by the CHAIR, and the following Senators were appointed said committee:

Messrs. CRITTENDEN, CLAYTON, WALKER, HUNTINGTON, WILLIAMS, NORVELL, and NICHOLAS.

On motion, the Senate then adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, June 5, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. P. J. WAGNER, on leave, submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Pensions be directed to report to this House, by what authority the payment of arrears of military pensions, granted since 4th of March last past, to pensioners and widows of the Revolutionary pensioners, under the special of 1832, '36, and '38, has been, and is withheld by the pension agents in the different States.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of Lysander Spooner, containing charges of official misconduct against John McLean, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, made a report, concluding with the following resolutions, which the committee unanimously recommend to be adopted by the House.

Resolved, That the charges exhibited against the Hon. John McLean, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, by Lysander Spooner, a citizen of Massachusetts, in his memorial presented to the House of Representatives, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary on the 25th of May last, are unfounded; and that the confidence of the House in the integrity of the said judge, is not, by reason of such charges, in any degree, changed, lessened or impaired.

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from further consideration of the said memorial.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHINN of Louisiana moved the adoption of the following resolution, offered by him a short time ago:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General communicate to this House, without delay, the time at which the postmaster at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, became a defaulter; the time, number, and amount of the various drafts which have been drawn on him, and which he has refused or neglected to pay; and particularly the amount now due by said postmaster to the Government. Also, all the communications which have been written and received in relation to said defalcations, together with all the correspondence which has occurred, touch the removal from office of said postmaster, and of the appointment of a successor to said office.

Mr. McKAY said that when, with others, he had voted against a suspension of the rules, to enable the resolution to be received, he had done so on the ground that it was worded so as to require them to admit that the postmaster was a defaulter. It assumed that he was in fault. Now he proposed to modify the resolution, so as to leave it to be ascertained whether the postmaster at Baton Rouge was a defaulter or not.

After some debate of a conversational character,

The SPEAKER said the resolution could only be received by general consent.

And the question being on its reception, objection was made, and the resolution was not received.

Mr. McKAY then moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of offering a resolution on the same subject, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to this House without delay, whether the postmaster at Baton Rouge be a defaulter or not; and if so, when he became one—whether any drafts have been drawn on him which he has refused or neglected to pay, and the time, number, and amount thereof. And also particularly, whether said postmaster be indebted to the Government or not, and the amount thereof, and all communications to or from the Department respecting said indebtedness.

Mr. JONES of Virginia wished to know whether the motion to suspend was intended to embrace the whole day, or merely the morning hour.

Mr. McKAY replied, the morning hour only.

The question being on the motion to suspend,

Mr. ANDREWS demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 161 nays 4.

So the rules were suspended, and the resolution received.

Mr. McKAY said he had been all along perfectly willing for an investigation; but he objected to the terms of the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana, inasmuch as it assumed that the postmaster was guilty. In his opinion it was wrong thus to assume that a man was a defaulter beforehand. He had also another objection, which was to the call upon the Postmaster General for the correspondence relating to the removal of a postmaster. He believed there was no instance in either House of Congress where a call had been made upon the head of an Executive Department, for correspondence in relation to the removal of an officer. It was a subject which had been very much debated in both Houses. He referred to a case which occurred some years ago in relation to the removal of a certain postmaster, and when the Senate voted distinctly in reference to this subject, and decided that they had no right to call on the Postmaster General for correspondence in relation to the removal of an officer.

Mr. McK. said he did not intend to be understood as denying that the House, in certain extreme cases, might, in the exercise of its inquisi-torial power, call upon the Postmaster General for correspondence. There could be no doubt about it. But then he was sure the gentleman from Louisiana would not pretend that this was a case of that nature. The resolution he now offered would elicit all the facts, and would prove satisfactory to all. Believing that no benefit could arise from any further debate on the subject, he would conclude by moving the previous question.

Mr. McKAY moved the previous question; which received a second, on count, by—ayes 80, noes 77.

Mr. CHINN here stated that the postmaster acknowledged that he was a defaulter, and that he had a letter in his possession in the House in proof of that fact.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS inquired of the CHAIR whether it was in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the rules were suspended? if so, he made that motion.

Mr. DROMGOOLE rose to a point or order. He contended that it was not in order to make a motion intervening the second to the previous question and the time that the CHAIR propounds the question "Shall the main question be put?"

The CHAIR cited a case this session, by which a motion was entertained intervening the second and the propounding of the question "Shall the main question be put?" The only difference between that case and the present one was, that, in the former case the previous question had not received a second; but in this instance it had. He did not consider, however, that that had made any difference. He decided that it was in order to make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. DROMGOOLE did not believe it was a correct decision, and took an appeal.

The question now being, Shall the opinion of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 78, nays 85.

So the decision of the CHAIR was reversed.

The question then recurring on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" (which, if ordered, would be on the adoption of the resolution.)

Mr. EVERETT called for the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 94, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Boyd, Brewster, Burke, Bynum, Carr, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Dana, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, Jno. Hastings, Hawkins, Hillen, Holleman, Hopkins, Howard, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Mason, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Sumpter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Crabb, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Everett, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Green, Grinnell, Hall, W. S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hunt, James, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Peck, Pope, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Thos. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—80.

So the main question having been ordered to be put, was put, and the resolution was adopted.

The morning hour having expired,

Mr. J W. JONES moved to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JAMES demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which having been ordered, were—yeas 104, nays 73.

The motion under the amended rule requiring only a majority, the rules were suspended.

Mr. KEIM asked the general consent to make a report from the Committee on the Militia; but objection was made to its reception.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky, who was entitled to the floor, argued that the bill had been in operation, notwithstanding the friends of the bill contended that it had not—that the measure had not been called for by the popular will—that it had been condemned in 1837, '38, and '39, by the representatives of the people, and by the people themselves, whenever the question was directly presented to them; that it was more expensive than the State bank deposite system, or when the Bank of the United States was the fiscal agent of the Government—that there was less responsibility to the Government in it; that it was less secure and economical than the above systems. He argued that the Independent Treasury bill would fall still born, and would be inoperative without the Treasury Note bill—that that measure would give vitality to it. He also commented on such parts of the President's message as asserted that there was a sympathy and connection between the Bank of England and the banking system of this country, and denied the position assumed in the message. He examined the question of currency in all its bearings upon the productive industry of the country, and attributed all the evils of its derangement to the past policy of the administrations of Jackson and Van Buren; and contended that there had been, as there now was, a concerted design, on the part of those Democratic Presidents and certain leading men of the Democratic party, to break down the banking system of the country. In speaking of the objects, tendency, and effects of the bank power, he said it was disgusting to argue that such power was favorable to the aristocracy, or inimical to the interests of the mass of the people. In speaking of the opinions of several statesmen, as connected with the positions he assumed in his argument against the bill, he said that Washington asserted that one of the greatest evils in a Democratic Government was that the people had to feel before they would think. They had suffered, said Mr. W. and it would be their own fault if they did not correct the present evils.

The House took its usual recess at half-past two.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. WHITE resumed his remarks, in opposition to the bill; and concluded at 7 o'clock; at which time,

Mr. RAMSEY obtained the floor; and, on his motion, the committee rose, and then

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, June 6, 1840.

Mr. KEIM, from the Committee on the Militia, to which had been referred on the 2d March, the report of the Secretary of War for the re-organization of the militia, by leave, made a report on that subject.

Mr. TRIPLETT, from the same committee, on leave, reported the views of the minority of that committee in relation to the plan for the re-organization of the militia.

On motion of Mr. KEIM, both of said reports were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed; then

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, and by general consent, 5,000 extra copies of said reports were ordered to be printed.

Mr. TILLINGHAST, from the Committee on the Library, to which had been reported the memorial of Monsieur Alexandre Vattemare of France, in relation to the establishment throughout the world, of a system of international exchanges of literary works, made a report, accompanied by a bill respecting copyrights; which was read twice, and the bill and report ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution; which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the statement made out by the Committee on Mileage, and given to the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House, be committeed to said committee, with instructions—

1st. To make out the mileage of members for the present session, in conformity to the mileage allowed and paid to members of the last Congress, and report the same to the Speaker of this House without delay.

2d. To report a bill establishing a uniform method of ascertaining and allowing the mileage of the members of future Congresses.

Mr. OSBORNE objected. Then

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer the resolution.

Mr. OSBORNE said he had no particular interest in the question of mileage; but he did not see the chairman of the Committee on Milage in his seat, who, he was informed, was prepared to make a report on the subject, which was the reason why he did object. After some further conversation, Mr. O. withdrew his objection.

Mr. CONNOR renewed it.

Mr. PETRIKIN persisted in his motion to suspend the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays upon it; which having been ordered, were—yeas 79, nays 38. No quorum having voted,

Mr. LEET said it was an important question, and moved a call of the House; which was, however, refused.

Mr. PECK inquired of the CHAIR whether the report alluded to was before the House.

The CHAIR replied that it was not, but understood it was in the hands of the the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. TURNEY inquired of the CHAIR, if the rules were suspended, whether this question would not ride over all other business?

The CHAIR replied that it would.

Mr. PETRIKIN then modified his motion so as to suspend the rules for the morning hour only.

The question was again taken on suspending the rules, by yeas and nays; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 45.

Mr. PETRIKIN, being entitled to the floor, yielded it to

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, chairman of the Committee on Mileage, who was now present—explained the state of the question before the committee—the difficulty they had to encounter to agree upon some general plan. They had agreed to a report and bill which he was ready to present to the House. He would be glad if the instructions proposed should be adopted by the House, as it would relieve that committee of much embarrassment on the points in controversy. He, however, believed that the report and bill would satisfy all present.

The bill and report were then read to the House for information. [The bill so regulates the charges as to restrict the pay to the most direct route] to take effect after the 26th Congress.

Mr. W. then spoke of the want of uniformity in charges under the existing law—that there was great inequality. He thought that, when the committee again met, it would be able to arrange all the difficulties that seemed to be presented in the matter, and that if the bill passed, there would be no difficulty hereafter, or cause of complaint.

Mr. PETRIKIN modified his resolution, by withdrawing the second instruction to the committee. He said he did not wish to consume the time of the House by debating the proposition—he did not think any argument necessary, and therefore moved the previous question.

Mr. LEET appealed to Mr. PETRIKIN to withdraw the motion for the previous question; but he refused.

Mr. STANLY then moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. REED demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 96, nays 78.

So it was laid upon the table.

Mr. BLACK asked a suspension of the rules for two hours, to enable him to offer the following resolution, and to have the same considered, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mileage be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that each and every member of this House shall furnish, upon his own responsibility, to the Sergeant-at-Arms, the distance from Washington to his residence, by the most usual route of public travel; according to which statement his mileage shall be charged, and that said statement of mileage shall be published in the journal of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee gave notice that if the rules were suspended, he would move the following as a substitute:

"That the Committee on Mileage be instructed to report a bill prescribing that the mileage allowed to members of Congress shall be computed upon the nearest mail route from their residences to the seat of Government; and that said committee be instructed to report to the Sergeant-at-Arms the mileage of the members thereof, to be computed upon the nearest mail route from their residences to the seat of Government.

Mr. JAMESON gave notice that he would propose the following as an amendment, viz:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Mileage be authorized, if satisfied of any mistake they may have made in the calculation of the mileage of any member, to correct the same.

The question being on suspending the rules, for the reception of the resolution of Mr. BLACK,

Mr. CROSS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 53, nays 94.

So the rules were not suspended.

Some conversation here took place between Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut and Mr. ALFORD, as to the power of the committee over the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked that the rules might be suspended to receive the bill and report, that the same might be printed.

Mr. REED demanded the yeas and nays on the motion; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 107, nays 48.

So the rules having been suspended,

The bill and report were received.

The bill was read the second time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee moved so to amend it that the law take effect immediately after its passage.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the bill was committed, and the bill and report were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Connecticut moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Tuesday next, and that it be made the special order for one hour on that day.

The yeas and nays having been called for, and ordered on that motion, were—yeas 89, nays 47—not being two-thirds, the motion was lost.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved to suspend the rules, so that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of Mr. MCKAY was adopted on yesterday, calling on the Postmaster General for information in relation to the alleged defalcation of the postmaster at Baton Rouge, with the view of submitting a resolution authorizing the Postmaster General to secure all the correspondence between himself and all the postmasters, and deposite the same in the fire proof vaults of the Treasury building; that such correspondence may not again be destroyed by fire.

Objections having been made,

Mr. STANLY moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer it.

The CHAIR said it was not in order, there being already one motion to suspend the rules pending.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States, viz:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith submit a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the progress made in complying with the requirements of a resolution, passed February 6, 1839, concerning the mineral lands of the United States. The documents he communicates contain much important information on the subject of these lands; and a plan for the sale of them is in a course of preparation, and will be presented as soon as completed.

M. VAN BUREN.

June 4th, 1840.

On motion of Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART of Illinois moved that five thousand extra copies be printed.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved that ten thousand additional copies be printed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected, and the motion accordingly lies over one day under the rule.

The bill on the SPEAKER's table, entitled an act concerning prisoners of the United States committed to the jail of the county of Providence, in Rhode Island, was read twice, and by special order the third time, and passed.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. RAMSEY being entitled to the floor, spoke at some length in favor of the bill, and in confuting the sophistical arguments which had been urged in support of the paper system. He took a review of those countries in which the banking system had been for ages unknown, and showed from historical facts that a fluctuating paper currency was not, as had been contended, essential to the prosperity of a nation. He had not proceeded far, when

The hour for taking the usual recess having arrived,

The committee rose, and the SPEAKER resumed the chair for the purpose of announcing that fact, when

Mr. STANLY moved to adjourn; on which motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DROMGOOLE wished, before the motion was put, to have read, for information, a resolution proposing an alteration in the daily hour of meeting to 10 o'clock, a. m.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. D. wished to submit it, but objection being made, and the motion to adjourn insisted upon,

Mr. D. inquired of the CHAIR whether, after the hour of recess had arrived, the motion to adjourn could be received.

The SPEAKER replied, it could only be received by general consent.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then said he would object to it, and insist upon the recess; which was taken accordingly.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

The SPEAKER resumed the chair, the question pending on the motion of Mr. STANLY to adjourn, and on which motion the yeas and nays had been ordered.

After some debate of a desultory character, the question was taken on the motion to adjourn, and resulted as follows: yeas 7, nays 27.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMES then moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. ADAMS and others objected, on the ground that there was no quorum present.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House, but it was not ordered.

The motion that the House go again into committee was then renewed.

Mr. ADAMS objected, as there was no House present.

The motion to adjourn was then renewed, and on being put, was again rejected—yeas 29, nays 48.

Mr. MORGAN moved a call of the House.

Mr. JAMESON, on that motion, demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 49, nays 37. So the call was ordered, and proceeded in until 95 members answered to their names.

The motion to adjourn was then renewed, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: yeas 46, nays 44. So at 5, p. m.

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, June 8, 1840.

The CHAIR presented a report from the Secretary of War, transmitting documents in relation to the proceedings for the recovery of the Peapatch island; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the memorial of the underwriters of the city of New Orleans, remonstrating against the repeal of the pilot laws of 1837; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill from the House to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports, reported the same with various amendments. The bill, as proposed to be amended, was ordered to be printed; and Mr. W. said that he was instructed by the committee to give notice that he would ask for its consideration at the earliest day it would be convenient after the bill was printed.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bills from the House,

For the relief of John Roberts; and made unfavorable reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. STRANGE, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill for the relief of John W. Faunce and Oliver Perrin, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. PIERCE, from the committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bills from the House

For the relief of Ann Bloomfield; and made unfavorable reports thereon, which were ordered to be printed.

The bill making provisions for the payment of pensions to the executors and administrators of deceased pensioners in certain cases, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Philip Barbour, deceased, was read a third time, and passed—ayes 24, noes 20.

The bill for the relief of General Duncan L. Clinch was taken up as in committee of the whole, and the question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Claims, it was agreed to—ayes 21, noes 17; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. ROANE moved that there be printed for the use of the Senate, ten thousand extra copies of the report made by the Committee on the Militia on Thursday last; which, at the suggestion of Mr. NORVELL, he modified so as to make it twenty thousand.

On this motion a long and animated debate took place, in which Messrs. ROANE, CLAY of Alabama, PRESTON, WEBSTER, KING, and WALKER, participated; when its further consideration was postponed until Wednesday.

Mr. PRESTON then moved that the letter of Mr. Poinsett, containing his projet for organizing and disciplining the militia, be printed; which, at the suggestion of Mr. WALKER, was modified by including the letter of Mr. Poinsett to the chairman of the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then proposed to amend by including the reports made by Gen. Harrison, on the same subject, while he was chairman of the Committee on the Militia, in the year 1817, 1818, and 1819.

This was opposed, as an amendment, by Messrs. WEBSTER and PRESTON, but Mr. CLAY insisting on it, and asking the yeas and nays, Mr. WEBSTER withdrew his opposition.

The amendment was then agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, adopted.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, June 8, 1840.

This being the day set apart by the rules for the reception of petitions,

Mr. J. W. JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TURNEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked leave to make a report to the House from that committee, with a view of having the same printed; but it was objected to.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and agreed to without a count.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BANKS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. RAMSEY of Pennsylvania resumed his remarks in favor of the bill. In commenting on the principle and object of the bill, he said its object was one which emphatically and expressly provided for the safety of the revenues of the Government, in contradistinction of the plan of the Whig party to commit the revenues to the State banks, or to a United States Bank, to be made use of by those institutions to speculate upon, and to increase their dividends; and thus compel the Government to run the risk of the good or bad speculations of those institutions. He argued that such a state of things would not only be wrong in principle, but would be hazardous to the best interests of the nation. The revenues, he said, were not collected from the pockets of the people, the poor as well as the rich, to carry on the trade and commerce of the country, or to be deposited with privileged institutions to be loaned out by them to their favorites, but for the exclusive use and support of the Government. He denied that this bill would affect commerce, or materially affect banking, or labor; and if it had any effect at all upon labor, it would have a beneficial effect; it would enhance, and not diminish its value, as the opponents of the bill had endeavored to make it appear, by their own assertion, and by misconstruing the remarks of some of the friends of the bill. He denied that commerce could be injuriously affected by it. That the bill may, and would, to the extent of its influence, check the gambling and ruinous contractions and expansions of the currency he did not deny; and that it might to that extent be beneficial to commerce. Mr. R. then went into a history of the cause of the present depression of the business in the country; and showed that it was attributable to the immense and sudden contraction of the currency by the banking institutions, either to aid the cause of speculation, or to accomplish some great political end. He showed by statistical tables, that these institutions had within a short time up to the present period reduced the circulation from one hundred and thirty to one hundred and six millions; and had thereby overwhelmed every interest in the nation in one common ruin. He proved that the banks were the cause of all the wild speculations in town lots, and in foreign merchandise; and adverted to the efforts making by the Whig party to throw the responsibility of all the ruin caused by these institutions, and from their swindling operations, upon the present Administration. The country had experienced depressions in business to a greater extent than at the present time, by the operations of the banks. The history of the United States presented one series of contractions and expansions of the currency and business.

In speaking of the benefits of a specie currency, Mr. R. quoted the language of Washington against paper emissions as a representative for specie, in which he pointed out the ruin that would be the inevitable consequence of such emissions, and said "that it was by the substance, and not by the shadow of things, that the people and the country were benefited." Mr. R. then went into a history of the banking operations, and the state of the currency and business, for a series of years during the existence of the Bank of the United States, and previous. He showed the effect of expansions and contraction of the currency upon his own State, in the year 1814. The country knew of no distress at the present time in comparison to that which prevailed at that time. The banks went on four years, until the people were ground into the dust by their conduct. In 1816, the Bank of the United States was rechartered to regulate and control these institutions. In consequence, additional evil was thrown upon the country to create additional distress. He read a report of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, soon after the Legislature of Pennsylvania chartered a bank of eleven millions, in which it spoke of the distress of the times as ruinous in the extreme. So universal was the complaint, that even the honest farmers felt the effect of it. The report said the distress was general—that there was a deterioration of landed property, and ruin of the manufactures and commerce of the country. Produce met ruinous reduction; real property was daily sacrificed. Property was sold so low that the fees of law officers were not realized from its sale. The like consequences were produced in 1820 and '24, when the Bank of the United States was in full operation. To show the effect of a contraction and expansion of the currency, Mr. R. adverted to the price of land in Pennsylvania at different periods. In 1809, land sold at from thirty to forty dollars per acre; and in 1815, by the expansion of the currency, it sold for one hundred dollars; but in 1819, in consequence of a contraction, the same lands sold for only twenty dollars per acre. In the county of Lancaster, in 1809, land sold for from seventy-five to one hundred, and, by an expansion, it sold in 1815 for three hundred dollars per acre. The same land, in 1819, by a contraction of the currency, sold at from sixty to seventy dollars per acre. In the county of Cumberland, where he resided, in 1809 land sold for $40 per acre, and in 1815 it sold for $200; and in three years afterwards the same land sold for but $25 per acre. What was the consequence? Almost every man in every county failed and was sold out. The speculators reaped a harvest on the misery and ruin of the honest farmer and land holder. But that was a part of the system of the banks to fluctuate prices for the benefit of the actual money holder and speculator. Mr. R. did not think that the Independed Treasury bill could regulate all these things to the extent it could be wished; but so far as it goes to regulate, he would go for and sustain it. It would restrain the excessive issue of banks to a certain extent, and hold them in check, and thus cause something like a regular standard of value. The merchant, after the plan shall be fully in operation, instead of importing on the credit of the Government, will have to pay cash duties, and thus prevent the agents of British manufacturers in this country, who overimported, from doing so to the injury of the honest American importer and manufacturer. Mr. R. then showed the deleterious effect the banking operation has on the laborer, by deranging the relative proportions between the price of labor and the product of labor; and how far the Independent Treasury bill would benefit the laboring man, by keeping the price of his labor uniform, and by securing to him regular employment. He examined the question in all its different aspects. A full report will be given hereafter.

Mr. STRONG said that before he proceeded to make any remarks on the general merits of the bill, he would advert to the resolutions passed by the Legislature of his State, (New York,) on the subject. He, and the party to which he belonged, conceded the right of instruction to the fullest extent, and held that when a representative could not conscientiously obey his instructions, it was his duty to resign. But such instructions should always be definite, and not leave any thing to be implied. Mr. S. then went on to show that the resolutions in question were neither in the form of instructions, advice, or request, and yet they possessed something of each. They did not profess to instruct any one, and yet they intimated that if any Senator or Representative from that State supported the bill, his conduct would meet with the most unqualified disapprobation, etc. After commenting upon other points in the resolution, Mr. S. said he had been elected by his constituents with express reference to this bill, and instructed to vote for it; and he should do so in spite of the threats thus thrown out. He denied the authority of the Legislature to call him to account for his official conduct, as he was responsible to his constituents, and them alone.

Mr. S. then went into a general defence of the bill, showing that the cry of "one currency for the Government and another for the people," and a great many other similar objections, were as unfounded as they were ridiculous.

Mr. MARCHAND then took the floor and said,

None will deny that the management of the fiscal concerns is one of the most important branches of a Government; it gives the impulse which carries on each department in the performance of its proper duties. According to the desires that actuate mankind with regard to the acquisition of wealth; if you check that source, the various departments of Government will cease; Executive action will be stilled; Legislatures will cease to legislate; the Judiciary will no longer be heard in pronouncing judgment between man and man; navies will rot, and armies be disbanded. Such, sir, are the important results that depend upon a faithful administration of that branch of Government. Surely, then, it becomes a paramount duty in the rulers to consign that vital portion of a nation's welfare into faithful and honest hands; to see that the public revenue be placed in such safe depository that it may at all times be had when called upon, in the mode prescribed by the Constitution of the country. Suppose we were now organizing our Government, and all its departments had been completed, except so far as relates to the administration of its fiscal concerns—would the idea be entertained for a moment that that remaining branch should be entrusted to individuals unknown to the Constitution—to men who are strangers to the people for whose benefit that Government is formed—to men whom they had nought to do in designating as their agents—and men, too, who are as wholly irresponsible to the people, for whose benefit they hold the fund, as are the winds that whistle around them? The only true mode of retaining faithful officers, is by holding them to a strict accountability. This is a principle none will deny as being not only beneficial, but absolutely necessary to the welfare of a free people. Yet such is the measure advocated by the opponents to this bill. The principle of strict accountability must be abandoned, and the revenues of the Government thrown into the hands of stockholders in banking institutions—of men irresponsible, uncontrolled, unpunishable. I say, it is the measure advocated by the opponents to this bill. Although none, or but few of them, have in so many words thus far in this debate proposed the retaining of banks as the depositories of Government money—yet all their arguments lean in favor of such a measure, and from those arguments I deduce the conclusion that their affections have a strong tendency to that quarter. I am strengthened in this opinion when I recollect a resolution at an early period of the present session in favor of the establishment of a National Bank, with a capital of seventy millions of dollars, to aid the Government in its fiscal concerns, offered by a distinguished Representative from Kentucky [Mr. POPE.] Since the time the President of the United States recommended to Congress the enactment of a law providing for the more secure keeping of the public moneys, and until the time of the Harrisburg Convention, when General Harrison became a candidate for the Presidency, either a National Bank or a league of State banks, was the measure proposed as the only one by which public moneys could be effectually secured. Previous to the nomination it was the burden of the strain that fell from the lips of the Opposition orators at all their public meetings; the presses, ranked as opponents of this bill, descanted most eloquently on the beauties of the banking system, as being the safest depositories of the Government revenue. As soon, however, as that nomination was made, and the fiat of party went forth "that there should be no declaration of principles to meet the public eye," "a change came o'er the spirit of their dream"—the orator's strains were stilled, and the press no longer touched the forbidden subject. All was hushed, as though the beings who conceived the ideas had ceased to exist. A strange spectacle since then has been presented to the people of this Union—that of a party arrayed in hostility against an Administration, avowing the most determined hatred against its leading measure—without, at the same time, as has been invariably practised by political parties, proclaiming one single principle upon which they rest the justice of the cause they advocate—they fling no banner abroad to the breeze, by which they may be recognised. Let a stranger come among us, and ask what is the great question about which the people of the United States are disputing. For answer—place in his hands a Democratic journal, and he will at once say, the bill now under consideration is the Treasury they advocate. Place in his hands an Opposition journal, and he will be as like to arrive at the conclusion, that the Treasury they are in favor of is "a log cabin," with "hard cider and coon skins," as any thing else. This same "mysterious silence" yet hangs over them. They never yet have disavowed their preference for banking institutions—it was the last word they uttered on the subject. Am I, then, not fairly justified in taking them at their word?

The Government having given the banks a fair trial as depositories of the revenue, they proved themselves unworthy the trust, by twice suspending specie payments, in times of peace to our country, and general prosperity to our citizens, except those who, by a great avidity to acquire much wealth in a little time, went beyond their depth, and by improvident speculations brought ruin upon themselves and all who were intimately connected with them in business. That trial having, as the friends of this bill believe, proved a failure—and that position being denied by the Opposition, I shall confine myself to reasons why I believe the Administration is fully justified in abandoning banks, as the fiscal agents of the Government.

We have derived our notions of government pretty much from England. It is from that country we have taken the example of issuing charters of incorporation—indeed, many charters, now in force in the United States, were granted from the British Crown previous to the American Revolution. If I was a member of the British Parliament, and a question should arise whether to pass an act of incorporation or not, its object and provisions would have to be odious indeed, if I would vote in the negative—but, standing on the floor of the American Congress, its provisions and object must be good indeed, if I would vote in favor of it. In England the Crown is the source of all power—and every charter of incorporation, granted in that country, takes away so much power from the Crown, where too much is already lodged, and confers it upon as many individuals as the corporation is composed of—thus forming little bands better able to resist aggressions on the part of the Crown. In the United States the people is the source of all power. Every grant of a charter of incorporation in this country, takes away from the people to that extent the powers they retained to themselves by the Constitution. And just as far as the charter confers privileges, so far are the corporators elevated above the rest of their fellow-citizens.

The danger is not small that is to be apprehended even from those institutions, which are not, like the banks, possessed of money, the great lever which sways the human passions to and fro with the most irresistible impulse. Instances are not wanting in history of corporations having been used as an engine by monarchs to resist aggressions on the part of some aspiring subject. So potent became his vassals under the operations of the feudal system, that Lewis the Gross of France, as a means of counteracting that potency, and restraining their overweening insolence was compelled to form the inhabitants of towns into bodies politic, to be governed by a magistracy of their own nomination. So effectual was the curb to the increasing power of the nobility, that the same practice was adopted in Germany, Spain, England, and other feudal kingdoms; hence, too, arose the origin of incorporating cities and towns: you will not understand me that those charters were at that early period willingly granted; it was not done until it became absolutely necessary to answer some great political end. Monarchs have been, in all ages (since the custom had its origin) jealous of introducing corporate privileges into their systems of Government. One instance occurred about 1,700 years ago, in the origin of Trajan, one of the Roman emperors; it is so very characteristic of our modern corporations that I shall give you the correspondence which took place between him and the younger Pliny, who was the Governor of the province in which Nicomedia was situated.

Letter of Pliny to Trajan.

"While I was making a progress in a different part of the province, a most destructive fire broke out at Nicomedea, which not only consumed several private houses, but also two public buildings; the town-house and the temple of Isis, though they stood on contrary sides of the street. The occasion of its spreading, was partly owing to the violence of the wind, and partly to the indolence of the people, who, it appears, stood fixed and idle spectators of this terrible calamity. The truth is, the city was not furnished with either engines, buckets, or any single instrument proper to extinguish fires; which I now, however, have given directions to be provided. You will consider, sir, whether it may not be advisable to form a company of firemen, consisting only of one hundred and fifty members. I will take care none but those of that business shall be admitted into it; and that the privileges granted them shall not be extended to any other purpose. As this corporate body will be restricted to so small a number of members, it will be easy to keep them under proper regulation."

Trajan to Pliny.

"You are of opinion it would be proper to establish a company of firemen in Nicomedia, agreeably to what has been practised in several other cities. But it is to be remembered that societies of this sort have greatly disturbed the peace of the province in general, and of those cities in particular. Whatever name we give them, and for whatever purpose they may be instituted, they will not fail to form themselves into factious assemblies, however short their meetings may be. It will therefore be safer to provide such machines as are of service in extinguishing fires, enjoining the owners of houses to assist in preventing the mischief from spreading; and, if it should be necessary, to call in the aid of the populace."

Such was the opinion entertained by the monarch of Rome, the then mistress of the world; he was unwilling to confer corporate powers on one hundred and fifty men to put out fires; he well knew from past experience, that such a society was the hotbed from which much mischief would spring. If then, sir, emperors, who commanded mighty armies, kings who claimed to rule in divine right, were afraid to encourage such institutions, may not the citizens of our free Republic be permitted to entertain some jealousy lest it should take away from that liberty which was left them by their fathers with the solemn injunction that it should be transmitted untrammelled to their posterity? Surely, sir, they will be permitted to protest against their rulers doing an act which will so greatly enhance the powers of corporations to work mischief, as will the project of permitting them to use the immense revenues of the United States, and placing it under their control.

I will now advert to a point which has gone as far towards sustaining banking institutions as almost any other action in relation to them. I allude to the decisions that have been made in the courts of justice, that the act creating private corporations (in which banking institutions are included) cannot be repealed; that as soon as the act has passed through the Legislature in the forms prescribed by the Constitution—that moment it is beyond the reach of the law, above legislative control, and this, too, whether its operations be for weal or for woe; whether beneficial or prejudicial to the community in which it is located.

The judges of the United States courts in deciding questions relative to corporations when they were not controlled by the Constitution and laws of the United States, or the Constitution and laws of the State where the case arose, had resort to the common law decisions made on the same points. Disputed questions in such cases having arisen not many years after the adoption of our Constitution, the judges had recourse to the cases adjudicated in England, upon which precedents they based their decisions. Now, sir, take up the English books of reports from whence those precedents were derived; trace back the cases, the one before the other, and you will find the common law on that subject to have been moulded in the earlier periods of English history when the people first commenced their struggles to be released from the iron grasp with which they were held by the Crown. The wise and good judges in that country knew how important an acquisition it was to the liberties of the citizen—they knew the importance of maintaining strictly to the corporators, the privileges granted them—they, too, were well aware, that so much power of mischief in the Crown was neutralized, and accordingly established the common law as far as it is in force in this country. From this early and peculiar period, arose the notion of the inviolability of a charter, which has been ingrafted on that clause in our Constitution, which prevents States from passing any law "impairing the obligation of contracts," and has now sprung into a flourishing branch, overshadowing the length and breadth of our land; and almost as baleful in its effects upon our fair institutions as is Java's poisonous Upas tree to vegetation within its influence. The judges of England then, and up till the reign of William III, held their offices during royal pleasure, and not, as now, so long as they behaved themselves well. They then would not have dared to have given as the reason of their decision, that it was to restrain the power of the Crown. They well knew, the moment they would have pronounced the words, the tenure of their offices would have ceased, and their persons have been visited with other tokens of royal displeasure. Such are the inferences I have drawn, on that subject, from the judicial history of England. I like it not that courts of justice in this country should base their judgments on English common law principles, in cases where the charters emanate from a source so entirely different from ours. That decisions made in one country with an eye to confer liberty on the people, should be held as a precedent in cases in another country, where that same decision would take their liberty from them, is to me rather inconsistent with the usual course of reasoning. I know that uniformity of decision in the administration of justice, is much to be desired in every well regulated Government, as being the land mark by which the property and the rights of the citizen are known. A judge is sworn to maintain and expound the old law, and has no more right to abandon a good precedent than a juror has to cut loose from law and evidence, and find as his passions or his prejudices may direct him. A legislator is not bound by precedents in his actions, and much less need he regard them when it is is known that, up to 1835, there was one thousand overruled or revoked decisions in the American and English books of reports.

The idea of banking institutions being beyond the control of legislation, is contrary to the spirit of improvement now going on in the science of Government. We have no right to do any act, or pass any law, that posterity will, willing or unwilling, be bound to maintain. To my mind it is a preposterous idea that we, for a valuable consideration now paid us, may pass a law that will operate most injuriously, be in full force some seventy years hence, and, under the pretence that it is a sacred charter, a vested right, our innocent posterity shall be bound to undergo its inflictions. It is not justice. Had the notion always prevailed that the acts of the ancestor were binding on the descendants, this country might now be a British province, and ourselves deriving our notions of Government from the monkish superstitions of the middle ages.

If a number of individuals were to assemble together and do certain acts which by express provision in the Constitution is directed to be performed by Congress, would it not be regarded as a treasonable assemblage? Would not the whole land rise up in arms and overthrow the usurpers? It is a power near akin to this that banking institutions take upon themselves, and the proposition of leaving the public money in the vaults of banks is aiding this species of unconstitutional legislation; is throwing the very sinews of Government under the control of bank directors. The Constitution having given to Congress the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof," the inference is reasonable that that body, and that alone, should have the control of the circulating medium. The history of the world proves that mankind is governed by money. When the Government money is in banks, it is under the control of the directors; these persons with such privileges conferred upon them by legislative enactments as place them beyond punishment and responsibility, legislate upon the whole currency of the country. At one period the land is flooded with a vast amount of notes; in a little time after, those notes are called into bank, causing the prices of houses, of lands, and of merchandise, to rise and fall with the alternate expansions and contractions thus brought about by the uncontrolled decree of twelve bank directors. Is not this legislating in the fullest sense of the word —swaying with the most unbounded freedom the whole currency, public and private, of more than sixteen millions of people—the prices of all the property in this wide spread Republic at the mercy of twelve bank directors? Is not this power? We all know the mature consideration that is given by each branch of the Government concerned in legislation, to any measure ere it is permitted to find a place on our statute book. If a law should be passed causing as frequent and excessive expansions and contractions as have these corporate despotisms, banks, although it would have received the sanction of three different branches of the Government, each branch representing every soul in the Union, and each, branch too, either mediately or immediately, chosen by the people themselves—if such a law should be passed, the actors in the scene would, through the medium of the ballot boxes, be hurled from their seats, and followed by the deep, biter, lasting execrations of an outraged community. Are we right in entrusting the public money with banks; thus tacitly giving our sanction to this illegitimate species of legislation; thus infusing the strengthening power into a moneyed despotism, to harass and oppress the people? If such institutions be not a moneyed aristocracy, and that, too, in the fullest sense of the word "exercising an absolute power over a national currency," it is impossible for human ingenuity to imagine what is one. Whilst the banks thus usurp to themselves one of the attributes of sovereignty, (for such I hold the regulation of currency to be,) the very exercise of that power clogs the action of the Government in the performance of its constitutional duties. I allude to that clause which gives to Congress the power "to lay and collect taxes." Banks, by increasing or decreasing the amount of paper circulation, would render it impossible, if it should become necessary for the Government to make a correct estimate of the amount of money that may be wanted; say for equipping an army, increasing the navy, or the erection of light-houses and fortifications. The estimates may be made at a period when the paper money is in circulation in profusion; this apparent prosperity may induce the Government to lay taxes to a large amount, to meet the proposed expenditure. In the mean time, the banks may think they have been too liberal in their discounts of paper—may think a speculation could be made on cotton, tobacco, and grain, for the benefit of the stockholders, by contracting when they purchase, and expanding when they sell. From these, or any other reasons that may influence the bank directors, a great scarcity of the circulating medium will be produced, and much distress inflicted on the people. Where, then, is the money to be got by the poor citizen, to enable him to pay his quota of taxes, assessed upon him in times of profusion? Or suppose the amount of assessment was paid into the Treasury, and the expenditure was made when the paper money was contracted in its circulation? The effect would be, the whole amount of the estimate would not be required, and a surplus revenue would be left in the public Treasury, the bare idea of which inspires the opponents of this bill with a kind of holy horror, unless that surplus be placed in the bankers' hands. Change the circumstances. Suppose the estimates to have been made, and the money paid into the Treasury of the United States, when there was a contraction of the currency, and you will find its effects equally as prejudicial. The estimates are made in a period of contraction; but before the work is commenced, the paper circulation is increased by the banks. By this process, the value of the amount in the Treasury is lowered, and the Government cannot perform what it could have done, had the currency remained stationary.

Stockholders in banking institutions derive a profit of from three to five per cent. more than could an individual on the same amount of capital, without subjecting himself to the punishment of usury in those States where such statutes are in force. This per cent. is distributed among bankers after the payment of their banking houses, their officers, and all contingent expenses. The friends of banks will tell you, the aid they are furnishing the community, in the transaction of its business, will more than counterbalance the advantages they derive from such investments. These honeyed words are but the guides that have led us into the bankers' snares. They sound sweetly to the ear, and lull us into a dangerous lethargy. We should suppose their capital was an investment profitable enough, without adding unto them another source from whence their usury would be so much increased, as in the use of the revenues of the United States Government.

A report was made by the Secretary of the Treasury in February, 1839, to Congress, in which is to be found a beautiful illustration of the perfection to which the science of banking has arrived, in profiting the banker, and injuring the community. It is an aggregate of investments supposed to yield income to banks above the amount of capital paid in, viz:

1834	-	-	-	-	158,906,467
1835	-	-	-	-	241,409,708
1836	-	-	-	-	276,238,804
1837	-	-	-	-	244,123,541

The above exhibits the amounts of investments upon which the banks have been receiving interest for five years, without having one dollar more at risk than the expense of manufacturing their paper, because in this statement is not included investments equal to, and which go to balance the capital paid in. Take, for instance, the year 1836, and the amount of interest at 6 per cent. for that year alone, would be $16,574,328, and you have an idea of the rich crops that are reaped by the bankers, without any seed having been sown. That comparatively small amount of capital is the weak base upon which this immense banking superstructure is erected; and shall we be mad enough to put forth our hands, and assist in increasing the dimensions of this edifice of Machiavelian conception, hatched in the prolific brain of a John Law, or some of his descendants, that will, unless a timely check be placed upon it, crumble, fall, and crush us in its ruins?

In the last ten years the average loans and discounts in banking institutions in the United States have been annually $370,000,000. The average annual circulation, during the same period, has been $105,254,894. When we consider the various rates of interest allowed in the different States of the Union, the stocks, real estate, and other investments, from which the banks derive interest, the gain on exchange, the destruction of notes whilst in the hands of individuals, their brokerage on the sale of stocks—I say when we consider all these facts, it would not be an unfair estimate to say the banks receive about eight per cent. of interest on their discounts, and six per cent. on their circulation. Take that per cent. as the ratio and you will find the banking institutions in the United States have, from 1830 till 1840, derived a GROSS PROFIT from the people of this country of $359,152,630. During the same period the gross revenue of the General Government from lands and customs only amounted to $285,000,000. Thus the people of the United States are more heavily burdened by the banks than they are for the support of their army, their navy, their civil and diplomatic expenses, in short, the whole payments made by Government to any quarter whatever. If Congress was in ten years to lay a direct tax of three hundred and fifty millions of dollars, although the power is expressly conferred on them in the Constitution "to lay and collect taxes," the whole people would arise in one mass in open rebellion, and drive them, as oppressors, from these halls of legislation; yet bankers levy this tax off the people with impunity. Their operations in its collection are concealed, and, like the vampyre bats, they fan their victims with their wings whilst they suck away the life's blood.

We are told this bill confers too much patronage on the Executive. Why, sir, that patronage should not be mentioned in the same daylight with what is wielded by the banks—a league of nine hundred corporate despotisms, with a capital over four hundred million of dollars, with their army of debtors and dependants, arrayed against the Administration, with a hostility as bitter as that of the young Hannibal, when, at the altar, he swore eternal hatred against the Romans. When these things are considered, it requires no great penetrative mind to tell who wields the greatest patronage. We have been placed here as guardians of the public interests, and must examine the question in all its bearings, and choose what we sincerely believe to be the correct course. Suppose we should be so unfortunate as to be cursed with a corrupt Executive, filled with inordinate desires for power; and the banks continue to be the fiscal agents of the Government. The one branch thirsting for power, the other for wealth, would, for the attainment of their objects, leaugue together in a crusade against the liberties of the people. It would be very questionable if moral and physical force enough would be left to burst the chains that would be thrown around us.

There are about sixteen millions of souls in the United States who are equally interested in the public money, and are equally entitled to any benefits that may accrue from its use; then why are bankers entitled to the profits of that money to the exclusion of the rest of the people of this country? Is it now to be left in the custody of a few fortunate individuals who hold stock in banks, to reap its rich profits. The expenses of its keeping are far more than balanced by the interest it yields, and if such places must be the depositories, let the profits and loss be divided among all. I put it to gentlemen to say if this be not more equal legislation.

From whence come the bankers profits? One thing is certain; they will not be contented with gains as visionary as the greater portion of the capital in which they deal; it must be something more substantial; the genuine profits arise from the products of the farmer and the mechanic. It is labor which constitutes the true source of wealth to a country; every bushel of grain, every pound of cotton and tobacco raised in this country; every article manufactured here out of domestic materials, is adding so much to our national wealth, because we send not its equivalent abroad. It is fair, honest, unbought advantage to our country. It is from labor, then, the bankers' profit is raised. It is labor which, in the shape of interest, flows into the capitalists' hands. It is the earning of the industrious man they receive. It is permitting the bankers to descend like reapers upon the rich harvest, watered by the sweat of a hard working people. And what meritorious act do the bankers perform in turn for these benefits? "Calm as a summer's morn," with folded arms, they sit at ease. The claim of a war worn veteran of the Revolution to a pension, must be fully proved before Congress will allow its payment. The banker receives his pension without proof of his services, with no other act than producing a purse sufficiently long, (no matter whether that purse be his neighbor's or his own,) to enable him one day to pay the required amount of stock into bank, and probably the next draw it out in the shape of a loan. This is a pension paid to a privileged class, it is a pension paid to idleness in the strictest sense of the word. When, as I have shown you, this pension, this fund thus earned, and thus distributed, has amounted in the last ten years to the enormous sum of three hundred and fifty-nine millions of dollars, what man is there, I ask, that is compelled to look to his own honest labor for support, who will resist the reformation of a system that leads to such incredible inequality and injustice?

The struggle going on in the United States between the people and the banks, is of a cast similar to that which was carried on in England between the Government and ecclesiastical corporations. A great portion of the learning of the day was, in the earlier periods of that country, confined to the clergy. This gave them an unbounded influence around the throne, at the same time working upon the minds of the people, who were accustomed to look up to them for advice, in temporal as well as spiritual affairs; they induced many, during their lives, to convey, and many by will to devise, their property to monastaries and other religious houses. The amount of property accumulated by these religious corporations was so vast, that they became injurious, if not dangerous, to the Government; so much so, as to humble some of the British monarchs, and obtain an absolute control over others. In the reign of Henry III. the struggle commenced to be released from these overgrown corporations. As fast as the English Parliament passed one statute prohibiting individuals giving their property to such institutions, by ingenious construction the statute would be evaded. Statute after statute was passed, and statute after statute was rendered nugatory—the desire to hold property sharpened the ingenuity, by which expedients were devised to evade the acts of Parliament; and in this, as Sir Edward Coke observed, "were to be commended, that they ever had, of their counsel, the best learned men that they could get."

How far the banking institutions of the United States have profited by the example in retaining the most eminent counsel in their suits, the courts of justice will tell. This struggle continued for centuries, before the Government succeeded in placing an effectual curb on religious corporations, with regard to the accumulation of property. Now, sir, if ecclesiastical corporations were able to contend for so great a length of time against the great power wielded by the British crown, and against a series of statutes, enacted by a body that holds itself "to be omnipotent"—each statute, too, being a deadly spear inflicted in the body of the corporations it was aimed at, what kind of astruggle are we to expect with corporate despotisms, whose whose soul is money—whose power is money—whose influence is money? Will we be justified by our constituents in adding to this power, by pouring the public money into their hands? No; they will tell us the Government is cherishing a viper in its bosom, that will some day sting it home.

There is now in the United States banking capital of a fraction over four hundred millions of dollars. This amount lays comparatively dead; what I mean by the expression is, that its benefits are confined to the bankers and the few who are favored by them; it is not so universally diffused, that the laboring classes, able to give good and sufficient security, can at all times have such access to it by loan as he could, if that amount of capital was in the hands of individuals. I look upon this great capital as being in the precise situation of the property formerly held by the religious corporations of England, France, and Spain. It may be alleged this capital is in circulation in loans to the trading community—true it is, and so were the monastic estates leased to tenants; still they were considered by their Governments as dead capital; they were not as well farmed as if they had been owned by individuals. It was considered the leading measure of the administration of Henry VIII, when he broke up those estates, so great was the benefit that resulted to England by that measure. France imitated the example, and some authors contended that the rescue of the property from the clergy, more than counterbalanced the evils resulting from her sanguinary revolutionary struggle. Spain is now experiencing the benefis of a similar policy. I wish not to be understood as advocating a confiscation of banking capital. I urge these examples to show the necessity we are under in the United States to restrict this great and growing power.

It is urged that this bill entrusts too large an amount of money to the hands of individuals, that they may appropriate it to their own use. The thirst for wealth has led many an unfortunate being astray, who otherwise would have been an upright citizen. I would ask, however, if the revenue was in bank vaults, would it not still be under the control of individuals possessed of like passions and feelings; ay, under the control of men, who, however gross and flagitious may be their conduct in their corporate capacity, are not personally responsible to the laws? If an individual is entrusted with any public money, and embezzles part of it, you may sue out your process from the courts of justice; you may levy, and sell his goods, and so enforce payment to the extent of his uttermost farthing; nor is this all the remedy you have left. This bill brands him a felon, and consigns him to a felon's punishment. Let the banks be the depositories of the public funds, and refuse to pay any portion out; and where is your remedy? You may sue them, and obtain a judgment; here your remedy ends; the cashier will turn the key of the vault, and your redress is gone. Even should you be assured the very same money, dollar for dollar, was in the vault that was deposited there as revenue; yet you cannot touch it by reason of the bulwarks thrown around these corporate despotisms by the laws of the land. An individual may be compelled to pay; a corporation cannot. It is true individuals may abscond with the public money; and may not bank officers carry off its funds and the deposites of Government? Have we never heard of such an event happenpening as a president, a cashier, an agent of a banking institution, fleeing with its funds to Canada, to Texas, or Europe, as fast as an unfortunate Israelite in olden time, with blood upon his head, escaping to his city of refuge.

One of the evils resulting from Government making use of the banks as depositories of the public money, is, that for the purposes of gain, the bankers issue more of their notes in proportion to the amount of their specie, than they would have done, had they not been the fiscal agents of the Government—depending on those funds, the banks issue paper to an amount which, if resting on their own resources, would not only bring ruin on themselves, but all connected with them in business. If the Government, in some sudden emergency, finds it necessary to make an appropriation of the whole amount of its revenues in the vaults, after a considerable sum had been for some time accumulated there, a drain of the vaults would be the inevitable consequence, and instead of there being a due proportion of specie to the notes in circulation, there will be such an excess of paper afloat, that the bank must break, or, to use the bankers' modern phrase, must suspend specie payments. This is not a mere fancy sketch—unfortunately for the people of the United States, the position has been practically illustrated. When the act of Congress was passed in July, 1836, directing a distribution of the surplus revenue in the banks to the different States by instalments, one was paid in the fall of that year; another was paid in the spring following, and that very same spring the banks suspended specie payments. Whilst speaking on this point, I would advert to the charges so frequently made, both here and elsewhere, against the Administration, as the cause of the Treasury now being empty. Was the Treasury not full until this distribution of the twenty-eight millions of dollars took place? None will deny it. That, and the extension given by Congress of the time for the payment of the bonds given by the New York merchants, for duties to the amount of five millions of dollars, was the cause of our exhausted Treasury. Did not the same party, which now makes this as a charge against the Administration, vote for the enactment of the laws that caused this state of things? And where were louder complaints raised about an empty Treasury than in the city of New York, where resided the men who were the most benefitted by the measure? Can men with propriety charge an Administration with improper management, when they themselves are so deeply steeped in the same offence?

The last suspension of specie payments was brought about by the United States Bank of Pennsylvania—it was the first to propose the measure, and the first that set the example. The State banks, although backed by the revenues of the Government, were unable to resist its power, and followed the example. If we profit by past experience, we cannot permit them to remain as the depositories of the public money. It is neither safe nor honorable in our Government to permit the revenues to be in the custody of a league of banks, that are at the mercy of a corporate power of the same species, created by a State Government. The use of banks that must retain or pay the public money, at the nod of a corporation brought into existence by only one out of this great confederacy of States, is virtually placing the Government funds under the control of any one of our leagued Commonwealths that may see proper to charter a bank with an unusually large capital. The reason of State banks running into such excesses, is said to be the want of a National Bank to restrain them in their issues. I cannot see the good that would result from that measure. If the Legislatures of States are unable to restrain the creatures of their own creation, how can a National Bank do it for them? Should a National Bank be created for this purpose, the question would follow, what power would control it? for Congress could exercise no more restraint over a National Bank, than States could over theirs.

Many petitions have been presented at the present session of Congress, praying that the duties upon imported articles should be increased so as to afford a protection to the productions of this country. I will exhibit a few statistical tables which go far to prove that the great source of relief lies in another quarter—that the different Commonwealths in the Union have a corrective power in their own hands—that petitions to the Legislatures of their States to place the banking institutions under proper restrictions, and remonstrating against their authorities negotiating their public loans from banks, will go as far in checking an excessive imdortation of manufactured articles as will any legislating on the part of Congress as modifying the tariff laws.

The statistics I shall exhibit in proof of my position, to my mind conclusively proves the injury inflicted on the country by raising money from the banks in the shape of loans on bonds and stocks, given on the credit of the States. These bonds are plainly to be traced in their effects, from the time they swell the investments of banks in "stocks and other securities," until the day they are returned to the United States in foreign goods.

For five years previous to 1835 the aggregate amount of State loans was $40,002,769, being an average of $8,000,554 to each year. From 1835 to 1838 (say 3½ years) they increased to the amount of $108,223,808, being an annual average $30,921,088.

For the purpose of showing that the greater portion of the above State loans were taken by the banks, I will show by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that just in proportion as the loans increased by the States, so was the increase of investments made by banks in "stocks and other securities," in which are included the State loans—there being no specific return of that item of investment, viz:

In 1833	- - - -	$7,836,742
1834	- - - -	13,852,803
1835	- - - -	21,684,545
1836	- - - -	22,830,742
1837	- - - -	58,102,721

The next inquiry that suggests itself is what kind of currency did the banks give the States when they accepted their bonds and certificates of loan. Was it in gold and silver? The paper money put into circulation immediately after the loans were taken, clearly demonstrate that the advancement to the States for their bonds, was composed of a paper currency, and that, too, of the worst kind. You will observe in what regular proportion the amounts of paper circulation increased with the investments of banks in "stocks," viz:

1834	- - -	103,692,495
1835	- - -	140,301,038

1836	-	-	-	149,185,890
1837	-	-		116,138,910

showing an increase from 1834 to 1836 of paper issues to the amount of near forty-six millions of dollars; and what was the consequence? In 1837 a suspension of specie payments ensued, leaving a fraction wanting of one hundred and fifty millions of bank paper in the hands of the people. An inflated, irredeemable paper currency flooded over the country is the first evil that results from the States borrowing money from the banks. We have now traced the State bonds into the banks—what then becomes of them, is the next point to be ascertained. It is generally known that those bonds are transferred to Europe, and sold in that country. I will, however, refer you to the words of an American agent in London for the sale of stocks, when he appealed to the British capitalists to purchase these bonds: "The capital borrowed by the United States," says he, "is transferred by bills from the banker to the merchant, and is taken to America, not in bullion, BUT IN BRITISH GOODS; every investment made, while it adds to the income of the capitalist (that is the British capitalist) swells the profits of the British manufacturer." The declaration of this agent—the amount of importations of goods and specie during the periods these loans were taken by the banks—to which I shall presently refer, and the history of the times, all show that the State loans have been transferred to Europe, and, by the means of bills of exchange to the importing merchants, returned into the United States in goods and manufactured articles. I will refer to the importations during this period, which, in my mind, fully establishes the position I have assumed, when taken in connection with the tables I have already exhibited. I shall first exhibit the nett amount of specie imported into the United States after deducting the exports, viz:

In 1833	-	-	-	$4,458,667
1834	-	-	-	15,834,875
1835	-	-	-	6,653,672
1836	-	-	-	9,076,545
1837	-	-	-	4,530,165
1838	-	-	-	14,233,550

When you compare the specie imports with the loans made by States, you will perceive at a single glance, how intimate is the connection between them—how hand in hand they progress in the work of mischief to the community. In 1834, when the States only took loans to the amount of $8,000,554, the nett import of specie into the country was $15,834,875. In 1837, when the States took loans to the amount of $30,921,088, the net imports of specie was only $4,530,165. The loans having increased nearly one-fourth, whilst the nett import of specie decreased in nearly the same ratio until 1838, when it increased, by reason of the high premium paid for it during the suspension of specie payments. You will, by examination, observe the same proportional increase exists between the State loans and the value of imports retained in the United States for consumption, viz:

1834	-	-	-	103,208,521
1835	-	-	-	129,391,247
1836	-	-	-	168,233,675
1837	-	-	-	119,134,255
1838	-	-	-	101,264,804

Each year, as the loans taken by the States increased, so also was the increase of importation of foreign goods, running side by side until 1837, when there was a decrease of importations, caused by the suspension of specie payments, which rendered the importers more cautious, and prevented the sales of bills of exchange. The feature of this importation that operates most injuriously, is cotton manufactures, woollens, and iron. Articles that are produced and manufactured in this country, by this process of banking, are brought into our markets to the injury of our industrious mechanics and enterprising manufacturers. The value of those items are:

1834	-	-	-	26,059,067
1835	-	-	-	34,356,994
1836	-	-	-	43,527,265
1837	-	-	-	26,513,937
1838	-	-	-	20,985,364

The foregoing statistical tables exhibit this state of facts. The States borrow the paper issues of the banks, and, in return, give bonds, for which the faith of the States is pledged. These bonds are transferred to Europe by the banks, and sold to the capitalists of that country. The proceeds of that sale are returned into the United States in foreign goods on bills of exchange drawn in favor of the importing merchants. The evils are threefold that result from States taking loans from banks; and these loans being disposed of in the manner I have described. 1st. The country is flooded with an unsafe paper currency. 2d. It furnishes the facilities by which articles of foreign manufacture are imported into this country, to the injury of our working community. And, 3d. The State bonds are left in the hands of European bankers, and the interest must annually be paid them in gold and silver—furnishing a channel by which the precious metals will be continually drained from the United States. Such are my premises. Am I not correct in my conclusion—that interference on the part of State Legislatures in correcting the abuses of the banking system—and no longer taking State loans from those institutions, will go as far in protecting our own industry as will any action in Congress in modifying the tariff duties.

The greatest evils inflicted on our community result from an excessive importation of goods and speculations in public lands. To no other cause can those evils be so justly attributed as to the banking institutions. The capital on which the goods are imported and speculations are based, is furnished by the banks. As that capital is increased in loans, so increases the amount of sales of land and of imports; the total of duties on imports and prices of lands increasing in the same proportion. This money, when the whole bill goes into operation, must be paid into the United States Treasury in gold and silver. The specie clause in this bill will operate as a check upon banks, circulating more than a safe proportion of notes to the amount of specie in their vaults; if they at any time, by an increase of facilities, cause a readier sale of lands, or an increased importation of goods, just to the extent of that increase will the receipts exceed the expenditures, and that surplus, by the requirements of this law, as I before observed, will have to lay in the Treasury in gold and silver. The effects of this excess will soon make itself perceptible to the banks in the withdrawal of specie from their vaults. They will be compelled, in self-preservation, to suspend their profuse loans of money, and by this means cut off the source from whence this superabundance of gold and silver is accumulated in the Treasury. This bill, in that respect, will operate as some check upon banks flooding the country with their notes—it will assist in protecting the settler upon the public lands from the machinations of the heartless speculator—it will, in partially preventing the excessive importations of foreign goods, throw a stronger defence around the industrious mechanic and the enterprising manufacturer. Here I would answer the objection urged against the bill, that it will withdraw a large amount of specie from circulation. This amount will only be the excess of receipts over the expenditures. Unless the banks themselves, by an undue expansion, bring about a contrary state of things, the receipts and expenses of Government will be probably about the same after 1842, when the duties on imports will be at the lowest rates.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] has compared the Government to "a bruised and broken patient," and recommended the calling in of "Doctor Harrison." A few words in answer, and I shall have done. The principles on which this Administration base their public acts, are precisely the same that have actuated every Administration save two, from the days of Washington down to the present time. Point me, if you can, to a nation, ancient or modern, that has hastened with such unparalleled speed to prosperity as has the United States. Her citizens are happy at home; her name is respected abroad; her commerce is spread over the world; her sails whiten every sea. Such are the results of the course now pursued by the Administration. Say, then, would it not be folly—madness in the extreme, for us to abandon these well tried principles, and resort to "Dr. Harrison" and the Utopian schemes of our adversaries?

The hour having arrived, the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess, the House went again into Committee of the Whole, and

Mr. MARCHAND resumed and concluded his remarks, which will appear as early as convenient.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then took the floor, and proceeded to speak of the bill in it financial and political character, and its character as a currency. He commenced with an attempt to prove that a National Bank would be the safer and more economical mode of disbursing the public money, and that the creation of such an institution by Congress would be constitutional. He also argued, that Congress had the power to control the State banks as depositories, by issuing attachments against them on the same principles as against individuals, if they should prove in default to the Government.

Without concluding, at 25 minutes before seven o'clock, he gave way to a motion that the committee rise.

The motion prevailed; the committee rose; and

Mr. EVANS moved an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were asked and ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 38, nays 44.

So the House refused to adjourn; but no quorum voted.

Mr. DROMGOOLE put an inquiry to the CHAIR, the object of which was understood to be, whether less than a quorum could change the hour of meeting to 10 o'clock.

The SPEAKER answered in the negative.

Mr. UNDERWOOD proposed that, by general consent, the House should go back into committee.

Objection was made.

Mr. MONROE moved a call of the House.

Mr. ADAMS asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. STANLY moved an adjournment.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 56, nays 38.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 9, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Treasury Department, in relation to the report of Mr. Owen, on the Geology and Mineralogy of the Territory of Iowa; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the Navy Department, transmitting the report of the board of officers, appointed to witness an exhibition of Mighill Nutting's patent cylinder firearms; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PHELPS submitted a resolution for changing the hour of meeting of the Senate from 11 to 12 o'clock.

Mr. SEVIER would merely state, that, for his part, he would make no further opposition, if the Senate would propose to meet at 2 or 3 o'clock. From all appearances, the session would not be terminated until some time in the fall, and it was of little consequence what was their hour of meeting.

Mr. LUMPKIN of Georgia said he hoped that the resolution would not be considered without a quorum of the Senate being present. There was obviously no quorum now present. If the Senate thought proper to change the hour, he would no longer attempt to resist the will of that majority, who had, from time to time, resisted his efforts to bring the present session of Congress to a close at some reasonable day. He had upon this subject discharged his duty. He felt that it was useless to make further efforts here. He would hereafter look to the people to correct the evils of unnecessarily extended sessions of Congress. When he left here, he should feel himself at liberty to give the people the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in regard to the actings and doings of Congress.

The resolution was then laid over until to-morrow.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred a bill from the House, granting a pension to Benjamin Mitchell, made an unfavorable report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bills from the House,

For the relief of James Deatley; and

For the relief of David Mellen;

made adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

The bill for the relief of Gen. Duncan L. Clinch was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, to whom had been referred the bill to authorize registers and receivers to administer oaths required to be taken by purchasers of public land, which had been amended by the House, so as to make it a duty, reported in favor of concurring, which was agreed to, and the bill finally passed.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and for other purposes, which had been amended in the House, by striking out a clause conferring certain discretionary powers on the Secretary of the Treasury, reported in favor of concurring in the amendment; which, after some remarks in opposition, by Messrs. SMITH of Indiana and YOUNG of Illinois, and by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, WALKER, ROBINSON, and PRENTISS, was concurred in—yeas 24, nays 6; and the bill was finally passed.

Mr. MERRICK gave notice that to-morrow he would ask the Senate to take up the bill to incorporate the banks of the District of Columbia.

CLAIM OF FULTON'S HEIRS.

The report of the Committee on Claims adverse to the claim of Robert Fulton's beirs being taken up,

Mr. HUBBARD said, if the Senate were now ready to take a vote on the report of the committee, he had no wish to consume the time of the body at this late period of the session in further discussion, and would submit the case on the arguments contained in the report of the committee, and the reply of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] to that report. If, however, it was intended to discuss this matter further, he felt it his duty to submit some remarks in reply to the Senator's objections to the report.

Mr. PHELPS having intimated his wish to make some remarks on the subject,

Mr. HUBBARD addressed the Senate at great length in opposition to the claim, taking up each item in detail, and investigating its merits, and concluded by stating his belief that instead of being a debtor, the Government was the creditor of the estate of Mr. Fulton.

Mr. PHELPS then intimating his wish to make some remarks in reply, moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The bill for the relief of Dennis Quinlivan;

The bill to regulate enlistments into the navy and army, and

The bill authorizing the States to tax any lands within their limits sold by the United States; were considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of Charles A. Dodd was taken up, and after being debated by Messrs. WILLIAMS, YOUNG, LINN, KING, and SEVIER, a motion was made for its indefinite postponement; pending which,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, June 9, 1840.

The SPEAKER announced that the business first in order, was the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] to recommit to the Committee on Commerce the bill reported from that committee by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HILLEN,] proposing the repeal of the law of the law of 1837, regulating pilots.

Mr. PICKENS asked and obtained the general consent of the House to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the joint resolution of the Senate, authorizing the President of the United States to accept certain presents from the Imaum of Muscat, and the Emperor of Morrocco, and to authorize the sale of the same. Mr. P. asked that it might be acted on immediately, as there could be no objection to it; and it would have to be passed before the end of this month. The amendment reported by the committee provides, that instead of the proceeds from the sale of these animals being received into the public Treasury, it should be divided equally among the different charitable institutions in the District of Columbia, for the support of the orphans.

Mr. STANLY said, if the proceeds were not intended to be placed in the public Treasury, he wished one demijohn of the rose water to be sent to the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina.

Mr. PETRIKIN did not see any reason why the charitable institutions in the District of Columbia, to the exclusion of other charitable institutions, should be benefited by this distribution of the proceeds. He was opposed to it.

Mr. PICKENS said this was certainly a small matter, and hoped there would be no objection to the passage of the resolution, without delay. The committee thought it the least objectionable way to dispose of the proceeds.

Mr. PETRIKIN did not know of any greater charity than to give the money to the public Treasury. They ought to be just before generous. The Government had not enough money to pay its debts; he hoped, therefore, the money would not be disposed of except in the manner provided in the resolution as it passed the Senate.

Mr. PICKENS said that in relation to the objections of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it was a matter of small importance as to the manner in which the proceeds from the sale of these lions, jackasses, etc. should be divided. The committee had supposed that the most reasonable mode of disposing the money would be to divide it among the charitable institutions of the District; and to prevent any difficulty, they had designated a particular class, viz: the institutions for the benefit of orphans.

Besides, he did not feel disposed to burden the Treasury with more animals than were now attached to it.

It was also to be considered, that some gentlemen were strict constructionists, and would object to any money going into the Treasury that was not derived from taxation. So, to avoid any objection of this kind, he did not recommend the jackasses to be fastened upon the Treasury, but proposed that the money arising from their sale should be divided among the orphan institutions of the District. To this he hoped there would be no objection.

Mr. PETRIKIN said the gentleman from South Carolina appeared disposed to turn his objection into ridicule, and had talked about the money from the sale of jackasses not going into the Treasury. But would the gentleman let the demands of the poor men who were dependent on the Treasury remain unsatisfied, because the money to pay them arose from the sale of jackassess? Would the gentleman let the poor man want food from such scruples? But did not the money which led to these presents come out of the Treasury? How were the splendid embassy and the armed vessels that went to that country paid for, but out of the Treasury? It was not for the benefit of the community at large, but for the benefit of a few pampered individuals to the prejudice of the community. The money for all these things came out of the Treasury, and whether it was returned in the shape of jackasses or any thing else, let the money go into the Treasury again.

Mr. CRABB thought the objection of the gentleman from South Carolina of no weight. If the animals were to be sold, he was perfectly willing for that portion of the money which arose from the jackasses should go into the Treasury. He thought that would be the best way of disposing of the money. As for the lions, those nobler animals, he was not willing that the proceeds of them should go into the Treasury.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said this was not a question as to whether the money arising from the sale of jackasses could go into the Treasury or not. The proper question before the House was on the amendment of the committee; and, believing that no benefit could arise from the discussion, he would move the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The question being first on concurring in the amendment of the committee to the resolution, it was read as follows:

"Strike out the words, 'and cause the proceeds thereof to be placed in the Treasury of the United States;' and insert, 'and cause the proceeds thereof to be distributed equally amongst the different charitable institutions for the support of orphans in the District of Columbia: Provided, nevertheless, That the sword tendered from the Imaum of Muscat be deposited in the State Department."

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 97, nays 65. So the amendment was concurred in.

The question recurring on ordering the bill and amendment to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. COOPER of Georgia moved to lay the bill on the table, and asked the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the CHAIR whether there was an example since the formation of the Government, in which the President was authorized to accept presents.

The CHAIR was understood to reply, that there was an instance, not very remote, in which lions and other animals were received and authorized by resolution to be disposed of in a similar way as proposed in the amendment of the Committee of Foreign Affairs to the joint resolution.

Mr. ADAMS wished to know if that was authorized by a resolution of the House.

The CHAIR said he would examine.

Mr. ADAMS said he wished the House would allow a little discussion on this joint resolution. It was an entire new thing, and a very dangerous thing.

Mr. A. was here called to order on the ground that the motion to lay on the table had not been withdrawn.

Mr. COOPER did not wish to have the time of the House consumed, and withdrew his motion.

Mr. ADAMS resumed. He hoped the House would well consider this resolution before its passage. He believed it was an example entirely new. He did not know of any authority which ever gave to the President of the United States, or any other officer, the power to accept presents from any foreign country. If the President of the United States can accept presents, and then either House of Congress can dispose of those presents, by giving them to charitable institutions, why to-morrow they might pass another law, authorizing the President to accept and keep, and turn to his own use, presents from any foreign power. For one, he wished to take his stand, and say that the President of the United States should receive no presents from any foreign power, or that any disposition should be made of them at all. If they were disposed to make any grant to charitable institutions, let them do it from their own property, and not from these presents from foreign countries. There was something in the very acceptance of these presents by the President of the United States that—

Mr. A. was here called to order by several members, on the ground that the previous question had been ordered.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia having misunderstood the manner in which the question stood before the House, renewed the motion to lay the joint resolution on the table; and asked the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered.

Mr. PICKENS requested the Clerk to read that portion of the Constitution which permits presents to be received, by authority of Congress. It was read accordingly, as follows:

"No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign potentate."

Mr. ADAMS did not intend to say that Congress had not the power to authorize the reception of presents. He contended that the power never had been exercised, and should not be exercised now.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table, and it was decided in the negative by yeas 55, nays 110.

Mr. HOFFMAN asked whether it would be in order to move to recommit.

The CHAIR said it could be done only by general consent.

Mr. DROMGOOLE made a few remarks, which were inaudible.

Mr. PICKENS objected to the recommitment. There was not the slightest reason in the opposition. The objection to the power in Congress to authorize the President to receive, was imaginary. The Constitution was express.

Mr. ADAMS said that twice, in the course of our history, had Congress been asked to authorize the acceptance of presents from foreign powers, and twice had it been refused.

Mr. PICKENS said, with the understanding that the resolution should be acted on in the morning, he would withdraw the objection; and,

On motion of Mr. HOFFMAN, the resolution was recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. TURNEY asked the general consent of the House to make a report from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

Mr. TURNEY moved to suspend the rules; which the House refused.

Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL, by general consent, presented the petitions of the heirs and legal representatives of Lieutenant Colonel Henry Dixon, of the North Carolina line: referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Executive, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith submit a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to certain lands falling within the Chickasaw cession, which have been sold at Chocchuma and Columbus, in Mississippi; and invite the attention of Congress to the subject of further legislation in relation to them.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, June 6th, 1840.

On motion of Mr. REYNOLDS, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, containing the information called for by the House on the 5th instant, in relation to withholding the payment of certain pensions; which was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE, his colleague, Mr. TALIAFERRO, who was called away from the city, was granted leave of absence for two days.

Mr. CUSHING, remarking that the reports of committees had now been obstructed for a fortnight, moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of receiving them.

The ayes were 75, the noes 53; so, there not being two-thirds in the affirmative, the rule was not suspended.

The hour having expired,

Mr. JONES of Virginia called for the orders of the day.

Mr. HOLMES made an ineffectual effort to present a memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston; and

Mr. STEWART of Illinois made an ineffectual effort to have his motion to print five thousand additional copies of the report on the mineral lands considered.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the rules were suspended and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD resumed his remarks in opposition to the bill, and in favor of a National Bank as an antagonist measure to the above. In speaking of the relative powers and effects of the two modes above suggested on the currency, he contended that a National Bank would so control the currency as to drive the State issues out of circulation and substitute a better currency; but that the Independent Treasury, [though it authorizes the receipt of a proportion of specie paying State bank paper in the payment of dues,] would drive the State paper out of circulation and substitute nothing—it would operate to diminish the circulating medium and appreciate the value of money, and would to that degree lessen the price of all things—labor as well as the product of labor [including the necessaries of life.] He said he told his constituents that they must have a National Bank or break up the State banks before they could have a well regulated currency. The bill before the committee would prove to be an insufficient regulator.

Mr. LUCAS obtained the floor and spoke a few minutes in favor of the bill, and then

The House took the usual recess at 2½ o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. LUCAS resumed, and spoke at some length, and examined the merits of the bill, as compared with that of a National Bank, or the deposite system. He then showed that the present measure was in strict accordance with the spirit of the Constitution, and asked why then it had been so bitterly denounced. The Opposition themselves had admitted that the United States Bank had failed to perform what it promised; then what other alternative was there but a measure like this. The Constitution recognised no other currency than silver and gold, and a system based upon that was the only one which could answer. So far as human laws could protect, or human ingenuity suggest, this measure, taking all the chances in peace or war, would be found infinitely more safe than an irresponsible banking corporation, which would use the money for its own benefit.

Mr. L. then went on to show that the idea of a paper system for the revenue never entered the minds of the framers of the Consitution, and that those who contended to the contrary, must be laboring under an hallucination of mind, as there was not the slightest evidence to support it.

He then gave a detailed history of the Bank of England and the United States Bank, with a view of showing that they were both affected by similar causes, and would from matters of interest co-operate together. After showing how admirable the present United States Bank had served as a "regulator" by being the first to suspend, Mr. L. drew a strong picture of the consequences that would arise from the union of a National Bank and the Bank of England. He showed how easily, in case of a war, the Government might be crippled by the influence of the Bank of England, acting conjointly with our National Bank, and causing it to suspend. The two banks, would, from self-interest, become in fact one and the same institution. Then what patriot was there, who would not shudder at the idea of the jeopardy in which his country would be placed, by the charter of a National Bank as a fiscal agent? The whole revenues of this country would be at the mercy of foreigners, who, by their interest in the Bank, would cripple the Government when they pleased.

Mr. MARVIN then took the floor in opposition to the bill, and continued his remarks until seven o'clock, when he gave way to a motion that the committee rise.

The committee then rose, and

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair, the the chairman reported progress on the bill.

Mr. EVANS moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOPKINS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr EVANS then withdrew his motion.

Mr. MORGAN moved a call of the House; but the yeas and nays having been ordered, he withdrew the motion.

Mr. DROMGOOLE renewed the motion, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. EVANS again moved that the House adjourn; and the yeas and nays having been ordered on that motion, were—yeas 29, nays 54.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, whether there should be a call, and was determined in the negative—yeas 38, nays 51.

On motion of Mr. BANKS, a call having been refused,

The House, at half-past 7 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, June 10, 1840.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial of citizens of New York, on the subject of the bankrupt law, remonstrating against including in the law any provision making the assent of creditors necessary to the discharge of the bankrupt; which was referred to the select committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SOUTHARD presented the memorial of a number of persons engaged in the manufacture of hats, praying that a duty may be imposed on foreign hats imported into this country; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. S. also presented the memorial of the pastor and elders of the First Presbiterian congregation of Elizabethtown, New Jersey; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of Ephraim D. Dickson, made a favorable report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of the widow of Lewis Grant Davidson, made a favorable report thereon.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ROANE, on Monday last, to print 20,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia, being taken up—

Mr. PRESTON addressed the Senate at much length in opposition to the resolution, and the plan of the Secretary of War.

Mr. ANDERSON in reply defended the report of the committee and urged the propriety of printing the extra number.

Mr. CRITTENDEN having obtained the floor, yielded it to

Mr. NORVELL, at whose suggestion the further consideration of the subject was postponed until Friday next.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The bill for the relief of David McNair;

The bill for the relief of John Richey;

The bill to grant other lands to the inhabitants of townships deprived of the 16th section by Indian reservations;

The bill to autohrize the Secretary of the Treasury to use chemical or any other oil in the light-houses, and to make the necessary alterations for that purpose;

The bill for the relief of Francis Laventure, Ebenezer Childs, and Linus Thompson; were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill making appropriations to complete certain military roads in the State of Arkansas was taken up as in committee of the whole, and after being explained and advocated by Messrs. FULTON, SEVIER, and LINN, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of James H. Ralston;

The bill for the relief of Alfred Westfall;

The bill for the relief of Jacob Hanks, and

The bill for the relief of Samuel Ferguson; were considered as in committee of the whole, and their further consideration indefinitely postponed, (rejected.)

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, June 11, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order was the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] to recommit to the Committee on Commerce, the bill reported from that committee by the gentleman from Maryland

[Mr. HILLEN] to repeal the law of 1837 regulating pilots.

Mr. CURTIS, who was still entitled to floor, resumed his remarks in opposition to the bill and in favor of the motion to recommit. He commenced by reading various affidavits, showing the inefficiency of those pilots prior to the passage of the law of 1837. He showed that a combination existed, the effect of which was that the pilots failed to discharge their duty—they became negligent and inefficient. There was no inducement for them to do their duty, because there was no competition. Crying evils, which he enumerated, existed previous to the passage of the law of 1837. The effect of the repeal of this law will be a recurrence of those evils.

Before this law was passed, the New York pilots could not be induced to go out of the sight of land; but if at all, it was in mild weather; but now, in consequence of the competition between them and the New Jersey pilots, they could be found at from one to two hundred miles at sea. He read a report of the Chamber of Commerce, showing that there was sufficient employment for all the pilots, those of New Jersey as well as those of New York. He also read remonstrances from underwriters, insurance offices, and the Chamber of Commerce, and thirty-five officers of the United States navy, against the repeal of the law. The law of 1837, he said, the constitutionality of which would be an act of supererogation to argue, operated equally and justly on all the pilots, as well those of New York as New Jersey. He commented on the report, and denied many of the positions assumed therein as fallacious. The only reason, he argued, that the New York pilots had petitioned for the repeal of the law, was, because the competition of the Jersey pilots had compelled them to go to sea. They wish the law repealed to give them a clear field for monopoly, notwithstanding there was business for the whole of them. Mr. C. argued that Congress could not escape from the enactment of proper laws upon this subject. The Constitution expressly provides, that the privileges of all the ports shall be equal; but if this law was repealed, such would not be the case. It was one of great benefit—it preserves life, and protects property—the safety of both of which required that the law should not be repealed. If it was repealed, as he before said, they would have a recurrence of all the evils under the old law. He appealed to the House to divest itself of party—and to look at the question as one not of party, but of business of the utmost importance to the whole commercial community.

Mr. HILLEN wished to say a few words in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from New York. That was rendered necessary from the position in which he was placed; and he would, in the first place, remark that it was not a position of his own seeking. When this subject was first referred to the committee, he objected to taking this matter into his own charge, as the chairman of the committee requested he should. He would have preferred that it should be assigned to some other gentleman, but as the chairman urged him to take charge of it, he did so, not wishing to appear reluctant to perform his share of the labors of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS here made some explanations, which were inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. HILLEN resumed, and said that the gentleman had admitted all he required, viz: that his business was not of his own seeking, but as it was in a manner forced upon him, he did not object. In undertaking that charge, he was perfectly well aware that difficulties would arise, in case his views did not meet those of the New York delegation, the interest of whose State it was to have the law remain as it was. He was aware that the continuance of the law would be urged by the whole delegation of that State.

But he had thoroughly examined and ascertained all the facts of the case, and the gentleman from New York must excuse him, if he followed his own judgment in preference to the opinion of the gentleman, which he would show was founded on mere assertion and declamation.

There was another matter which he would explain before proceeding farther. He denied that he was in favor of a combination or monopoly. Such were not his principles, or the principles of the party with whom he acted. In the course of his remarks, he would satisfactorily prove that no such combination existed. There was no monopoly, any more than what was granted by the law of Congress. The law of New York expressly forbade any combination. He would prove all this, he hoped, to the satisfaction of all, after which he trusted that neither the gentleman from New York, nor any of his colleagues, would longer oppose a repeal of the law.

The morning hour having expired, Mr. HILLEN suspended his remarks.

Mr. STANLY, on leave, presented a resolution directing the CLERK to have the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee on the Militia, in relation to the reorganization of the militia, printed together; which was agreed to.

Mr. TURNEY, by general consent, presented a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, discharging that committee from the further consideration of the memorial of William Smith, and referring the same to the Secretary of War for adjustment; which was agreed to, and the report ordered to be printed.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. MARVIN resumed his remarks in opposition to the bill; in doing which, he referred to the present state of the currency, and compared the relative advantages and disadvantages of a specie and a paper currency, contending that the former was a more economical one than the latter. He did not think a specie circulation at all desirable if it could be produced by this bill or any other measure. He contended that sufficient specie could not be procured for that purpose, if the United States had a proper proportion of all the specie in the world; that it was more expensive, and less portable than a paper currency. He then spoke of the effect of the fluctuations in the currency; arguing that it was a fraud upon the people, for the Government, by this bill or any other measure, to depreciate or appreciate the currency; that it operated unjustly on the debtor and creditor. It was the duty of the National Government, he said, to furnish the people with a sound circulating medium; it was one of the principal objects for which the National Government was created. The Constitution expressly gives the power to Congress to regulate the commerce of the nation; and to regulate which, it required a currency of uniform value. Currency was an instrument and agent of commerce; therefore he argued, that if the power to regulate the currency was not positive, it was incidental to, and inseparable from, the power to regulate commerce, and was involved in that grant of power. It never could, he said, be regulated by the twenty-six sovereign States, because there would always exist a competition between them, which would have the most banking capital and largest circulation. He considered it as much a violation of the Constitution in the National Government to neglect to exercise the powers conferred upon it by that instrument, as to commit an act palpably and directly in violation of it. The sin of omission was as great as the sin of commission. The Administration, then, by inference, violates the Constitution, by refusing to regulate the currency. He did not think that the State Bank deposite system had a fair trial. He believed that they might yet be employed as safe fiscal agents of the Government. He attributed the expansion of the currency which caused the banks to fail, to the acts of the Administration. He urged many objections against the bill, and said that it might be so administered as to make it a bank of deposite and issue—as to make a hard money currency or a specie currency for the people—and would to that extent be a fearful engine in the hands of the Executive.

Mr. PARRISH obtained the floor, but before he proceeded in his remarks, the House took the usual recess at 2½ o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. PARRISH said he considered it his duty to make a few remarks in relation to the bill. He wished to give his views, not, however, with the expectation of influencing the feelings of any gentleman, but as a duty which he conceived he owed to his constituents, to present before them a brief outline of the bill. Besides, he considered it the duty of the friends of the bill, to keep it in detail before the public view, as it only needed examination to be approved. The great prejudice which existed in many parts of the country against this measure, was solely attributable to its not being fully understood. The measure had been attacked and represented as fraught with every evil, when, at the same time, its enemies took great care that it should not speak for itself.

It was under these circumstances, and with a view of having it fully understood, that he had taken the floor, with a design of presenting to his constituents and the country, a detailed explanation of the bill.

Mr. P. then took up the bill, and commented upon each section thereof, showing that its provisions were entirely simple, so that a child might comprehend them. One of the principal questions involved was, whether the revenue of the Government should be given to favorite corporations for their own benefit and use, or whether it should be kept in the hands of the Government itself, through officers chosen by the people. Whether the taxes from fifteen millions of people, should be given over to the banks, and the many taxed for the benefit of the few, or the intention of the Constitution carried out, by leaving the Government the sole director of its own funds.

Mr. P. proceeded to examine the antagonistical measure of the Opposition, viz: a National Bank, and gave some very choice specimens of the "happy" effect the United States Bank had produced upon the country. He showed how far their great "Regulator" had answered the purposes for which it was said to have been intended, viz: by being the first to strike its colors instead of preventing the other banks from suspending. He next showed that from like causes would ensue like effects, and in case the scheme of the Opposition should prevail, the very same scenes would be again enacted, and at intervals the whole country prostrated by the ruinous expansions.

After replying to a great many ridiculous objections to the bill, Mr. P. proceeded to show that nothing need be feared by any abstraction of specie from the circulation of the country. He called attention to the fact that, although Government would receive specie, yet it would also pay out specie to all its creditors in every department. It was objected, however, that such would be of no benefit to the people at large, inasmuch as the Government creditors would always sell their specie, and pay those dependent on them in paper. Mr. P. admitted that, for a short time, such might possibly be the case, in some few instances; but when it came to be generally understood that these contractors and others received specie from Government, specie, and nothing else, would be received from them.

It being now seven o'clock, Mr. P. gave way to a motion that the committee rise; and Mr. DAVIS of Pennsylvania moved that the House adjourn; on which motion the yeas and nays being ordered, were—yeas 65, nays 57.

The House accordingly, at half past 7 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 11, 1840.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, on the subject of a bankrupt law. The memorial concludes with the following remark: "The chamber begs leave respectfully to express its opinion that a bankrupt law, to be extensively useful or permanently beneficial, should be both compulsory and voluntary. That as a compulsory act, it should apply to traders only, and as a voluntary act, it should require the sanction of a majority of creditors in interest to release the applicant, with liberal provisions, giving discretionary power to the judge, on application of the commissioners, and on a statement of facts in cases of hardship or oppression. That no debt of any kind whatever should be preferred, and that the operation of any law that may be passed during the present session of Congress, should be deferred until after the 1st of July, 1841." The memorial was referred to the Select Committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUGGLES presented resolutions of a meeting of citizens of Frankfort, Maine, on the subject of the defences of the Northeastern frontiers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the memorial of John F. Sarchett, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which was referred a memorial from citizens of New York remonstrating against the passage of the bill for the better security of the revenue of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill supplemental to an act entitled an act for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred House bills entitled

An act for the relief of Erastus Pierson;

An act for the relief of Thomas Bennett;

An act for the relief of James Francher; and

An act for the relief of Philip Hartman;

Reported the same severally without amendment.

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bills

For the relief of Wealthy Barker, and

For the relief of Stephen Olney,

Made adverse reports thereon, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred House bill for the relief of the heirs of Dennis Smith, reported the same with amendments.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill for the relief of Mary Hunter, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred House bill for the relief of Matthew Wiley, made an adverse report thereon.

The following resolutions submitted yesterday by Mr. WEBSTER, were considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the rates of postage charged on letters transmitted by the mail of the United States ought to be reduced.

Resolved, That it is expedient to inquire into the utility of so altering the present regulations of the Post Office Department as to connect the use of stamps or stamped covers with a large reduction of the rates of postage.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. PHELPS, to change the hour of meeting from 11 o'clock to 12 o'clock, was taken up, and after some remarks in favor of it by Mr. PHELPS, and in opposition by Mr. KING, it was disagreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill for the relief of Dennis Quinlivan;

The bill for the relief of David McNair;

The bill for the relief of John Richey;

The bill to grant other lands to the inhabitants of townships deprived of the 16th section by Indian reservations;

The bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use chemical or any other oil in the lighthouses, and to make the necessary alterations for that purpose;

The bill for the relief of Francis Laventure, Ebenezer Childs, and Linus Thompson; and

The bill making appropriations to complete certain military roads in the State of Arkansas; were severally read a third time and passed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Eckford, deceased;

The bill for the relief of Reynell R. Coates, Walter R. Jones, and William B. McMurtrie;

The bill for the relief of Charles L. Fleischmann;

The bill for the organization of a company of sappers, miners, and pontoneers; and were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to explain and amend the 5th section of the act passed the 3d day of June, 1834, for the better organization of the United States Marine Corps, was taken up as in committee of the whole. [The bill proposes to give to marine officers in command on the different stations, double rations.]

The Committee on Naval Affairs had recommended the indefinite postponement of this bill, and after some remarks by Messrs. WILLIAMS and TAPPAN, sustaining the report of the committee, and by Messrs. SOUTHARD and LUMPKIN in opposition,

Mr. SEVIER observed that it appeared from the Blue Book, that the pay of the officers of the army and marine corps was one thing, while he gathered from the discussion that had taken place, that they received, by some sort of construction of the Departments, in the way of extra allowances, four or five times as much. Now he wanted his constituents to know precisely what every public servant received—officers of the army and marine corps, as well as the others. If their pay was too small, he had no objection to raising it, but he wanted to know exactly what it was, and to have it set down in the Blue Book, so that every body could understand it. He was opposed to all these extra allowances of every description, and thought they led not only to embarrassment and confusion, but there was danger of abuses growing out of them. Mr. S. then moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a provision that all extra allowances to military, naval and marine officers, should be abolished.

Mr. KING would suggest to his friend from Arkansas to change his motion to that of a recommitment to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to report a bill giving a fixed pay to those officers, and abolishing all extra allowances whatever. He had no doubt but there were great abuses under the system that prevailed; that some officers got more than others, while some, perhaps, got more than they were entitled to. The committee should proceed with great caution, so as to do equal justice to all the officers, as well as the public; but, at all events, the present system was wrong, and ought to be corrected.

Mr. SEVIER then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions, &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS observed that, in 1835, all the extra allowances and emoluments of the officers of the navy were abolished by law, and that they now received a fixed amount per year, with no other addition than that of one ration a day when at sea. Therefore, the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas need not be extended to the naval service, nor ought it to go to the Committee on Naval Affairs. As the pay of the officers of the marine corps was regulated by that of the officers of the infantry of the army, the reference, if made, should be to the Committee on Military Affairs. He agreed most fully with the Senator from Arkansas, that the officers in every branch of our service should have a certain fixed amount of pay per month, or year, without any extra allowances, in order that their constituents might know what each officer received. He was convinced that the pay of the officers of the army was very much beyond what any man would suppose it to be, from looking at the Blue Book; and as a matter of this sort ought not to be concealed from the public, he heartily approved of the object the gentleman had in view.

Mr. MERRICK concurred in the views of the gentleman from Arkansas, and suggested a modification of the instructions, so as to require the committee to report a bill, regulating the pay per month of all the officers of the army and marine corps.

Mr. WALKER hoped his friend from Arkansas would change his motion into a resolution to instruct the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the subject. He thought these extra allowances should be abolished, but he was not prepared, without further information, to say what other plan should be substituted.

Mr. LUMPKIN regretted that the Senator from Arkansas had undertaken to connect this little question with a matter of such great importance as that of regulating the pay of the officers of the army and marine corps. He regretted the gentleman's motion, because, to his mind, it was calculated to divert the attention of the Senate from the subject before it, to one of great and general importance. This was a small matter, in comparison with the object the gentleman had in view. Throughout the whole of the discussion, it appeared to him that his friend from Maine, the chairman of the Naval Committee, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] had urged arguments that were inapplicable to the case before them. The whole of his argument was based on the idea that these officers of the marine corps already received pay enough. This was not the case before the Senate, but whether they should receive what they were entitled to by a fair construction of the law of 1834, as had been well explained by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. SOUTHARD.] He concurred with that Senator in thinking that there had been a wrong construction of the existing law by the accounting officers, and believed that the law gave to the marine officers what they asked. That was the question the Senate was asked to decide, and not whether the extra allowances were right or wrong. The report of the chairman of the Naval Committee evinced that he was not so clearly satisfied but that the law, as it stood, did make this allowance; but he seemed to ease his mind off with the conclusion that they already received enough. He was not now disposed to controvert that opinion, but he must say that it was their duty to give to every officer what he was entitled to under the law. Mr. L. here read the law of 1834, and remarked that as it was construed at the Auditor's office, it was denied that the marine officers had a right to double rations in the cases in which this allowance was claimed by them; and therefore the passage of this explanatory law was asked for by them. Mr. L. said he would go with his friend from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] in getting these extra allowances abolished, and in establishing a fixed and definite pay for the officers in lieu of them, but he wanted this particular case decided on first.

Mr. SEVIER then modified his motion so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to bring in a bill abolishing all the extra allowances to officers of the army and marine corps, and establishing in lieu of them a fixed and certain monthly pay. He was in favor of giving these extra allowances to the marines, if the other officers got them, but he wished them all to be cut off.

Mr. TAPPAN thought the construction of the law as given by the department at present, was the correct one. The law requires that double rations should be given to the commanding officer of a separate and distinct post. Now, where is there an officer of marines who is the commandant of a separate and distinct post? There is not one. They are always subordinate to, and under the command of, the officer of the navy who has charge of the station. With as much propriety might double rations be given to the lieutenant of an officer commanding a separate post, as to a marine officer on a station, who was a subordinate to the naval officer. No fault could justly be found with the construction of the act at the Navy Department, as there could be no other construction given to it with any regard the strict letter of the law.

Mr. BUCHANAN scarcely knew how to vote on this question. He did think that his friend from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] could not be engaged in a more laudable undertaking than in executing these instructions, though at the same time he doubted whether he would have time enough to do any thing this session. He had often thought on this subject, and wished that the pay of our officers was regulated in such a way that every one could understand what it was. Was there a member of this body, he asked, who could tell what the officers of the army or navy received? He had endeavored to ascertain what some of them received, without success. What did General Macomb or one of the superior officers of the navy receive? He could not tell. While he wished to give to every officer a fair and liberal compensation, he at the same time wished to put them on the same footing with every other public servant, and to ascertain and fix a certain compensation for them, so that every body might know what it was. This was what the public desired and expected. He understood that there was a large sum allowed for forage to officers who kept no horses, and other allowances of a similar nature. All this might be very proper, and might be necessary to eke out their pay; but he wished to know what it was. If the Senator from Missouri was unable to execute this duty, he would be willing to lay it over till the next session; but he hoped that it would then, at least, be taken up and acted on.

Mr. BENTON could assure gentlemen that, in his opinion, it would take every moment that remained of the present session for the committee to make up their opinions on a principle of compensation, and then the chief difficulty would commence—the application of the principle. The compensation of the officers of the army is made up of a great many separate classes of items, to all which separately the principle would have to be applied. And what would be the result, supposing such a bill should become a law? Here is an officer ordered out upon a march. Well, if in lieu of extras, as by the present arrangement, he is allowed a fixed and definite sum, he is to commence by being his own purveyor. He has to provide for his food, his transportation, or if he has a horse, to make provision for forage; whereas, under the present arrangement, he is in a condition to set out at once, and make his requisition for these articles on the quartermaster. This proposed arrangement would throw every officer on his own resources, when he had received marching orders; just as a private citizen would be when setting out upon a journey. These would be some of the inconveniences of the arrangement, which had occurred to him at the moment, but they were not all. He would repeat that it would take all the time of the committee during the remainder of the session, to adjust a scale of compensation, and when that was fixed, in his opinion, it would be found incapable of application. He hoped gentlemen would therefore see the propriety of not imposing a duty on the committee at this late period, from which no practical results could be expected, and would permit it to lay over until the next session of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed that he was sensible of the difficulties involved in the question, but they did not appear to him to be insuperable. No person imagined that an officer of the army was to provide himself with beef and pork on a march; but that difficulty could be obviated by allowing him to draw provisions, and charge him with the amount, to be deducted out of his pay. But he apprehended that it would be of great importance to the service to fix the standard of pay so as to cover all rations and allowances of every kind that the officers now receive. Being satisfied, from the explanation of the Senator from Missouri, that he could not attend to this business during the short time that was left of this session, he would not, therefore, vote to impose it upon him.

Mr. SEVIER observed that, if the Committee could not attend to the business, as the Senator from Missouri said, he would withdraw his motion, and send the subject to the Secretary of War in another form. In the mean time, he would move to lay the bill on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The question was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Tappan, Williams, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Henderson, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Porter, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and White—19.

After some further remarks from Messrs. WILLIAMS, SOUTHARD, and TAPPAN, the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Buchanan, Lumpkin, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and White—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Linn, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Williams, and Young—28.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, June 11, 1840.

Mr. WICK moved for leave of absence in favor of his colleague, Mr. HOWARD, for two weeks from Monday next, at which time, Mr. W. said, his colleague would, in virtue of his resignation, cease to be a member of this House.

The leave was granted.

PILOT LAW.

Mr. HILLEN, on leave, presented a memorial from the merchants of Baltimore, in favor of the repeal of the law regulating pilots.

The SPEAKER announced that the business first in order, was the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] to recommit to the Committee on Commerce the bill reported from that committee by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HILLEN,] proposing the repeal of the law of 1837, regulating pilots.

Mr. HILLEN (who retained the floor from yesterday) continued his remarks during the morning hour in opposition to the motion to recommit.

He disclaimed any ill feeling to the New York merchants. He was willing, he said, and desirous to promote their interests when that could be done consistently with the interests of others. He wished no exclusive privileges to be given to the New York pilots; but all he asked was, that they should be protected in the enjoyment of their just and legitimate rights. He went into a history of the law in relation to pilotage; and of the facts which, he said, were applicable to that law; not denying the constitutional power of Congress to legislate on the subject, but contending that Congress had, by its own act, ceded that power to the several States. He then proceeded to contend that the law which this bill now proposed to repeal grew out of the loss of the ships Bristol and Mexico; making the direct issue that the loss of these two vessels, and the excitement created thereby in the public mind, were the direct and the immediate causes of the passage of the law, in the absence of which cases the law never would have been passed; and contending that the pilots were in no wise to blame for those terrible disasters. With this view he went into a minute examination of the condition and locality of the Bristol and Mexico at the time they were lost, and read a number of depositions and documents having reference thereto.

Mr. H. had not concluded, when,

The morning hour having expired,

Mr. J. W. JONES called for the orders of the day; but, before passing to which,

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Public Buildings, a statement of the number of assistants, superintendents, assistant superintendents, foremen, bosses, and workmen of different kinds, employed at this time on the Treasury and Patent Office buildings, and the salaries paid to each, &c. in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 4th instant.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that it be returned to the Commissioner of Public Buildings, with instructions, which was agreed to, as follows:

"That the Commissioner of Public Buildings be required to answer the requisitions made on him by the resolution of the 4th instant, more fully, by giving the per diem compensation paid Jeremiah Sullivan, as superintendent of the Treasury Building, in addition to his salary at the Post Office building; also the bill of prices paid for the piece work, which he says "cannot be done at the price per day," at the Treasury and Patent buildings. Also, that he be required to state how many, if any, if the men employed as enumerated in his answer to the resolution of the 4th, are temporarily employed; and whether any of the superintendents, or men employed at the Patent Office, have been paid wages when idle for want of materials; and further, how many of the superintendents, or bosses employed by him, at any of the public buildings, keep grocery shops or boarding houses for workmen, or are concerned in keeping grog shops; and whether it is the practice to retain the amount of bills alleged to be due from the workmen by the keepers of those groceries or grog shops from the wages of the men employed on the public buildings, when they are about being paid off; and whether the superintendents of any of the public buildings were paid wages during the winter while the work was suspended, naming the persons and the amounts paid."

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting the information called for on the 5th instant, in relation to the indebtedness of the postmaster at Baton Rouge, in Louisiana, (Abel Waddell;) which was, on motion of Mr. M'KAY, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Senate bill, lying on the SPEAKER'S table, entitled "An act making provision for the payment of pensions to the executors and Administrators of deceased pensioners, in certain cases," was taken up, read twice, and, by special order, read the third time and passed.

The bill to establish a uniform rate of mileage, to take effect from and after the 26th Congress, was taken up on its engrossment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and the question being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. BLACK inquired of the CHAIR whether it would be in order to amend the bill.

The CHAIR replied that it was not, the bill being on its passage.

Mr. BLACK moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. LEET demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 25, nays 130.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said, as a large majority had refused to lay the bill on the table, he moved the previous question on the passage of the bill; which having received a second, and the main question being ordered; and

The main question being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. T. W. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were yeas 148, nays 13. So the bill was passed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Mississippi, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed.

And the question being on the reconsideration—

Mr. T. made some remarks, expressing the opinion, that this was an effort between the two parties, as to which should out-demagogue the other. He dwelt on the injustice of paying members for a direct route when they were obliged to travel by a circuitous route, as the Southwestern members were. He predicted that the bill would not be suffered to remain in operation after the Presidential election, and hoped that the House would now reconsider the vote by which it had been passed.

After a few remarks by Mr. STANLY, in reply to Mr. THOMPSON,

Mr. LEET wished to say a few words in relation to this subject. As a member of the Committee on Mileage, he thought it his duty. He was surprised to hear his friend, the gentleman from Mississippi, talk about parties out-demagoguing each other. He [Mr. L.] solemnly affirmed, that in reporting the bill, the committee were influenced by no political motives whatever. It was done with a view of equalizing the mileage, and not from any desire of popularity, or from any political considerations, that the bill was reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider, which was recorded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Mississippi, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider; which, being ordered, were—yeas 29, nays 125.

So the House refused to reconsider.

The bill heretofore reported from the Committee on the Library, in addition to the acts now in force for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books to the authors and proprietors of such copies during the time therein mentioned, regulating an international exchange of such works, came up in its order on engrossment for a third reading, was read the third time, and,

The question being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to its passage without proper consideration and due examination; and,

After a few remarks by Mr. TILLINGHAST, explanatory of the bill, denying the grounds assumed by Mr. PETRIKIN,

Mr. PETRIKIN then moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole, to take its place on the calendar; which was agreed to.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. PARRISH being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from yesterday in support of the bill. He continued his examination of the effects of a paper currency in prostrating the business of the country, and showed that in case of a recharter of a Great Regulator, similar effects would ensue.

The time having arrived for taking the usual recess, Mr. P. suspended his remarks.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

Mr. PARRISH resumed and concluded his remarks; in the course of which he examined the various features of the antagonistical measure of the Opposition. A full report will be given hereafter.

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky followed, and spoke at some length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. FLOYD then took the floor, and spoke at some length in favor of the bill; after Mr. F. had concluded—

Mr. BANARD obtained the floor; and, on his motion, the committee rose, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, June 12, 1840.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Catharine Binker, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House for the relief of James J. Coffin, made an adverse report thereon.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill supplemental to an act entitled an act for the discontinuance of the office of surveyor general in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the select committee to which was referred the subject of establishing a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy, reported a bill, which was ordered to be printed, and made the special order of the day for Tuesday next.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee on the District, reported a bill to amend the charter of Georgetown; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the establishment of a uniform system of computing the mileage of members of Congress was twice read, when

Mr. NORVELL moved a reference of the bill to a select committee.

Mr. DAVIS could not see any necessity for the reference. The bill was plain, and contained but a single provision, which the Senate must understand without any explanation from a committee.

Mr. NORVELL perceived a strong necessity for the proposed reference. The bill was novel in its character and its provisions. It provided that the mileage of members of the two Houses should be computed upon a straight line from the seat of Government to their respective residences. The line was to be drawn upon the most approved maps. Sir, the consideration of this bill, this air-drawn line, required scientific, geographical, and perhaps astronomical information. It was a very serious matter. A committee would probably be necessary to decide as to what maps should be used in marking the several lines from the seat of Government to the residence of each and every member of the Senate and House. The existing law on the subject of mileage provided that the mileage should be computed according to the usual travelling routes. This was the correct principle. In his judgment, it needed no change. The people had called for none. The proposition had, he supposed, originated in a spirit of superlative economy, if not in a disposition to make political capital out of the question. But, extraordinary as the main provision in the bill was, novel as it was, beyond all precedent ever set in any legislative body on the same subject, it deserved a reference, and, as it belonged to no standing committee, he had asked that the bill be referred to a select committee.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped the committee to which this bill was referred would consider whether a still further reform was not desirable—that of reducing the per diem from eight dollars to five or six dollars per day. As gentlemen seemed to suppose it proper that we should travel by an air line to and from Washington city, it might be proper to see if we could not subsist on air while we resided here. If the mileage was reduced, he was in favor of an inquiry into the propriety of reducing the per diem, and to compensate members only for their actual attendance to their duties.

Mr. GRUNDY, in alluding to this matter, said there would always be more or less difficulty in finding the true distance. He thought the manner of computing at present was about right; those who got the most for mileage he knew made the most sacrices. There was nothing like concealment in him, and he should not disguise his sentiments in relation to this matter; and although he would vote for no increase of pay or mileage, (for on that subject they had been taught a pretty severe lesson once before,) he should also vote against all attempts to reduce pay or mileage. It was a losing business with him as it was, but he was willing to bear his share of the public burden.

Mr. CALHOUN hoped that his friend from Alabama would not press his motion, and that the Senate would meet the question fairly. He would speak with the greater freedom on this question, for he had never availed himself of charging according to the long and more usual and cheapest route between his residence and this place; he meant the one by Charleston; but he was, at the same time, in favor of a liberal allowance for travelling. He regarded it an erroneous view of the subject, to suppose that the regulation of the mileage should be exclusively, or even principally, in reference to the expense of travelling. There is something in mere distance—of being far removed, so large a portion of the year, from our business, families, and homes, that ought to be taken into the estimate. It is difficult, for those who have not actually experienced it, to say how high that estimate ought to place mileage in the scale of compensation allowed the members. But there is another and connected view of this point, in his opinion, of the highest importance. If it be desirable to continue the seat of Government where it is, and to avoid the agitation of the exciting and dangerous question of removal, it will be found not the least effectual means, to allow a liberal compensation for travelling. He would go farther—the rate of the allowance is not without a bearing on the existence of the Union itself. If we take both of these important considerations into the estimate, it will be found difficult to say how high a value ought to be attached to rate of compensation, that would induce the members from the distant portions of this vast confederacy to encounter willingly and cheerfully all the sacrifices incident to absence for so long a time, and so far from business, family, home, and all the endearing relations of life, and the danger of one so low, as would be followed by an opposite state of feelings. Thus thinking, he was was in favor of a liberal allowance for mileage, and opposed to any reduction, which the law, as it now stands, authorizes. If there be any ambiguity in the law, let it be explained by a declaratory act, so that there may be uniformity in the rate of charging. This he thought desirable; but nothing more. He regarded all questions, touching the compensation of the members of Congress, of great delicacy, and deserving careful consideration. Much depended on it.

He had been in favor of the act which had changed the per diem into an annual compensation, and experience had but confirmed him that its repeal had proved a public misfortune. Had it remained, the business of the country would have been despatched in much shorter time, and he believed much more satisfactorily to the country, and with great saving of time and money. But what was still more important, it would have done much to place the members above Executive influence, and thereby done much to keep the Government pure and within its assigned sphere. He thought so at the time, and told the enlightened and patriotic people, whom he then represented, so; and had the satisfaction of being supported by them in the ground he took.

Mr. SEVIER expressed his decided opposition to the measure. He was clearly of opinion that it was sent to the Senate with a settled conviction that it could not become a law, and that those who voted for it did not wish it to pass. He knew that he himself had a hard bargain to get here and back upon the mileage allowed him, and that if it was cut down he would be considerably out of pocket. Sometimes, when the water was up, he could get here at a low rate; but when he had to come by land it was a different affair. He would defy any man to come from his residence here in a direct line. In order to get here he must first go to Memphis, and from thence through Nashville, Knoxville, &c. to this place. He had to travel 300 miles out of the way before he could get the right road. No man could get to his residence unless he went down the Ohio and Mississippi, or took an equally circuitous route by land; and here the bill of the House supposed that they must travel through the air, for they were to charge for their mileage by an air line. He had always charged by the long route, and so had his associates. It was merely playing with the Senate to send it such a bill, for those who passed it never expected or desired that it should become a law. There was no use in sending it to a special committee—it ought to be met and rejected at once; and if it was in order, he would make that motion.

Mr. HUBBARD hoped the bill would be referred to a select committee, and if it operated unequally it should be amended. The great desideratum on this subject was some uniform rule. Whether the object would be attained by the passage of this bill he was not prepared to say, but he was not at present prepared to vote against it. He hoped that the bill would be treated with that courtesy and respect which was due to a measure emanating from a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature.

Mr SEVIER was not very solicitous about the matter. If the bill was referred, he hoped it would be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he must think the object, which he presumed the House had in view, was worthy of consideration, and he would submit it to the Senator from Arkansas, whether it was treating the House with due respect to charge them with originating a bill which they did not wish to pass. The object of it was to equalize the travelling of members of Congress, by a uniform rule. By the existing law, members from the same place or neighborhood charged their mileage by different rules. Mr. C. had always charged by the territorial rule, although he went by the long route; and, owing to the facilities of steamboats and railroads, that route was the cheapest and quickest. But it was a fact, that members from the same neighborhood received different pay. The object of this bill was to equalize it on the principle of the air line. But, whether this principle was right or not, the object of the bill was good, and Mr. C. wished it committed.

The bill was then referred to a select committee to consist of five members.

Mr. SEVIER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish, in the first week of the next session of Congress, a tabular statement showing the amount at present received by each rank of the army as pay under the several allowances or emoluments, and what was received during the late war, under the same heads; and that, with a view to establish a fixed compensation or salary for each rank, he report, if any, what allowance will be necessary to be retained to give efficiency in actual service.

Mr. SEVIER hoped that the Senate would unanimously consent to the consideration of the resolution at the present time, but

Mr. PRESTON objecting, it was laid over until to-morrow.

Mr. MERRICK submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared and submitted to Congress, as early as conveniently may be after the commencement of the next session, a plan and estimates for the improvement of Pennsylvania avenue west of the President's square, and for the construction of a stone bridge across Rock creek, to connect the western terminus of said avenue with one of the principal streets of Georgetown.

Resolved, further, That the President be requested to cause proper inquiry and examination to be made for the ascertainment of the best and most economical mode of correcting the inconveniences arising from the pulverization of the broken stone with which said avenue is covered between the Capitol and President's square, and that he communicate the result to Congress at the commencement of the next session, with estimates of the probable cost of execution of any plans for remedying said inconvenience which he may approve.

DISTRICT BANKS.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK, the bill to incorporate the Bank of the District of Columbia was taken up, and read a second time.

Mr. TAPPAN observed that it was the understanding of the Senate, he believed, certainly his understanding, when all the bills on the subject of the banks of the District of Columbia were made the special order of the day, for the same day, with the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Colnmbia, that they should all be taken up and considered at the same time. There were several bills on this subject. First, there was

The bill for the more easy collection of small bank notes within the District of Columbia.

2d. The bill for the collection of bank notes of and under the denomination of twenty dollars, issued by banks within the District of Columbia.

3d. The bill to regulate the issuing and circulating of bank paper in the District of Columbia.

If it was in order and conformable to the usual practice of the Senate, he would move that these three bills be taken up, and considered with the bill just read. He was not sufficiently conversant with the rules of the Senate to know whether the motion was or was not in order.

The CHAIR said that the motion was not in order.

Mr. TAPPAN. Then I move that the bill to incorporate the banks of the District of Columbia be postponed till the next session of Congress. I shall, if this motion succeeds, move to postpone the other three bills, the titles of which I have read, with the view of offering the resolution which I hold in my hand, and which, for the information of the Senate and by its permission, I will read:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That the charters of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and the Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and the Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the 4th day of July, 1841, so far as to enable said banks to sue and be sued on any contract now existing."

It was suggested by the Senator from Maryland, when he moved to take up this bill, that it would probably occasion no argument. Now, Mr. T. thought, if the bill was to be acted on at this session, or whenever it was acted on, it would occasion much argument. Assuredly such a bill as had just been read by the Secretary, could not be passed sub silentio. It would be discussed, and many important subjects would be discussed with it. For himself, he preferred not going into the discussion during this session. He preferred postponing it till the next, as they had as much business before them, with the bankrupt question, and other important subjects, as would occupy all their time; and no injury could result from this course. The object of the resolution was simply to postpone the further consideration of this subject till the next session, and in the mean time, to authorize the banks to collect the debts due to them—to continue their corporate powers for the sole purpose of suing and being sued. He supposed that they wanted it for no other purpose, as he understood that they had for a long time passed been doing no banking business.

Mr. MERRICK suggested to the Senator from Ohio that, if these bills should be postponed, the resolution proposed by him would fall into the calendar, and might not be reached, or reached too late to pass both Houses. Mr. M. therefore, thought it better for Mr. T. to move to strike from this bill all but the enacting clause, and to insert his resolution as a substitute for the bill; and, if this motion prevailed, the resolution might then be so modified as to suit the views of the majority of the Senate.

Mr. TAPPAN said that, at the time he made his motion, he supposed that that disposition of the bills would be most agreeable to the gentleman from Maryland. He now found that he was mistaken, and that the Senator preferred a different course. He was willing to accede to the gentleman's proposition, and he therefore moved to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill under consideration, and to insert his resolution in lieu thereof.

Mr. MERRICK then, in compliance with his pledge to Mr. CLAY of Alabama, moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject till to-morrow, which motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE MILITIA COMMITTEE.

The motion to print 20,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia being taken up, was debated at length by Messrs. CRITTENDEN, CUTHBERT, and CLAY of Alabama, pending whose remarks,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, June 12, 1840.

The unfinished business of the morning hour being the motion to recommit the report of the Committee on Commerce in favor of a repeal of the pilot law,

Mr. HILLEN resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the motion, and in favor of a repeal of the law. He, in the course of his remarks, showed that under the law of the State of New York, a combination among the pilots could not exist, and repelled the charges of inefficiency and neglect of duty, which had been alleged against the New York pilots by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CURTIS.]

Mr. GRINNELL of New York then took the floor, and spoke until the expiration of the hour, against the repeal of the law.

Mr. BOTTS submitted a preamble and resolution, calling for information in relation to the proceedings of the court martial in the case of Lieutenant Hooe, on which the preamble alleged that the testimony of two colored men had been received.

The preamble, accompanied by a resolution, was read for the information of the House, as follows:

And whereas the introduction of negroes and private servants of the prosecutors as witnesses, to testify against the characters of gentlemen of the navy, in the service of their country, is a practice, though sanctioned by the President of the United States, that will not be justified, and ought not to be tolerated by Southern men, or "Northern men with Southern principles," and, if not arrested, must operate as a ruinous injury to the navy, to the humiliation of its officers, and to the infinite discredit of the Government;

Resolved, therefore, That the Secretary of the Navy be required to communicate to this House a copy of the proceedings of the court martial held for the trial of Lieutenant George Hooe, that his wrongs may be promptly redressed, and the evils complained of corrected without delay.

Mr. BOTTS said if it was objected to, he would move to suspend the rules, and call for the yeas and nays. He held himself responsible, both personally and officially, for the truth of the facts alleged in the preamble—responsible, there and elsewhere.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS objected to the reception of the resolution. He was opposed to any business being thrown in to interfere with the regular business of the House. He was understood to say that he did not know the bearing or purposes of the resolution—whether it was intended to have legislative action upon it hereafter or not; and until he could understand the objects of the mover, he must object.

Mr. BOTTS moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to present the preamble and resolution, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays. He would bring these Democrats up to the bull-ring.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, were—yeas 95, nays 85. So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BOTTS said his object was attained; he was satisfied; he had got the facts before the country.

[A Southern Democrat, in the neighborhood of Sleepy Hollow, was heard in an under tone to exclaim, "How well the Northern Abolitionists and Southern Whigs pull together in the traces, on the motion to suspend the rules for the reception of the resolution. It looks suspicious—it looks like concert and design.]

Mr. M'KAY (who had voted with the most of the Southern men against the resolution, because it was ill-timed, and because they were by inferences challenged and dared to oppose it) moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to communicate to this House a copy of the proceedings of a court martial held in May and June of 1839, for the trial of Lieut. George M. Hooe, of the Navy, with any action of the Executive had thereon.

Mr. THOMAS said he must object to this resolution also, and to any interruption of the regular business.

Mr. McKAY then withdrew it, and gave notice that he would offer it on to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of the House resolving itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. UNDERWOOD demanded the yeas and nays on that motion, which, being ordered, were—yeas 112, nays 72. So the rules were suspended, the motion under the new rule requiring but a majority.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. BARNARD, who was entitled to the floor, spoke till the hour of recess, without concluding, in opposition to the bill.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

There being but about twenty members within the bar,

Mr. EVERETT thought that was rather too small a congregation for the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] to address. He therefore objected to going again into committee, unless a greater number were present, and intimated his wish to have a call of the House.

Mr. McKAY thought the House had better go into committee, as in less time than it would take to have a call, it was probable a quorum would appear.

After some further debate of a desultory character,

Mr. McKAY moved a call of the House, which was ordered by a vote of—yeas 37, nays 7.

The call was then proceeded in for some time.

Mr. EVERETT said that, as an additional number of members had now arrived, he had no objection to go into committee, and he therefore moved that all further proceeding in the call be suspended.

On this motion, Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays, which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend, and it was negatived.

The proceedings of the call were then resumed, and the roll having been gone through, 80 members answered to their names.

The doors were then closed, and the names of the absentees called, after which 86 members were found to be present.

On motion of Mr. RHETT, all further proceedings in the call were then dispensed with.

It was now five o'clock, when

Mr. McCULLOH moved to adjourn; on which motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted—yeas 4, nays 95.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. DANA made an unsuccessful attempt to introduce a resolution requiring the CLERK to publish in one of the city newspapers, a list of the yeas and nays on all subjects.

After some debate of a conversational character, which terminated in a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of receiving the resolution,

Mr. EVANS raised a point of order, which was, that there being no quorum present, the SPEAKER could not entertain any question or motion.

The SPEAKER decided that, according to the gentleman's own rule, his point of order could not be entertained, there being no quorum present.

On motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE a call of the House was again ordered, and proceeded in until 125 members answered to their names.

A quorum now being present, and there being a sufficient number to listen to the remarks of the gentleman entitled to the floor, and to digest the same, by general consent, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

The House then resolved itself into a committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. BARNARD proceeded with his remarks in opposition to bill until 7 o'clock.

Mr. GALBRAITH then took the floor, and in a very pointed manner commented upon the "peculiar excellencees" of a National Bank, as compared with the system contemplated in this bill. In the course of his remarks, he quoted several striking instances where the old United States Bank had shown how far such an institution was to be depended upon as a regulator of the currency. The speech of Mr. G. will appear as early as convenient.

Mr. SHEPARD next obtained the floor, but gave way to a motion that the committee rise.

The committee then rose, and, at 9 o'clock p. m. the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, June 14, 1840.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a preamble and resolutions passed by the Board of Trade of the city of New York, explaining certain portions of their memorial, heretofore presented to the Senate, on the subject of the bankrupt law; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS submitted documents in relation to the claim of Osmond Peters and others, officers attached to the United States revenue service, to the same pay and allowances as officers of similar grade in the navy; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bills from the House,

For the relief of Fielding Pratt;
For the relief of Job Wood;
For the relief of Peter Hedrick;
For the relief of Niel Shannon;
For the relief of George Morris;
For the relief of Levi Johnston; and For the relief of Samuel B. Hugo;

made adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill from the House for the relief of Chauncey Rice, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the same committee, to which was referred House bills

For the relief of Martha Strong, and For the relief of Thomas Wilson,

made adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Elihu Hall Bay, reported the same without amendment, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLAS submitted the following resolution, which was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the payment of the balance due John Mitchell and Ben. F. Fox, contractors for building the branch mint at New Orleans.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SEVIER, was considered and agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK moved to take up the bill for the incorporation of the Bank of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama thought it would be better to dispose of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which was the motion to print 20,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. MERRICK said that he had no intention to interrupt the debate on the motion alluded to by the Senator from Alabama. His object was to have the bill debated during the morning hour, and would move to lay it on the table, should it not be disposed of before one o'clock. He, however, thought there would be no difficulty in disposing of it in the course of half an hour.

Mr. TAPPAN thought the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] was mistaken in his estimate of the time that would be necessary for the consideration of this measure before it could be disposed of. The Senate would first have to take the vote on the amendment offered by himself, to which other amendments would probably be offered. These would lead to debate—earnest and protracted debate on the important principles involved. There was great diversity of opinion in relation to the power of Congress to legislate on this subject, and even those who admit the power are divided in sentiment as to the expediency, or the extent, of its exercise. The Senator would therefore see that instead of half an hour, days would probably be consumed in the debate. He would submit to that Senator whether any thing could be gained by pressing the subject at the present moment, and whether it would not be better to permit the discussion, on the unfinished business, to proceed.

Mr. BENTON asked if this was not the bill to recharter all the banks of the District in one.

Mr. MERRICK replied that the object of the original bill was to charter a single bank for the District of Columbia, in the place of the present ones, whose charters were about to expire. But the question now was on striking out that bill and inserting a mere power for existing banks to consummate their contracts.

Mr. BENTON observed, that if there was not a pending question which he thought should be disposed of before this was touched, he would be willing to go into the discussion of it quite readily. But if it was to be made a half hour's job of, it must be because his intellectual and physical powers gave out. He had himself offered a resolution, which was now on the table, declaring that the Senate would not consider the subject of rechartering these banks while they remained in a state of non-payment. The Congress of the United States was the local Legislature of the District of Columbia, and it had as yet done nothing to compel the banks here to fulfil their obligations, though they made great complaint of the manner in which the State Legislatures sanctioned the suspensions of the State banks. We complain, said Mr. B. of the manner in which the banks overthrew the currency of the Constitution, and substituted depreciated paper in lieu of it, while we, who are, so far as these banks are concerned, the local Legislature of the District, are about to sanction the same thing; for what else was it but sanctioning their delinquencies, and declaring that they may suspend when they please, and as long as they please, if Congress went on to give them new charters? We have now been here, said Mr. B. near seven months—and close by the dog days, and the Congress of the United States had, as yet, taken no step towards suppressing the circulation of depreciated paper, and the importation of all the broken bank currency of the country. Why, the District of Columbia is the reservoir into which all the broken bank curreney of the country is poured; and that, too, under the very eyes of Congress, which has as yet taken no steps towards protecting the interests of those who had become the prey of those banks, through Congressional legislation. He assured the Senator from Maryland that the passage of the bill was not such a little half hour's job as he supposed it to be. He intended to use his best exertions to put an end to the scandalous state of things which existed here—a state of things which shut the mouths of Congress from saying any thing with regard to the abuses existing in the States; for the evil was worse here than any where else. The gentleman might go on when he pleased with his half hour's job; but he would find, when he began it, that it would not end so soon as he imagined. He (Mr. B.) was willing to sit it out till the stars appeared in the evening, and from then till they disappeared in the morning, but what he would have some remedy applied to the great and crying grievances suffered by the people of this District.

Mr. MERRICK said the subject of this bill had been before the Senate for several months, and M. had hoped and expected that every Senator would have made up his mind so as to act on the subject without any long discussion. Mr. M. had not the power to convince the Senator from Missouri on this subject, but he would cheerfully submit to the will of a majority of the Senate. It was of great importance that the people of the District should know soon what was to be done by Congress in relation to their banks, and Mr. M. hoped the Senate would now consent to take up the subject.

Mr. GRUNDY strongly expressed the hope that the Senator from Maryland would not press the question at this time.

And Mr. MERRICK withdrew his motion.

REPORT OF THE MILITIA COMMITTEE.

The motion to print 20,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia was taken up, and Mr. CLAY of Alabama continued his remarks at much length, and was replied to by Mr. PRESTON.

Mr. SOUTHARD then moved to add to the report of the committee the letter of the Secretary fo War to the chairman of the Committee of the Militia in the House of Representatives.

This motion was discussed by Messrs. SOUTHARD, ROANE, FULTON, WRIGHT, and PHELPS, and disagreed to—ayes 11, noes 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, Phelps, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, and White—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, and Wright—22.

The question then recurring on the motion to print the report of the Committee on the Militia, it was agreed to—ayes 23, noes 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Wright, and Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, Phelps, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, and White—11.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said as the gentlemen on the opposite side of the chamber professed to be anxious that the public should have light on this subject, he moved that twenty thousand copies of the plan of the Secretary of War for the organization of the militia, and the plans of General Knox and General Harrison on the same subject, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS moved an adjournment; which was carried.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, June 13th, 1840.

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order was the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] to recommit to the Committee on Commerce the bill reported from that committee by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HILLEN] to repeal the law of 1837, regulating pilots.

Mr. GRINNELL, who was entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks in opposition to the repeal of the law, and in reply to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HILLEN.] He denied that the merchants of New York had oppressed the pilots. He then related the circumstances of the loss of the Mexico, and attributed, in some degree, the loss of that vessel to the inattention and negligence of the pilots of New York.

After speaking of the great losses of property, and many evils before the passage of the law of 1837, he showed the beneficial effects of that law. He then spoke of the necessity of having strict laws to induce the pilots to do their duty, some of whom would not adhere to any law or any regulations. But he bore testimony that there were honorable exceptions to that imputation, and argued that the pilots had, since the passage of the now proposed to be repealed, and which created a competition among them, done their duty well.

Mr. MONROE of New York obtained the floor, and movod the previous question; but gave way at the suggestion of Mr. HOLLEMAN, who advocated the repeal of the law. He was surprised that Congress had undertaken to legislate at all upon the subject. He had some doubt whether it had the constitutional power to do so—it was at least doubtful, or could only be involved as an incidental right under the general power to regulate commerce. He argued that the pilot system could be much better regulated by the States. He thought it very singular that, after the expiration of so many years of State regulation previous to the passage of this law in 1837, Congress should not be called upon to pass a general law, if legislation was necessary, instead of being asked to pass one of a local character, to regulate the pilots only of Jersey and New York. He believed it would be much better if the matter had been left with the States, which always had had charge of it, and which properly understood the subject. He contended that if Congress should undertake to legislate, it should establish some general system. This law which is proposed to be repealed, does not attempt to regulate the fees of pilots, which was a most important particular, but leave it to the two States interested in the law to settle. He thought it better to give the State charge of the whole matter. He then spoke of the law passed by the Legislature of New York, subsequent to the passage of the law of Congress, which he considered ample in its provisions to protect the merchants against the fear of combinations of pilots. That law permitted any man who was competent to get a license, to act as pilot, and therefore there could be no monopoly. The law, he said, broke up the combination complained of by the gentlemen who opposed the repeal of the law of Congress, and such combination was not prevented by the law of Congress.

He then spoke of the gallantry of the pilots belonging to his State, a portion of whom had petitioned for the repeal of this law. They asked no favor, and were too gallant and daring to fear competition, but they believed the law was unjust. He then spoke of the manner in which the pilots of his State had been denounced, in the same manner as those of New York, without proper cause. If they were deserving of any censure for inattention, it grew out of the lowness of their wages at the time, and not for the want of industry on their part. They could not then live at the prices paid, and there was no incentive to action. The Legislature of this State took the subject in hand, raised their rates, and the consequence was, that the complaints ceased. They are not found lurking in shore as had been formerly charged, but could be found riding out the tempest even in the gulf stream. All this, he said, had been done without the enactment of the law of Congress. After speaking of the hard-hips and merits of the pilots generally, Mr. H. moved the previous question.

The morning hour having expired, the subject was passed by.

Mr. WISE, by general consent, offered, on behalf of his colleague, [Mr. BOTTS,] who was absent on the Committee of Elections, the following resolution, as a substitute for that offered by that gentleman on yesterday, which was read and agreed to, under the operation of the previous question, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House a copy of the record of all the proceedings of the naval court martial held on board the United States ship Macedonia, then lying in Pensacola bay, for the trial of Lieutenant George M. Hooe; together with the approval, if any, of the judgment of the court by the Secretary of the Navy; the remonstrances, if any, of the said Lieutenant Hooe, addressed to the President of the United States, and all the proceedings of the Executive thereon.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. SHEPARD spoke at some length in support of the bill, which he contrasted with the proposed scheme of the Opposition. He replied to the principal objections which had been urged against an Independent Treasury, and showed that they existed only in the heated fancy and distempered imaginations of its opponents. He set forth, in a striking manner, the good effects which would result from its adoption, and, among others, the tendency it would have in restraining the shameful expansions of paper currency by the banks. He demonstrated that in case of the re-establishment of a National Bank, similar disastrous consequences must inevitably result to those which had marked the career of the United States Bank. He also adverted to a variety of other matters in connection with the currency of the country.

Mr. EDWARDS of Pennsylvania obtained the floor, and opposed the bill. He argued in favor of a National Bank as a regulator of the currency; and to sustain his positions, adverted to the state of the currency when that institution was in existence. He pursued pretty much the same course of argument against the bill as had been indulged in by others.

When Mr. E. had finished, and there being no other person who claimed the floor to speak, the cry of question, question, was called from every part of the hall; when

Mr. DAVIES moved that the committee rise; and the committee having been divided on that motion, there were—ayes 20, noes 40.

The committee refused to rise; but there being no quorum, the CHAIRMAN rose and reported that fact to the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE remarked, that if there had been a quorum present in committee, the question could have been taken. Therefore, to compel the attendance of a quorum, he moved a call of the House.

Mr. MORGAN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 35, nays 50.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The hour of 2½ o'clock having arrived, the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The question pending being on the motion for a call of the House, after some conversational debate as to the propriety of going into committee without a quorum,

Mr. ANDREWS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. LINCOLN, in a very earnest manner, wished to call the attention of gentlemen to the impropriety of suffering the debate to go on, unless there was a quorum in attendance. For what purpose did gentlemen speak on this or any other measure? Was it to influence the country alone? If so, then it would be better to have no call, but to check at once all further debate, and go home to the people, and not continue the course pursued on last week, when gentlemen were speaking to empty benches. He wished to be distinctly understood as insisting that there should either be a quorum in attendance, or that the debate should cease altogether. If there was to be no quorum, he would call on every gentlemen to say for what purpose was this debate continued? If the speeches were not intended to influence the votes of members, but were made to the country, why not at once go home to the people? If they were not made to affect the votes here, for what purpose did gentleman remain? It might be the fault of his early education; but from his youth, he had always understood that the object of discussion was to influence the minds of those who had to decide upon a question on which an issue was made.

If gentlemen did not hope to influence the minds of those who had to decide upon this measure, it would be far better to take the question at once, and go home. So far as he was concerned, from his experience during the past week, he was ready to vote without any further delay; for he was perfectly convinced in his own mind that any thing which might be said would not influence any gentleman upon the floor. It was evident that their minds were already made up. If any one doubted that fact, and would rise in his place and say that the mind of but a single member was open to conviction, he would be willing to stay here until the last day of his life, rather than the subject should not be fairly discussed. But, if no one would rise and say his mind was open to conviction, then he prayed gentlemen to decide to what purpose was the argument continued here. For himself, he was ready to go home, and do what he never did, and what no man from his own State had ever done, which was, to go home, and appeal from the House to the good sense of the people of his State. Yes, he was ready to go there, and offer his argument, impressed, as he was, with the propriety, under such circumstances, of discontinuing all further debate, when the minds of those who had to decide the question were already made up. He wished it to be distinctly understood, that, from that time forth, he would not consent to the debate going on, unless there should be a quorum. With all due humility, as far as he was personally concerned, he had considered it his duty thus to enter his protest against the present course of proceedings, and to object to a question being argued, unless there was a quorum present to hear that argument.

The yeas and nays then being ordered on the motion for a call of the House, were taken, and resulted—yeas 68, nays 55. So the call was ordered, and proceeded in until 141 members answered to their names.

A quorum now being present, a motion to suspend all further proceedings in the call prevailed.

The House then went again into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BANKS,) and resumed the consideration of the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

No member claiming the floor, there was a general cry of "question."

Mr. POPE then rose and intimated his wish to address the committee, but not being prepared with his books and papers he wished to use, he was willing to waive his right to any other gentleman, should the committe not be disposed to rise.

Mr. HOLMES moved that the committee rise.

This motion was negatived—ayes 68, noes 69.

Mr. BURKE of Mew Hampshire then took the floor, and at some length advocated the bill, and set forth in a lucid manner its great superiority over the favorite measure of the Opposition.

Mr. POPE then renewed the motion that the committee rise; which motion prevailing, the committee thereupon rose.

Mr. LINCOLN, by leave, presented, on behalf of his absent colleague, Mr. ABBOT LAWRENCE, two petitions—one from Mary Davenport, for a pension; the other from the executors of Wm. Gray, praying for a liquidation of certain claims for the account of French spoliations, &c., which were appropriately referred.

And then the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, June 15, 1840.

Tee PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of the Nany, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 18th March last, in relation to the construction of steam ships; which was laid on the table.

Mr. TAPPAN presented a petition from certain citizens of Ohio, contractors for carrying the United States mail, praying for some allowance for extra services; referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The resolution submitted by Mr. MERRICK on Saturday last, in relation to the improvement of Pennsylvania avenue, was considered and agreed to.

On motion by Mr. YOUNG, leave was granted to Edward D. Tippett to withdraw his petition and papers.

The following bills were severally read the third time and passed:

The bill for the relief of Reynold Coates, Walter R. Johnson, and William B. McMurtrie;

The bill to authorize Charles L. Fleischman to take out a patent;

The bill for the relief of William P. Rathbone; and

The bill to provide for the organization of a company of sappers, miners, and pontoniers.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of Chilton Allen, and others, reported the same unfavorably, without amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama addressed the Senate as follows: Mr. President, I feel it my duty to correct a statement which I find in the National Intelligencer of this morning, as to the motion made by me on Saturday evening, to print 20,000 copies of the report of the Secretary of War, for the reorganization and discipline of the militia. The paragraph to which I refer is in the following words:

"It was near six o'clock, when Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he was willing to move for th printing of 20,000 copies of the report of the Secretary with the other documents, and did make that motion, when there were cries of 'adjourn, adjourn!'

"And on motion of Mr. SEVIER, the Senate adjourned."

Now this statement is untrue, and of course unfair, in several particulars:

1. It was near six o'clock when I made the motion; but it was made at the earliest practicable moment after the motion to prin' 20,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia was decided, which was in strict conformity with the intimation of my purpose to do so, thrown out in the previous debate. I suffered no time to elapse after the motion to print the committee's report was decided. I did not wait purposely (as might be inferred from the Intelligencer) till the moment for adjournment arrived.

2. I said nothing about my willingness to make the motion; but moved directly, and distinctly, to print, for public information, the plan of Mr. Poinsett, with the plans proposed by Gen. Knox and Gen. Harrison, in their respective reports.

3. The Senate did not adjourn on the motion of my friend, the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER;] he expressed his willingness to vote for my motion, if the Opposition desired them printed; but they adjourned on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS;] which motion was made while my motion was pending, and undetermined.

And I will now add, that my motion to print the extraordinary number of the several plans mentioned for the organization and discipline of the militia, was not a mere ruse, but was made in good faith, to give light to the public; and if the gentlemen on the other side will call up that motion, I will still vote for it.

I have felt less inclined to ascribe these errors to accident, on account of another misstatement of the Intelligencer, which has appeared daily, at the head of our proceedings upon Mr. Poinsett's report. That paragraph is in the following words:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion to print 20,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia on Mr. Poinsett's project for a standing army of 100,000 militia.

Now, sir, Mr. Poinsett has submitted no "plan for a standing army of 100,000 militia." His plan purports to be one for the reorganization and discipline of the militia. I understand Reporters are admitted here to give a transcript of our proceedings—that is, a statement of facts, and not their construction or inferences. We are sufficiently libelled and slandered by letter writers. I am at least unwilling to tolerate it in Reporters.

THE DISTRICT BANKS.

On motion by Mr. MERRICK, the bill to incorporate the several banks of the District of Columbia, was taken up, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. TAPPAN to continue the charters for two years, for the sole purpose of enabling the banks to wind up their affairs.

Mr. MERRICK said, it was not now his intention to press the original bill. His sole object was to take up the amendment, and propose such amendments and modifications to it as might be deemed necessary. The Senate would perceive that the object of his amendment was to extend the charters of these banks till the 4th of July, 1842, unless Congress should think proper, in the mean time, to abolish them. The object of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was only to extend their charters, so as to allow them to collect their existing debts. Now he would mention one fact to the Senate. They could not, in the ordinary course of law, collect the debts due them by the 4th of July, 1842, because a suit at law must go through three sessions of the court, and these sessions are six months apart. Besides, he thought it would be onerous, oppressive, and illiberal to require the banks to proceed at once to the collection of their debts by suit at law. He would further remark that there was due to these banks, from the people of this District, upwards of two and a half millions of dollars, a sum too large to be collected in so short a time, without causing great distress to the community.

Mr. GRUNDY inquired of the chairman of the committee if the bill contained the same restrictions as were imposed by the bill passed two years ago to extend the charters of these banks up to this time?

Mr. MERRICK said he believed it did, with one or two exceptions, not now deemed necessary.

Mr. GRUNDY said he was averse to leaving these banks in a continued state of suspension. He wanted to put them in the same condition that they were put two years ago. He hoped the Senator from Maryland would conform, as far as possible, to the provisions of the bill passed two years ago.

Mr. MERRICK expressed his readiness to make the necessary amendments, and offered the following:

"So far as to enable said banks to sue and be sued on any contract now existing," and insert in lieu thereof, "eighteen hundred and forty-two, unless Congress shall otherwise order and direct."

And also inserting a proviso that the banks shall resume specie payments whenever the banks in Virginia and Maryland shall resume.

Mr. M. said that this proviso was inserted in the act of 1838, which extended the charters of these banks to this time.

Mr. KING suggested to the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. MERRICK,] the propriety of striking out the proviso, which seems to authorize the suspension of specie payments by the banks of this District, until those of Virginia and Maryland should resume. Tis true, such a proviso was contained in the resolution adopted two years past, which was offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] for the extension of these very banks, then in a state of suspension. He considered it wrong then, and no less so now. For one, he would not consent, by any legislation, to give a sanction to the suspension of specie payments by the banks of this District, nor would he, in any shape or form, release them from their obligations to the people. They are now subject to suit, on a failure to pay their notes on presentation. Every holder may, if he chooses, recover the amount held by him, with damages. This right he would not, in the slightest degree, impair. Mr. K. said he should vote for the proposed extension, believing, as he did, that it was essential to the preservation of the interests of the people of the District; but in doing so, he must have the banks subject to all the restrictions and liabilities imposed upon them by their charters.

Mr. MERRICK then withdrew the proviso.

Mr. ALLEN wished to inquire of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] whether these banks complied with all the conditions of the act of 1838, by which their charters were extended.

Mr. MERRICK said that, so far as he was advised, they did.

Mr. ALLEN. Are they paying specie now?

Mr. MERRICK said they were not. They suspended from causes not within their own control. When he answered the gentleman's inquiry whether the banks had complied with the conditions of their charters, he did not know that he had specie payments in view.

Mr. ALLEN said that it was a matter of notoriety that these banks did not exist. They had no legal existence whatever. They had not complied with the conditions by which their charters were extended, one of which was that they should commence and continue the payment of specie for their notes, on demand. They did not pay specie, and every body knew it. It should be known that they existed by usurpation, and here was an attempt to legalize this usurpation. He wanted the whole of the facts to be spread before the country. Who, he asked, had petitioned for the extension of these charters, and how many had signed these petitions? These banks had been standing out notoriously in violation of the law, and by the infliction of the deepest injuries on the community, had violated the law, and defied the power of Congress, within the sweep of its flag; and now it was asked, at the end of the session, without their being any particular information before them as to the state of these institutions, to grant them more charters, or, in other words, sanction their violation and defiance of the laws of the land. He wanted to see something of the condition of these institutions, and whether or not they had complied with the conditions by which their charters were extended. He called the attention of the Senator from Maryland to this subject long ago, and urged him to bring it up in time to be acted on, notifying him that it could not be got through with without the fullest investigation. All these matters were to him "confirmation strong as proof from holy writ," of the danger to this Government which existed in banking institutions. When it was seen that in that body, renowned for its intelligence and patriotism, these banks, after having violated their charters, and set the laws at defiance, could coolly walk in and claim the renewal of their charters, as if they had a right to act with impunity, and the Legislature was bound to obedience, it was enough to excite the gloomiest apprehensions. He would not go at length into this subject now, but he could not repress the deep indignation he felt at the matter-of-course way in which these banks attempted to get through with the renewal of their charters. All that was said against these abuses was answered by the cry, You are opposed to banks. He looked upon the present proposition as equivalent to a perpetual charter. They had already been chartered for two years on three conditions, not one of which was complied with; and though this was notorious, yet the Senate was about to charter them again. Where was the use of imposing conditions, if these institutions set them at defiance? It was in vain to impose conditions on them, for there was no power to punish them for violating those conditions. They had violated their charters with impunity in the face of the courts, and in the face of the Legislature which was now invoked to grant them more charters. You have not, said Mr. A. power to punish them, and yet you talk of imposing restrictions on them. Have you not already restrictions enough? Their original charters declare that they shall not suspend specie payments; they have suspended, and you have legalized the suspension. They went on to violate the conditions imposed on them, and you have legalized that violation. He did not intend to go at length into this subject, but if this question was persisted in, then he and others on his side of the chamber were to be heard in behalf of the abused people of the District of Columbia. This people had petitioned for an extension of their rights as freemen; but that was not considered a matter of sufficient moment to require legislation; but the banks had petitioned for a renewal of their charters, and it was deemed a matter of such importance, that it must be hurried through, without any statements with regard to their condition, or, in fact any information whatever.

Mr. TAPPAN would suppose, from the observations that had fallen from the chairman of the committee, [Mr. MERRICK] that his only object was to give to the banks time to settle up their affairs. His amendment had the same object in view; but as the Senator said that suits at law could not be determined in the time allowed, he would suggest to him that his object could be accomplished by extending it. He had no desire to press the banks to an immediate collection of their debts. He thought with the Senator from Maryland, that it would be a hardship on the people of the District, and he did not wish to impose it on them. He would suggest to the Senator that the amendment originally offered, would accomplish all he desired, by extending the time.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut expressed his objections to the bill on the ground that Congress did not possess the power to incorporate institutions to furnish a circulating medium.

Mr. MERRICK said he did not intend to enter into a discussion with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN.] The gentleman remarked that he gave him notice some time ago that he wished this subject brought up at an early day. Now the Senator must be aware that it was not in his power to bring it up earlier than he did. He had brought it up at the first moment that it was possible to do so.

Mr. BENTON spoke at length in opposition to the bill, and to the impolicy of extending the charters of these banks, without suitable restrictions. He considered the present question as equivalent to one for a perpetual charter. Was it ever known that the time granted by a Legislature to a bank to wind up its affairs had been used for that purpose. No, sir, (said Mr. B.) when the old charter of the first Bank of the United States was before Congress, a proposition was made to allow them two years to wind up in, and the answer to that proposition was: It is improper to grant them the two years—for that time will be used for gaining a new charter, and not in winding up. It was further answered that a charter was not necessary to enable them to wind up, because they could make an assignment of their effects, which would answer the same purpose. The two years were not allowed them, and he (Mr. B.) could undertake to say that they were twenty years in winding up their affairs. There was no necessity therefore in extending the charters of these banks, for if the object was for them to wind up their affairs, they could do so as well without a charter as with one. It seemed to him that to go on in this way, was to make a mere burlesque of legislation, and that it was converting the Congress of the United States into a place for mere child's play. It seemed that having created institutions superior to law, they went on to trample on the law, and that Congress, unable to control them, yielded perpetually to their demands. What occasion was there for banks of circulation in this District? What occasion was there for paper money? Did not the Federal Government pay out five times as much hard money as the business of the place could employ. There were limitations to the employment of money, and it was in vain to seek to go beyond them. What were these charters granted for? That certain individuals might put out bits of paper, stamped with pictures, for which they get the hard money that is put out by the Government, and which is carried to Philadelphia to be shipped to Europe. Those who issued these bits of paper, affected to be under the necessity of stopping whenever other stopped. One bank stops, and falsely charges it upon the Administration—thereupon every one stops, and each says, I don't stop because there is a necessity for it, but because others have stopped. Thus they go on in a circle. What next? In that entire circle they all say, we are ready to begin paying specie, when the others do so; but they are all so exceedingly modest that no one will set the example. Why not commence here? Why it is said they cannot pay specie here, because others at a distance do not. Now you might as well tell me that you cannot eat bread and drink water, for the same reasons. If the banks really wanted to resume and continue payment of specie, all they had to do was to banish broken bank paper from their counters. If they would do this, and continue it, they would have more gold and silver at their counters, than they will be able to employ. How was it with the New York banks? They were now absolutely choked up with gold and silver, and all this was in consequence of their having resumed specie payments, and continued them. I tell the gentleman, said Mr. B. that it is in vain to say that they cannot maintain specie payments here. I tell him that it can be done in the smallest possible space; and that by the simple process of receiving no broken bank paper. If the banks in the District, instead of circulating insolvent paper, would neither receive nor pay out such paper, they would, instead of suspending, have more specie than they would know what to do with. He would say a word or two with regard to the actual condition of these banks. We continued, said he, their charters, on condition that they were to do certain acts, and they have violated it. In the first place, they were required to pay out no notes of a smaller denomination than five dollars. He had been informed that, for the purpose of evading that provision, one of these institution had struck off a new class of notes—six, seven, eight, and nine dollars. He would be glad if the gentleman from Maryland would inform him whether such was the fact.

Mr. MERRICK. I have seen such notes.

Mr. BENTON. I understand that as soon as we passed the restriction prohibiting the banks from paying out notes under five dollars, they put the matter in the hands of a lawyer, and he told them how to get round and evade the provision; and that was to strike off these six, seven, eight, and nine dollar notes. Now, what is this, but making a burlesque of our legislation? But these banks, continued Mr. B. are in a different condition from others which have suspended. Their time had run out. Some of them had been in existence twenty, thirty, and some perhaps forty years. It was then their duty to settle up their affairs, pay off their debts, and be done with it. Instead of that, they were going upon the assumption of an indefinite extension of their charters, though refusing to redeem their promises; and Congress was called upon to sanction all they had done.

He should be glad to see some vote of the Senate that would give an index of the course that was to be followed. When he saw that, he should be able to judge of the course that was to be pursued. Was it right that there should exist in any country of law and Government, any institution that was superior to both, and which could not only trample on the laws with impunity, but appeal to the Legislatures to sanction its violations of law and justice? He hoped that they would be able to prove that no institutions should exist here superior to the laws of the land; and that whenever they trampled them under foot, they should meet with the deserved punishment.

Mr. TAPPAN opposed the amendment offered by Mr. MERRICK at length. He examined the question of the power of Congress to grant charters to banking corporations. By the Constitution we have the power to legislate for the District in all cases. But with that power is the implied restriction to pass no laws that shall bear unequally on any portion of the community. We have power to make equal and just laws, but no power to make unequal and unjust laws. For instance, were we asked to incorporate a company or companies to furnish the inhabitants with meat, who would have the exclusive right of furnishing that commodity to the citizens, and the public were restricted from purchasing of any others, would it be considered just or proper? If we have the power to create one monopoly, we have the power to create another. If we have the power to authorize a few individuals to furnish and control the circulating medium of the community, we have the same power to charter companies to provide meat, flour, wood, coal, each variety of clothing, &c. In short, no article of luxury, of comfort, or necessity, but what may be made the subject of monopoly. Now, if it was proposed to charter companies for any such purposes, no one would pretend we had any power to do so, and yet they would stand on precisely the same ground as the monopoly of the currency asked for by the corporations in this bill. Mr. T. contended that there was no equivalent benefit conferred on the community for the privileges conferred on these institutions. There was an abundance of gold and silver circulated in the District by the operations of the General Government, to furnish a hard money currency—five times the amount that could be absorbed by the wants and the business of the District. If charters are granted to these banks, the effect is to drive this gold and silver from circulation, and gives them the monopoly of supplying its place with their own notes. If such power was granted to these corporations, it could only be on the same grounds as would justify the granting of charters to companies, with the exclusive right of supplying provisions and clothing to the community. He contended that it was beyond the power of any Legislature to pass such laws. It was a power they did not possess. It could not be conferred, because it did not exist in any community, and the exercise of it was a usurpation. Mr. T. called for the reading of the following memorial, which had been presented to Congress, and was numerously signed:

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of undersigned, citizens of Washington, D. C. respectfully represents—

That the suspension of payment by the banks of the District of Columbia is a gross and palpable violation, by which valuable privileges were conferred upon them; that it is an outrage upon the moral sense of the community in which they are situated,

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, JUNE 23, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 30.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

debasing and demoralizing in its tendency and example, and a grievous injury and oppression upon those who are compelled to take their notes at their nominal value in payment for their labor.

That the mere association of a number of individuals in the form of a chartered company, gives them no license for dishonesty, or impunity for crime, in their aggregate, more than in their individual capacity.

That the banking institutions of the District having been chartered professedly for the purpose of promoting the interests and convenience of the inhabitants thereof, we are the best, and should be the only, judges in what manner our interests and convenience are best promoted.

That, at the suspension of payments by the banks of this District, in the second week of October, 1839, they had in circulation upwards of seven hundred thousand paper dollars, which by that act were depreciated 12½ per cent., inflicting a loss of upwards of one hundred thousand dollars on the holders thereof; that the rates of depreciation since that period, have ranged from 12½ to 8 per cent., thus filching from the workingman, from one-eighth to one-twelfth of the wages of his labor.

That the practical operation of this state of things in the District is, that while those who are in the service of the Government receive their compensation in gold and silver, their neighbors are compelled to receive, as a return for their labor, depreciated bank paper; thus constituting, emphatically, one currency for the Government and another for the people.

They, therefore, pray your honorable body to take such measures as may, at the earliest possible day, compel the banks of the District to fulfil their obligations by the resumption of specie payments, or that they be required to assign their property for the benefit of their creditors, and wind up their affairs.

Mr. MERRICK called for the reading of a memorial, signed by many citizens of Georgetown, praying for a recharter of the banks, and that they may not be compelled to resume before the banks of Virginia and Maryland. The memorial was read.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. MERRICK to the amendment, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 29, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Ky. Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Huntington, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, and Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—13.

Mr. ALLEN moved an amendment, stating the fact that they were non-specie paying banks, which amendment was rejected—yeas 15, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Henderson, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Huntington, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, and Young—27.

Mr. BENTON moved an amendment, as follows: "Upon condition that said banks shall not issue and pay out the notes of any bank, banker, or banking institution which is in a state of suspension or non-payment of specie."

Mr. B. said that he did not offer his amendment to prevent the banks from receiving such paper as they pleased, but to make them send it home for collection. It was to prevent the conventional agreements among themselves, by which they flooded the country with irredeemable paper. Each one received the paper of the other and sent it around and around in a circle, and thus, though it was nothing but counters—worthless bits of paper, the people were seduced into taking it. It was to break this chain, which enabled them to impose upon the country, that he offered his amendment. If they chose to receive this paper in payment of the debts due them or on deposite, they must send it home for collection.

Mr. KING supposed that the object of the gentleman was to limit the banks to the circulation of their own paper. He thought if he would turn to the amendment that he would find that they could issue out no paper whatever in a state of suspension. If the gentleman would modify his amendment he would vote for it.

Mr. BENTON said that if the exception was made, it would give the banks express authority to pay out suspended paper.

Mr. BUCHANAN was entirely in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, if he would express it in language sufficiently distinct to prevent its giving any sanction, directly or indirectly, of the suspensions of these banks. One of the greatest evils of these suspensions was, that the banks never paid out their own notes at home. If they did, the people would have an opportunity of compelling them by law to redeem these notes; but it was obvious that it would cost the holders of them too much to collect them by process of law at a distance.

The consequence of such a practice by the banks was, that, as soon as specie payments were suspended, the people around each of the banks were at once, in a great degree, deprived of the paper currency to which they had been accustomed, and in which they placed confidence, and were compelled to accept the notes of distant banks, often of doubtful solvency, or get nothing. It was no hardship upon the banks to compel them to pay out their own notes alone during the period of suspension, and to send home the notes of other banks which they might think proper to receive. Under such a restriction, the banks of this District would receive no notes unless they had been issued by banks able and willing to make exchanges with them at short intervals; and frequent settlements of this kind were a powerful restraint upon excessive issues. The amendment would secure to the people of the District that currency with which they were best acquainted, and on which they could, at any time, bring suit without being obliged to travel to a distance. He was in favor of the principle contained in the amendment. He was for giving the banks of this District time to wind up their affairs, and nothing more; and he intended, before this matter was over, to introduce an amendment declaring that such was the sole purpose for which their charters were to be extended. He had long been of the opinion that, to keep six or seven little banks here, was doing a serious injury to the people of the District. It was no time now to substitute a larger bank for those now in existence, and he was therefore willing to extend the charters of the latter, provided it was only to enable them to go on for two years, and no longer, for the purpose of winding up their affairs.

Mr. GRUNDY said, the effect of the amendment, if passed in its present shape, would not be exactly what he supposed was intended. If the words "not within the District of Columbia," were introduced, he thought it would be better.

Mr. BENTON said, he preferred the motion as it stood; but if gentlemen thought it would create difficulties, he would withdraw it, and they could offer it in a form modified to suit their views.

Mr. GRUNDY then offered the motion amended as he had suggested.

Mr. WRIGHT said, in its present shape, the provision would countenance the emission and circulation of the notes of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal—the Washington and Baltimore Railroad Company, &c.

Mr. BUCHANAN suggested a modification, by inserting the word "other" before "bank," and striking out District of Columbia; which was agreed to, and the amendment then read in the following words:

"Upon condition that neither of said banks shall issue and pay out the notes of any other bank, banker, banking institutions, or corporation, which is in a state of suspension or non-payment of its liabilities in specie."

The question on this amendment was taken by yeas and nays, when there appeared for it 25, against 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, and White—17.

Mr. ALLEN then moved the following:

"Provided, also, that each of said banks shall, immediately upon the taking effect of this joint resolution, commence and continue the resumption of its notes in gold and silver coin; and that, in case either of said banks shall neglect or refuse to comply with any one of the conditions in this joint resolution, the charter of said bank shall immediately cease to exist, and all contracts and other acts thereafter made or done by or in behalf of such bank shall be null and void."

On this question the yeas and nays were demanded, when there appeared for it 14, against it 29, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Huntington, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, and Young—29.

Mr. BENTON moved further to amend by inserting:

"And upon the further condition that the said banks, nor either of them, shall take a stay of execution on any judgment recovered against them in any case whatever, nor appeal from any such judgment, nor take a certiorari thereon, except on an affidavit of merit."

Mr. BENTON said that when he first came here after the suspension, individuals were paying 12½ per cent. discount on their bank paper, and he asked them why they did not sue the banks and obtain judgment. He was informed that when notes were put in suit, the banks would take the advantage of the stay laws that were in operation, by which they could keep the owner out of his money for six months. This, with lawyers' fees, &c. was generally more than the note was worth, so that the poor man, who was the owner of a five or ten dollar note, actually had no remedy, though the laws professed to give him one.

After some remarks from Mr. MERRICK in opposition, and Mr. CLAY of Alabama in favor of the amendment,

Mr. BUCHANAN said: It is out of all character for a bank, after forfeiting its charter, and after suffering judgment to go against it for non-payment of its notes, to take a stay of execution. It is certainly enough for us to continue their charters for two years without giving the banks a stay of execution for six months when sued on their notes.

If I had known that any such practice existed here as that spoken of by the Senator from Missouri, I would myself have offered this amendment if he had not done it.

Mr. SOUTHARD could see no more impropriety of a bank taking advantage of existing laws, than of an individual doing so. If we passed this amendment, its operation would be unequal, and would make one law for the banks and another or individuals. Besides, what evidence had we of the fact that the banks took advantage of these stay laws? He did not believe there was any stay of execution in the District at the instance of the debtor, and he demanded the proof. He would not take the allegation of A B, or C D, that such and such things were matters of fact. It was not the kind or character of information that we, as legislators, should act upon.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed his astonishment at the principle which had been contended for by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD.] He thought that after a little reflection that gentleman would himself abandon this principle, well acquainted as he was with the subject of banking. What was his position? That it would be unjust to refuse to the banks the same stay of execution, after judgments had been been obtained against them, which was granted to individuals. Is there not, said Mr. B. the most striking reason for such a discrimination? Is there not a vast difference between the two cases?

To the banks we have granted the privilege of issuing and circulating a paper currency. Bank notes always are, or at least always ought to be, payable on demand; and under our present banking system are, every where in this country, a substitute for money. These notes circulate upon the faith that they shall at all times be convertible into gold and silver. It is true that this faith has been often violated, and will continue to be violated, unless the States shall radically reform their banking institutions. The principle, however, remains the same. A poor man, then, has received a ten or a twenty dollar note as money, in compensation for his labor, and goes to the counter of the bank and asks that it shall be redeemed in gold and silver. The bank refuses to comply with its promise, and the holder of the note is put to the trouble and expense of instituting a suit against it, and obtaining a judgment. Would it not be the most monstrous injustice to allow this bank to avail itself of the ordinary privileges granted to individuals, of staying execution for three or six months? He thought he might venture to assert, without positive knowledge, that there was not a single State in the Union where such a privilege was extended to banks. Certainly it ought not to exist any where.

The case was wholly different in regard to judgments obtained by one individual against another, or by banks against individuals, to enforce private contracts. In such cases these contracts were voluntary, and each party derived, or thought he derived, a benefit from them, and the evidence of debt was not a paper currency. But bank notes circulated in the community as money, and every person by the force of circumstances was compelled to accept them as money. It was a great and profitable privilege conferred upon the banks to be permitted to issue them; and this was granted upon the express condition that they should always be redeemed in specie. Under such circumstances, after the banks have refused to redeem their notes according to their contract, and have compelled the holders to institute suits and obtain judgments, it would be a most unjust and extraordinary privilege to grant them a stay of execution.

This bill proposes to continue these banks for two years, unless Congress shall, in the mean time, otherwise direct. Even during this limited period, we wisely reserve to ourselves the power of blotting them out of existence at any moment. The bill is a measure of necessity, not of choice. For my own part, I have often expressed the opinion that these six small banks ought never to be rechartered within this District of only ten miles square. They have no field for circulation, and no deposites sufficient to enable each of them to realize a fair profit on their capital, and at the same time keep themselves in a sound condition. We ought to establish one respectable bank here, with branches in Alexandria and Georgetown, and subject it to all the restrictions which our fatal experience on the subject has manifested to be absolutely necessary. It is admitted, however, on all hands that Congress have not time, at the present session, to mature and pass such a bill; and if they had, it is a most unpropitious period to create such a bank. The only alternative then left, is either to continue the existence of these little banks for a short period, or to destroy them at once, and subject their debtors to the immediate pressure which this course would render necessary. I prefer to continue them under an express understanding, so far as I am concerned, that they shall never exist, under any circumstances, one day beyond the 4th July, 1842. I intend to move an amendment to this effect. This is but a mere temporary expedient, in order to give us time to establish a new bank, on wiser and better principles, without oppressing the debtors of these institutions.

I am influenced in adopting this course by the consideration that the surrounding States of Maryland and Virginia, of which this District formed a part, and with whom it is intimately connected in all transactions of business, have not thought proper to forfeit the charters of their banks, because of their suspension of specie payments. In acting with a spirit of forbearance towards the District banks, I should not in any degree legalize their suspension. This bill proposes to do no such thing. It leaves them in this respect just where it found them, liable to be sued for specie at any moment by their note holders and depositors, and subject to the payment of twelve per cent. interest. But it would, to a considerable degree, be legalizing this suspension, if we were to permit the banks, after a judgment obtained against them, to take the benefit of a stay of execution. During this period of the stay, they could, under the existing law, place their creditors at defiance. We now propose to deprive them of this extravagant privilege; and so firmly am I convicted of its injustice, that for one I shall vote against the bill and leave these banks to their fate, unless the amendment shall be adopted. Until this day, I had never been informed, that under the laws of the District, the banks were entitled to the same stay of execution with individuals.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana concurred in the sentiment of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, but he thought that the Judiciary Committee had done all that was necessary on this subject, and there was a bill now on the calendar, which provided for the necessary remedy for the evil.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut said that the bill could not be amended or presented in such shape as to meet his approbation, while he entertained the opinion that the Constitution does not invest Congress, as a local Legislature, with the power to grant a bank charter to any company, either in the District of Columbia, or in any of the States of the Union. If Congress had power to establish a bank in the States, then, in his opinion, it would have the power to grant charters, and establish banks in the District without any reference to its powers as a local Legislature. The friends of this bill, I presume rely upon the power given to Congress, "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over the District." To furnish a general currency, is a business of the nation; it is an attribute of sovereignty. The Constitution has vested this power in Congress; and when we turn to the Constitution for our guide, we find that Congress is empowered "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." This is the only currency known to our Constitution, unless Congress has power, in virtue of its local character, when legislating for the District of Columbia, to establish another currency, varying entirely in all its essential characteristics, from the general currency of the nation, which Congress is authorized and empowered to establish as a national currency, which I am not prepared to believe was ever intended. If we look further into the Constitution, we shall find provision made for guarding the currency against counterfeiting it; and which provides only for the current coin of the United States. It will, therefore, be seen that no provision is made to guard a paper currency against debasement; and it is reasonable to conclude, from this important omission, that no such currency was contemplated when the Constitution was framed. The general currency recognised in the Constitution can be circulated freely throughout the whole Union, and answer the purposes of the people as well in one part as another, while that to be emitted by a bank established in the District of Columbia, by authority of Congress, as a local Legislature, legislating only for the District, is circumscribed to the limits of the District, if the States into which it may otherwise, like other bank bills, circulate, shall think proper to prohibit it. The States were deprived of the power to emit bills of credit, or make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts. I may differ in my view of this subject with every other Senator; but I cannot come to any other conclusion than this, that Congress was empowered to "coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." Whatever capacity it might act in, be it general or local, it could not have been intended that while it was acting as a National Legislature, it should create one kind of currency, and when acting as a local Legislature for the District of Columbia, it should create another kind of currency, differing from the other so widely as coin and promissory notes differ with each other.

It is said by the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] that, if the amendment prevails, the corporation will not have equal rights with individuals; that while individuals, under the law of the District, can have a stay of execution for six months, after judgment rendered against them for a debt, the corporations will be deprived of that right and privilege, which may be very valuable to the corporation. He did not intend that corporations should be placed on an equal footing with individuals in regard to the payment of their debts. He had before observed that the power to create a national currency belonged to the national sovereignty; that if this power was abstracted from the political power of the people or the nation, and conferred upon individuals, that these individuals were bound to furnish for the people a circulating medium or currency perfectly sound, and equal to that which that power given to them, if retained by the sovereign, would enable it to furnish. It ought to be such a currency as would circulate freely and untrammeled by any laws made for the benefit of the corporation, to the injury of those who had taken and confided in it, as a sound national currency. And although he expected to vote against the bill, whatever shape or form may be given to it, if the charter must be granted, he was desirous of having the public have the benefit of it, for whose benefit it is professed to be granted. He was unable to see the necessity, if Congress has the power, of granting so many banks, and creating so much banking capital in this small District, only ten miles square. One single house in a commercial city, will probably do as much business, and require as much capital, as all the mercantile business done in this city. He had long entertained the opinion, that either the banking system of this country, or the institutions and Government of our country, have yet to undergo a great change; that both cannot exist together, and both maintain their present character.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes 29, noes 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Dixon, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, and White—11.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved to insert, "For the purpose of winding up their affairs."

Mr. ALLEN rose, he said, to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what effect he intended this amendment, if adopted, to produce? Does he intend to restrict the banks to the settlement of their business already begun? or does he intend, notwithstanding this amendment, that they may proceed, as formerly, with all the business of banking, as if this amendment did not exist?

Mr. BUCHHANAN said he did not intend at once to arrest all banking operations in this District, under the peculiar circumstances in which it was placed, without providing any substitute for the existing banks; but it was his fixed purpose never to vote for any further extension of their banking privileges beyond the two years. He desired, therefore, to express this clear intention upon the face of the bill, so that the banks might have fair notice of the purpose of Congress, and proceed in such a manner as they thought proper to wind up their affairs within the limited period.

Mr. ALLEN rejoined. Then the amendment amounts to nothing, as it does not restrict the banks, and cannot restrict a future Congress. It is, therefore, worse than useless, for its effect will be to delude the country, inasmuch as the amendment professes to restrict the banks to "the purpose of winding up, but not to restrict their action to that object; but on the contrary, instead of winding up, they are to be at liberty to wind out their business still further than it is now—so that at the end of the two years, their claim to still further time to "wind up," will be increased in exact proportion to the increase of their business, under the present bill, authorizing them to wind up. I say, therefore, that the effect of this amendment is to mislead the people as to the true character of this bill, which, whether the amendment be adopted or not, is simply a bill to recharter non-specie paying broken banks, without requiring them even to pay their notes—the first bill I believe of the sort that ever, in the history of the world, received the sanction of a legislative body.

The amendment was lost—ayes 17, noes 17.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was agreed to—ayes 27, noes 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Huntington, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—15.

The following is the bill as ordered to be engrossed:

"An act to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District for two years, with certain restrictions."

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the charters of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the 4th day of July, 1842, unless Congress shall in the mean time otherwise order and direct, upon condition that neither of said banks shall issue and pay out the notes of any other bank, banker, or banking institution, or corporation, which is in a state of suspension or non-payment of its liabilities in specie; and upon the further condition that the said banks, nor either of them, shall take a stay of execution on any judgment recovered against them in any case whatever, nor appeal from such judgment, nor take a certiorari thereon, except on an affidavit of merit.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said, that, since Congress could not legislate thoroughly at the present session, and place the banking system on a stable and satisfactory footing, all that he thought should be now done, was to continue the existing charters for one or two years; and, in the intervening time, Congress could make a permanent arrangement. He was utterly opposed to treating the District and its banks as a subject for experiment, and to throwing those little institutions into a sort of crucible to discover the philosophical or political phenomena which, when exposed to that test, they might exhibit. He thought such a course unworthy the legislation of a great and magnanimous nation; and might expose Congress to the imputation that, since it could not reach the banks of the States, it would exercise its vengeance on the banks of the District.

Mr. C. thought a temporary continuation of the banks, without condition or restriction, is all that should now be done. He had therefore voted against the amendment which prohibited the banks from paying out, after receiving, the notes of banks situated without the District. The notes of the banks, at Richmond or Baltimore, are quite as good as the notes of the District banks. And the operation of such a prohibition will be upon the debtors of the banks, and not upon the banks themselves. Upon the debtors themselves it will operate severely. For if the banks are not allowed to pay out, they will be sure not to receive the notes of distant banks.

He was also opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN.] The amendment will accomplish, practically, nothing. It requires the banks to prepare, by winding up their affairs, for a termination of their charters, at the expiration of the period to which they are to be prolonged; but it makes no adequate provision by which the banks will be compelled to perform that duty. With respect to the object at which the Senator aims, that of establishing a single bank for the District, to be placed in Washinton, with branches in the other two cities, Mr. C. concurred entirely with him. According to his (Mr. C's) observation, those banking systems worked best in the several States, which consisted of two or three large and respectable banks, with branches conveniently located, instead of a multitude of small banks having no necessary connection with each other. And whenever there was definitive legislation upon the banking system of the District, he hoped it would assume that form.

Mr. BUCHANAN had but a few words to say in reply to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY.] He would add nothing to that which he had already said in favor of the amendment to prohibit each one of these banks from paying out the notes of any suspended bank except its own. He thought it would prove to be a most wise restriction.

In regard to the amendment which he had proposed, declaring in express terms that the temporary continuance of these charters was for the purpose of enabling them to wind up their concerns, he had but one observation to make. He had accomplished the purpose which he had in view by proposing the amendment. All doubt was thus removed from his own course in relation to this subject. He regretted that his amendment had not prevailed, because it might inspire the banks with hopes which he believed never would be realized. It is true that a future Congress might be of a different opinion, and one Congress could not bind another; but yet that was no good reason why the present Congress should not express its own determination by its own legislation.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved that the Senate take up the resolution reported by the Committee on the Militia, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the report of the Secretary of War in relation to the reorganization and disciplining of the militia, and that the Senate concur therein; which was agreed to—ayes 24, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Andrson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Stnrgeon, Walker, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Davis, Dixon, and Preston—4.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
MONDAY, June 15, 1840.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JAMES demanded the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. WISE hoped his colleague would withdraw his motion, to enable him to submit a resolution for the adjournment of the present session on the 11th of July next.

Mr. JONES thought the proper course would be to do the business of the country first, and then fix the day of adjournment. He could not yield to the suggestion.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, by yeas and nays, and agreed to—yeas 87, nays 43.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. POPE, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the committee in opposition to the bill, and in favor of a Bank of the United States. He said he told his constituents that a Bank of the United States alone could regulate the currency and exchanges. When the question was before Congress in 1811, he explained the subject, and formed the opinion that they must have a paper currency, either local or national. If the country have a local currency, it must of necessity have a regulator—and that regulator must be a National Bank. He voted in 1811 for the Bank of the United States; and he had no reason to repent of his vote on that occasion. He, however, thought, that neither a Bank of the United States or a Sub-Treasury should be passed at this session—he thought the people should be left to decide upon it in the present contest—that this contest should be first decided. Mr. P. in speaking of the opinions of General Harrison, said he would not veto a Bank of the United States if it was the will of the people to have one—that he was opposed to all internal improvements by the General Government not strictly national or for necessary and constitutional objects—that he was for a fair, just, and liberal tariff. He continued his argument in favor of a bank of the United States as a regulator of the currency, as an antagonist one to the Independent Treasury, which he said was insufficient, and inadequate, to regulate the issues of the banks of the States. He begged the Whigs not to be afraid to meet the question boldly, and contended that the issue would be between an Independent Treasury bank under the control of the Executive, and a Bank of the United States.

The House took a recess at 2½ o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. POPE resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BLACK then took the floor in support of the bill. In common with other gentlemen, he had no hope of influencing the minds of any opponent of the bill, but his remarks were designed for his constituents, the people of Georgia. He congratulated the House and the country that this measure had for once been brought to a direct issue before the people. As had been stated by a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] this was definitely the measure of the Administration, and it was on that measure that he grounded his support of the Administration. He then showed it was evident that a National Bank was the antagonistical scheme of the Opposition. So here was a palpable and distinct issue—the Independent Treasury bill on the one hand, and a National Bank on the other. Mr. B. went on to prove that with a few exceptions the great Whig party was a Bank party. That, then, was the true issue, and under those two flags was the battle to be fought. For his part, he gloried in the declaration that he should go into that war under the banner of the Independent Treasury, and in doing so he would be supported with the consciousness that this measure was in accordance with the Constitution, while the measure of the Opposition was liable to the double objection of being unconstitutional and inexpedient.

Mr. B. then went on to show that his own course in this matter was the same as that taken by the Legislature of his State, and had read by the CLERK, resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Georgia, in 1834, denouncing a National Bank as unconstitutional and inexpedient. He also adverted to subsequent resolutions of a similar character, which will appear when his remarks shall be written out in full. He also adverted to letters addressed by the people of Georgia to their candidates, in 1838, asking their sentiments in relation to this measure. With others, he received a letter; in his answer, he distinctly avowed his preference to it, and his hostility to a National Bank. Two of his colleagues, then on the floor, also expressed their disapproval of a National Bank. Thus, in 1838, not only himself, but his two colleagues, were against a National Bank; so it would appear that he was not only consistent himself, but that he had the approbation of some of the most eminent men from Georgia, in his opposition to the bank. Where, then, was the ground for attacking his consistency, and with what weapons could they make their attack?

Mr. B. then adverted to a proposition made by Colonel Gamble, of Georgia, in 1834, for a Sub-Treasury bill more ultra than the present, and containing a specie clause. He did this with a view of showing, that in supporting the present bill, he was sanctioned by the course of one of the most eminent men that his State ever produced, although he regretted to say that Colonel Gamble had suffered himself to be nominated by the Whigs.

After some explanations from Messrs. KING and NISBET of Georgia,

Mr. BLACK proceeded to read the votes in favor of the proposition of Colonel Gamble, in 1834, for a Sub-Treasury bill, and which concluded with the name of Mr. WISE.

Mr. WISE explained under what circumstances that vote was given. He never in life even countenanced, or intended to countenance, a Sub-Treasury project. That vote in 1834 was given merely to test the sincerity of the Administration party, and not with any view of favoring such a measure.

After some further explanations from Mr. F. THOMAS in relation to the votes on that bill of 1834,

Mr. BLACK resumed his remarks, and spoke until nearly seven o'clock; when, without concluding, he gave way to

Mr. M. A. COOPER, on whose motion the committee rose.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi gave notice of intention to introduce a resolution to change the hour of meeting of the House to 10 o'clock, instead of 11 o'clock.

Mr. WISE moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were refused. Then

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 16, 1840.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the memorials of the following named persons, to wit: Estevan Plauche, Joshua Kennedy, Joshua Howard, Joseph Robedoux, John Forbes, Thomas Power, Margaret Deveal, Littleton Bailey, Anson C. Surlls, and resolutions of the General Assembly of the Legislature of Louisiana, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof. Mr. L. remarked that most of the cases were provided for, so far as the Senate was concerned, by the passage of a bill in relation to the sixteenth sections. The motion was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the memorials above enumerated.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT.

The bill for the incorporation of the Bank of the District of Columbia being taken up on its third reading,

Mr WALL hoped that the question on the passage of the bill would not be taken at this early hour, when the Senate was so thin—indeed, when here was not a quorum present. He hoped, therefore, that gentlemen would consent to lay the bill on the table, until some of the absent Senators should take their seats.

Mr. KING thought the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey a very proper one, and hoped it would be agreed to.

Several Senators objecting to postponing the question,

Mr. NORVELL demanded the ayes and noes, which were ordered.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was carried in the affirmative—ayes 20, noes 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Huntington, King, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Webster, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—13.

While the yeas and nays were calling,

Mr. BENTON rose to a point of order. The long established practice of the Senate was to put no bill on its passage until the hour of 12. The propriety of the practice was obvious, in the present condition of the Senate. He thought the rule was a proper one, and should not be departed from.

[The rule, as stated in Jefferson's Manual, is in the following words: "After 12 o'clock bills ready for it are put on their passage."]

The VICE PRESIDENT then explained the circumstances under which the bill was put on its passage. When the Senate was called to order, the CHAIR had announced that the presentation of petitions was in order; there being no petitions, reports of standing committees were called for and received; the next business on the Secretary's table was the bills on the third reading. A suggestion was made that the bill should be postponed until the Senate was full; but, after a conversation among Senators, it was not pressed, and the bill was accordingly put on its passage.

Mr. TAPPAN said that the very early period at which the bill had been taken upon its passage, had prevented him from making a motion for its recommitment, in order that it might be amended in a very important particular—that of rendering the stockholders individually liable for the debts of the bank. He was engaged on business in the committee room and came into the Senate chamber at 11 o'clock and found the question was taking on the passage of the bill. Though not sufficiently long a member of the Senate to speak authoritatively on this subject, he thought it was unusual, if not unprecedented, to put a bill, involving questions of such magnitude, on its passage at so early an hour, and with a thin Senate. Having been deprived, in the manner stated, of offering the motion at the proper time, he would ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer the following:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report a provision excepting from its operation all such parts of the several acts incorporating said banks, as excuse or exonerate the stockholders in said bank from their legal liability upon any contracts made by such banks.

Mr. MERRICK objecting, the resolution could not be entertained.

The question on the title of the bill coming up,

Mr. MERRICK moved to amend by substituting "An act to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia."

Mr. NORVELL moved to amend the substitute by the following: "An act to extend the charters of the suspended banks of the District of Columbia," and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. GRUNDY proposed to add to the end of the substitute of the Senator from Maryland the words, "for two years;" which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested the addition of the words, "unless otherwise ordered by Congress;" which was agreed to.

Mr. PIERCE was extremely sorry to see this special pleading on the small matter of the title of the bill. He had voted against it in all its stages, but a large majority of the Senate had voted in favor of the passage of the bill, and to this decision he would submissively bow. He hoped the friends of the bill would be permited to give it that title which would express the intention of the body of it.

Mr. ALLEN concurred perfectly in the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the friends of this bill should give it such a title as would designate the object of it, and for the purpose of carrying this more perfectly into effect, he hoped they would consent to the insertion of the word "supended" before "banks."

This was not agreed to, and the substitute of Mr. MERRICK, as amended, being read in the following words:

"An act to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia for two years, with certain restrictions, or until otherwise ordered by Congress;"

Mr. KING moved to strike out "or until otherwise ordered by Congress," which was agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. NORVELL's amendment, and it was negatived—ayes 11, noes 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Huntington, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Webster, and Young—26.

The bill, in addition to the several acts regulating the shipment and discharge of seamen, and the duties of consuls, was taken up as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PRESTON moved that 10,000 copies of the plan of the Secretary of War, for the organization and discipline of the militia, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to amend, by including the report of General Knox, and the reports of General Harrison, on the same subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRESTON then moved that the two bills accompanying the reports, should also be appended to the document; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then moved to amend, by adding the two bills of 1792 and 1803, now on our statute books on the same subject; which was agreed to—ayes 27, noes 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—16.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

CLAIM OF FULTON'S HEIRS.

The report of the Committee on Claims, adverse to the claim of the heirs of Robert Fulton was then taken up, and

Mr. PHELPS addressed the Senate at much length in opposition to the report, and in favor of the claim.

Mr. MERRICK then submitted a motion to amend the report of the committee, by reversing their decision; which was negatived—ayes 17, noes 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Dixon, Fulton, Huntington, Linn, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, and White—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Davis, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Strange, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—21.

The report of the committee, adverse to the claim, was then adopted.

Andt he Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 16, 1840.

Mr. BOND asked the consent of the House to enable him to make a report from the select committee, on the memorial of William Wright in relation to the settlement of the affairs of the Commonwealth Bank of Massachusetts with the Government.

Objection having been made,

Mr. BOND asked for a suspension of the rules to enable him to make the report; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which, having been ordered, were—yeas 55, nays 84.

So the rules were not suspended.

PILOT LAW.

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order, during the morning hour, was the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH] to recommit to the Committee on Commerce the bill reported from that committee by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HILLEN] to repeal the law of 1837, regulating pilots. The question immediately pending was the call for the previous question.

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, inquired of the CHAIR whether it was in order to move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

The CHAIR replied that it was not—the previous question having been called for.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that there be a call of the House; and upon which motion,

Mr. CURTIS having demanded the yeas and nays, they were ordered, and were—yeas 39, nays 114.

So a call was refused.

Mr. HILLEN inquired of the CHAIR, whether, if the previous question was seconded, it did not cut off the motion to recommit.

The CHAIR replied that it did; and that the question would be on ordering the bill to be read the second time.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered, and the question now being, "Shall the bill be read a second time."

Mr. WELLER demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 93, nays 89.

So the bill having been ordered to be read the second time, received that reading, and the question being, "Shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?"

Mr. TILLINGHAST opposed the engrossment of the bill, deprecating all party feeling, and contending that the original law was proper in its nature, and that it was not in derogation of private right, but, in fact, an enlargement thereof; and that its operation upon life and property had been demonstrated already to be of the most beneficial and salutary character.

Mr. TOLAND also made some remarks, in the midst of which he was cut off by the expiration of the morning hour, and which, like those of Mr. TILLINGHAST, were, from the confusion in the Hall, heard very imperfectly. Mr. TOLAND addressed himself, he said, not to any party, but to the House. The question was one which involved the business interests of the country to a much greater extent than had been supposed. He regretted that any allusion had been made to it as a party matter—it was not in fact so. It might, indeed, for aught we knew, affect a particular party in New York or New Jersey, (though he could not himself see how it was to do so,) but sure he was that it was no party question in the community which he represented; nor did he believe it to be so in the country generally. It was a question affecting the interests not only of the different parts of the United States, but of the whole commercial world.

Who are the parties asking for a repeal of the law? They were the pilots of New York—and, as it seemed to him, the pilots alone—the very parties to regulate whose conduct the law itself was passed by a vote of this House, almost, and, so far as he knew, entirely unanimous.

These were the persons who now came here to ask for a repeal of the law. It was natural that they should desire to rid themselves of a law that affected their interests or their business. He regretted that it should have affected them at all. But that was not the question before the House. The question for them to determine was, how did this law affect the community? Congress was to legislate, not for the interests of any particular class—not for the merchants—not for the pilots—but for the community. What, then, was the operation of this law? There was no better rule by which to test it than to go to those on whom it had operated. The pilots, indeed, complained. But what did the merchants do?

Mr. T. after showing the groundlessness of the charge that ill-feeling existed towards the pilots of New York, proceeded to state that the merchants and underwriters of New York, of Philadelphia, and New Orleans, were unanimously opposed to the repeal of the law.

And at this stage of his remarks he was interrupted by Mr. FISHER of North Carolina, who inquired of the CHAIR whether the morning hour had not expired?

The SPEAKER having replied in the affirmative—

Mr. FISHER asked that he might be excused from further service on the Committee of Elections. He said that, owing to the constant employment on that committee, he was compelled to abandon all other business. It was due to his constituents, whose business had been committed to his charge, that he be afforded an opportunity to attend to it; and it was due to the House, that expected him to devote all his time to the questions before the committee, that he should be discharged, and another person appointed, who could devote his whole time to such business.

Mr. EVERETT said that the same course of reasoning would probably apply to every other member of that committee. They were now in the midst of their labors, and it would certainly be very inconvenient to put any new member on the committee at this time. He hoped the gentleman would not be excused.

Mr. VANDERPOEL did not see (he said) how the request could be granted consistently with the rights of the parties implicated. The committee had gone on looking at the testimony, and had probably got through with one-fourth or one-half of it. To discharge the gentleman now, would, it seemed to him, (Mr. V.) be like putting a juror on a case when the testimony was half closed. There was no gentleman whom, personally, he should feel more disposed to gratify than the gentleman from North Carolina, but he (Mr. V.) must vote against the motion.

Mr. FISHER said that gentlemen were mistaken if they supposed the public service would suffer in any respect. If gentlemen would look at the nature of the investigation before the committee, they would see that such was the fact. The committee were investigating the illegality of the votes. Each vote presented a separate question; each vote was put before the committee on its own merits; and whenever the vote of the committee was taken on that single question, it was settled. The vote was either rejected as bad, or admitted as good, and the question was then set aside; and when another vote was taken up, a new question arose. So that, in ten minutes, any man could understand the matter as well he (Mr. F.) himself.

Mr. MORGAN suggested that there was another serious objection to the discharge of the gentleman. The committee had decided upon certain principles for the admission or rejection of testimony. By substituting a new for an old member, all the principles might be changed, and it might become necessary for the committee to go over all the testimony again.

Mr. CUSHING said that, to enable him to vote understandingly, he would desire to know whether it was in contemplation of the committee to report on the several questions before them.

The SPEAKER intimated to Mr. C. not to enlarge the subject-matter beyond its proper limits.

Mr. CUSHING said he would not do so. But there might be serious objection to granting the request of the gentleman. It was this. If the committee were to report at this session; if the evidence had been nearly or entirely gone through with, and all that remained was for judgment to be passed upon it, it would be necessary for a new member of the committee, if one should be appointed, to go over that evidence again. If, on the other hand, the subject was not to be reported on at this session, but was to be taken up de novo at another, the same difficulty would not present itself.

Mr. FISHER had no desire, he said, to speak in a language of threat, but he must state that he could not consistently serve any longer, such was the nature of his other duties.

Mr. EVERETT was satisfied that the gentleman would reconsider that opinion, if the House should determine not to excuse him.

And the question was then taken by yeas and nays, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 105, nays 97.

So the House decided that Mr. FISHER should be excused from further service on the Committee of Elections.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was read for information, as follows, viz:

Resolved, By the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) that Congress will terminate the present session, by adjournining sine die on Thursday, the 9th day of July next, at eight o'clock in the afternoon of said day.

Objections having been made from all sides of the House,

Mr. PETRIKIN said he would not press it at that time, but gave notice that he would make a daily effort to have the resolution acted upon.

A number of Senate bills on the SPEAKER'S table were read twice, and appropriately referred.

The SPEAKER, by general consent, laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 26th May last, relating to the charges preferred by Dr. Baldwin, against Marmaduke Burroughs, Consul at Vera Cruz.

On motion of Mr. CRAIG, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The bill for the relief of General Duncan L. Clinch, which had been returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken up, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON was understood to give notice that he would to-morrow ask the House to take up the joint resolution from the Senate, continuing in force the charters of the District banks, and that he would move the previous question upon it.

A joint resolution from the Library Committee, on the subject of international exchanges, coming up on the question of engrossment for a third reading,

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, (a bill of a similar character having been committed a few days since,) its further consideration was postponed for the present.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. BLACK being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from last evening, in support of the bill. In reply to a question from his colleague, [Mr. KING] as to whether the fact of having voted for the bill of 1834, was any argument why the same persons should vote for the present bill, Mr. B. replied in the affirmative. He considered that a gentleman, who had voted for Mr. Gordon's bill of 1834, was bound by every motive of public interest and consistency, to vote for the present measure. He showed that the bill of Mr. Gordon, for which some of the most eminent men from Georgia had voted, was far more ultra than the present measure. That bill gave the Secretary of the Treasury almost unlimited power; and while it authorized that officer to demand the payment of Government dues in specie, it made no provision for paying out the same kind of currency to the creditors of Government. Was there any man, he asked, who would hesitate in his choice of the two bills? If gentlemen could vote for a bill like that of Mr. Gordon, surely they could have no hesitation in supporting the present measure, when the which will be given when his speech shall be written out in full.

Mr. CROCKETT next obtained the floor, and made some remarks in relation to the resolutions of the Legislature of Tennessee, requesting him to vote for the Independent Treasury bill. He denied the right of the present Legislature to instruct him, for reasons which he gave at length. He then examined the Independent Treasury bill, and opposed it with much warmth. He considered it a most odious measure. In the course of his remarks he avowed it as his object to endeavor to get a United States Bank chartered, without regard as to what the opinions of his party were. A National Bank was the only measure that could succeed as a fiscal agent of the Government. He was no advocate for State banks, and never had been, though he did not wish to do any thing to their injury. He argued that it was the duty of the National Government to establish a currency of uniform value wherever it circulates, and did not believe the measure before the House adequate to that; and before Mr. C. concluded,

The House took its usual recess, at 2½ o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. CROCKETT concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill; when

Mr. BELL obtained the floor, and spoke with much warmth against the efforts of the Administration party to pass the bill, to the exclusion of other bills. He then urged many reasons why the bill should not pass, and, before concluding, at a quarter past seven o'clock, Mr. B. gave way to a motion that the committee rise, which motion being put, it was discovered there was not a quorum.

The committee then rose, and the Chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS moved to adjourn; which motion resulted in yeas 55, nays 55. The SPEAKER gave the casting vote by voting in the affirmative.

So at half past seven o'clock,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, June 17, 1840.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented a petition from Hezekiah L. Thistle, stating that he has invented a mode of constructing wrought iron cannon, that has received the approbation of scientific persons, and desires the Government to have the benefit of the improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. LINN, the bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act to amend an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830, with the Choctaw Indians," was taken up, and, after several amendments had been offered by Mr. L. and adopted, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill concerning tonnage of Spanish vessels; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama rose, and was proceeding to censure the National Intelligencer of to-day for the omission of the latter portion of his explanation and remonstrance in regard to the intelligencer's report of the proceedings on Mr. Poinsett's project, when he was informed that the omission was caused by a hurried, and certainly accidental, oversight of the Globe Reporter, to whom alone he handed his notes, when no Reporter of the Intelligencer, owing to sickness, was present.

Mr. C. then read the residue of his explanation, which was as follows:

"I have felt less inclined to ascribe these errors to accident, on account of another misstatement of the Intelligencer, which has appeared daily at the head of our proceedings upon Mr. Poinsett's report. That paragraph is in the following words:

"'The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion to print 20,000 copies of the report of the Committee on the Militia on Mr. Poinsett's project for a standing army of 100.000 militia.'

"Now, sir, (said Mr. C.) Mr. Poinsett has submitted no 'plan for a standing army of 100,000 militia.' His plan purports to be one for the reorganization and discipline of the militia. I understand Reporters are admitted here to give a transcript of our proceedings; that is, a statement of facts, and not their construction or inferences. We are sufficiently libelled and slandered by letter writers. I am at least unwilling to tolerate it in Reporters."

Mr. ALLEN said that he had thought, for some time past, that he would, when occasion offered, make one or two remarks on this subject; and what he was now about to say, he hoped, would be particularly and correctly reported. Upon the subject of reports of debates, this, as far as he was concerned, seemed to be an appropriate occasion for the remarks he designed to offer. For any thing that appeared in the public papers, purporting to be his remarks, he would not stand responsible, if it did not appear in the first person. He took that to be the mode in which a correct report of a speaker's remarks should be given. With regard to the correctness of the reports, it was perhaps exceedingly difficult for any man to report exactly what was said; and in a running debate, it was perhaps still more difficult. Some allowance was therefore to be made for those inaccuracies which occurred in the reports, without any intention on the part of the Reporters to misrepresent. But they all know, that, in addition to these difficulties, reports were sometimes sent out from this body in which plain and palpable injustice was done. Therefore, to avoid any future difficulty, so far as he was concerned, he gave notice that he would not hold himself responsible for any reports of what he might say, unless reported in the first person, which would show that they had been revised and corrected by himself.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he could not allow this occasion to pass without expressing his dissent to any Senator's rising in his place for the purpose of commenting on any newspaper article in relation to himself. Mr. C. had never done so, and he did not think it consistent with that dignity and elevation to which the Senate ought to aspire. And, if it were done in all cases, the Senate could do scarcely any thing else, for, Mr. C. said, he did not think he ever saw a single paragraph in the Globe in which he was correctly reported. For every one misrepresentation on his side, he believed there were ten on the other. Yet he had never commented on those reports in his place, but left his character to stand or fall by his acts. And suppose the Senate should appoint their own reporters, they would be appointed by a party majority, which would increase instead of correcting the evil.

Though it was true that the Reporter had no right to put language in the mouth of any Senator that he did not use, yet he had a right to draw his own inferences, and to expose, in his own language, the tendency of any measures that he thought injurious to the interests of the country. This was one of the inestimable privileges of a free press, which, though liable to be abused, could not be interfered with without great danger. One side might say that such a measure had such a tendency; for instance, that the Sub-Treasury bill was a Government bank, (his deliberate opinion was that it was a Government bank.) Well, sir, said Mr. C. is he to be held responsible for so expressing himself?

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that he had a word or two to say in reply to the honorable Senator, who had thought proper to reflect on him, and to read him a lecture on the dignity and propriety of a member of that body. The Senator would be good enough to recollect that he had no right to direct him in the course he should pursue in this or any other matter. He did not come here to be lectured by the honorable Senator in reference to what was due to dignity and decorum by a member of this body. He felt it to be his duty and his right to rise in his place and correct the false statements made in the press whose side the Senator espoused—palpable misrepresentations! gross misrepresentations! Was it not right and proper, when an individual came here in the character of a reporter of proceedings, and professed to give facts for the information of the public, if he did it falsely, insidiously, and fraudulently—was it not right for any member aggrieved to expose it? It is both our right and our duty, said Mr. C. and it will not do for the Senator from Kentucky to talk about the privileges of a free press, and to comment on the dignity and propriety which should stand in the way of an exposure of falsehood and misrepresentation. The reporter of proceedings professes to give the facts that transpire in this body, but he is not admitted here to give his own comments on them. The Editor of the paper he reports for might say editorially what he pleased, (and the Editor of this paper, it was well known, very freely availed himself of his privileges on this subject,) but the Reporter had no right to make his own comments appear as part of the proceedings of this body. He wished particularly to draw this distinction, so that when a debate went forth, the public might distinguish between the commentary and the facts. He did not interfere with those inestimable privileges of a free press, of which the Senator spoke. The complaint that he made had no reference whatever to the privileges of the press, for he could not regard those who came here expressly to give a statement of facts as included in that privilege. He knew how easy it was for Editors of the public papers to be misled by the press here, or by reports of what passes here. He would mention one instance among many others. When the bill to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, on certain terms and conditions, was under discussion, the Senator got up and solemnly declared that it was an absolute proposition to give away the lands to the new States; and consequently the Legislature of one of the States passed resolutions against it as such. If the Senator chose to characterize this measure, which every one knew to be a sale, with certain conditions, in such broad terms as an absolute gift, he could do so; but he would mark the effect. It gave a tone to the Opposition press throughout the country, and, among its other effects, sanctioned the act of the Rhode Island Legislature. Was it for the Senator from Kentucky to rise in his place and undertake to defend the privilege of Reporters to misrepresent the words and actions of members of this body? The Senator might, if he thought proper, take this course; he [Mr. C.] would, for his part, follow the dictates of his own judgment.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky assured the Senator from Alabama that he rose for no purpose of dictating to him or lecturing him. He engaged in no such business. But was he not a part of this body? And if any person thought proper to bring forward any matter for animadversion in it, had he not a right to get up and express the opinion he did, that the Senate was not a fit and proper place for such correction to be made? It was not upon the conduct of the Senator; it was not to advise him that he rose; but it was to express his opinion of the practice of members rising here, and consuming the time of the Senate in correcting the errors of a free press. But the Senate had chosen to give instances of what he called misrepresentation, and referring to the bill to cede away the public domain, said that he [Mr. C.] characterized it as an absolute donation. He now [Mr. C. said] so characterized it. He knew that there were terms and conditions in the bill, and knew that the effect of them in the end would amount to an absolute donation. Mr. C. here referred to the terms and conditions in the bill—and one of them, he said, the payment of one half the gross proceeds of the sales, would never be carried into effect, for the States would be, for one cause or another, able to induce Congress to relinquish it. He might be mistaken, but such were his convictions. Though in the beginning it would appear to be a contract, yet in the end it would turn out to be a donation. This opinion he expressed several years ago; and was he to be censured because the Legislature of Rhode Island came to the same conclusion?

Mr. CLAY of Alabama observed that if the Senator from Kentucky, when he made the broad, unqualified declaration that the bill to which he referred was an absolute donation to the new States of all the unsold public lands in their limits, had accompanied it with the qualification that he now made, it would have been better, so far as the public information was concerned. He, Mr. C. only stated the fact to show the privilege assumed on the other side of saying what they pleased. The Senator spoke of his right, as a member of the body, to comment on any subject that was brought before it. Now he [Mr. C.] did not bring forward this matter for any legislative action, nor was the Senator in any way called on to interfere. Had he any particular connection with the business? He affected to feel great delicacy with regard to matters which did not particularly concern him. Had he forgotten that he undertook to rise in his place, when two of the Senators were presenting the resolutions passed by their Legislature, and intimate to them what ought to be their course on that occasion? Was that consistent with the Senator's ideas of delicacy? He courted no collisions of this kind, Mr. C. said, but he would repeat now what he had said on a former occasion, that when assaults of this kind were made on him, he should always feel it to be his duty to repel them.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he could only repeat that, if any Senator chose to bring any matter before that body, he would take such notice of it as he thought proper. As to the case which the honorable Senator noticed of his having spoken of the instructions received by two honorable Senators, he had no recollection of it, but he would remind the Senate that Senators on his side had again and again been taunted and reprehended for non-compliance with their instructions.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that he would not contend for the last word.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky. Well, you have got the last word.

Mr. LINN observed that he did not rise to make any complaints against the Reporters on either side of the house, but to say that the discussion going on proved conclusively, to his mind, that the Reporters should be sworn officers of the Senate, and compelled to furnish each member notes of what he said. Our constituents, said Mr. L. have a right to know what we say, as well as what we do. The journal showed all their votes, but what was said in support or explanation of them, went to the public in a very imperfect manner. He thought that the body would see the propriety of his suggestion. If this plan was adopted, each member would have notes furnished him, and then the responsibility would no longer rest on the Reporter, but where it should be, upon the speaker or speakers. It was very seldom he trespassed upon the time or patience of the Senate except on business, and then he endeavored to use no more words than were barely sufficient to explain to the Senate. But, notwithstanding he had, on several occasions, been misrepresented, it was not his intention, nor did he wish to be understood as charging the Reporters with intentionally misstating him; but such was the fact. He would mention two instances. In the debate on the bankrupt bill, as published meagrely in the Intelligencer, he was made to say that he wished the States to surrender to the General Government, and to be exercised by it, all the power they have to charter banking institutions. Such an idea never entered his mind. On the contrary, his opinions were, that to purify and correct the illegitimate career of banking on the part of State institutions, two alternatives presented themselves. One was making them subject to the operation of the bankrupt bill, or getting the States to consent to an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, expressly withholding or denying the States the power of creating corporations with the legal right to make paper dollars under 20, 50, or $100, as might be thought best. He said at the same time that all power over the subject should be withheld from the General Government. The other instance is in the case of the bill to raise a certain number of volunteers of a particular kind to prosecute the war in Florida against the Seminoles. In the discussion, he had remarked that, to bring the contest to a speedy issue, you must have a class of men used to the rifle, inured to hardship, capable of supporting great physical exertion and physical want, who, with a few days' provisions on their backs, a pistol, knife, and tomahawk in their belts, could plunge into a swamp, swim creeks, and sleep in mud and water. He further had remarked, that such a force would track the Indians to their secret hiding places, would waylay and destroy them when least expected, and that Indian wars would always terminate in a brief period, as soon as the whites became as expert in their mode of warfare as they were themselves. Yet he was made to say that Indians were as good as white men. He knew the character of Indians well, and knew that the worst white communities were immeasurably superior to the best Indian. He repeated again, that he did not complain of wilful misrepresentation. His back was sometimes to the Reporters, and they would then probably hear imperfectly. At other times they only reported for the political side to which they were attached. It was utterly impossible to resist the belief that their reports are not occasionally tinged with their own political opinions. Every difficulty would be obviated by the course indicated, and each member held responsible for the sentiments, opinions, and facts stated by him in debate. He said he would be glad if some member would move a resolution to appoint a committee to inquire into the expediency of making Reporters sworn officers of the Senate.

Mr. WALKER said he had no complaints to make against the Reporters on either side of the House. But the idea suggested by the Senator from Missouri induced him to offer the following resolution for the consideration of the Senate:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of selecting an equal number of Reporters, of both political parties, who shall be sworn to report correctly, as far as practicable, the proceedings of this body.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate a precise statement of the revenues actually received from all sources, between the end of the last fiscal year and the first day of the present month, so far as ascertained at this time.

The bill authorizing the erection of certain light-houses and light-boats, and the establishment of certain buoys, beacons, &c. was taken up, and after some remarks from Messrs. NORVELL, KING, CALHOUN, and HENDERSON, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Francis Gehan, lae Marshal of the Territory of Wiskonsin, was also ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. SOUTHARD moved to print a certain pamphlet purporting to be an answer by the Directors of the Union Bank of Florida, to a report made by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KING opposed the motion on the ground that it was a paper that had never been before the Senate, and did not form a part of its proceedings, copies of it only having come there addressed to individual members. It was not, he said, the practise of the Senate to print documents that had no relation to its legislative action.

After some further remarks from Messrs. SOUTHARD and KING, the motion was negatived.

The Senate, on motion by Mr. DAVIS, proceeded to consider the bill making further provision to prevent the abuse of the flag of the United States, and the use of unauthorized papers, in the foreign slave trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS explained, in detail, the objects, manner of operation, and effects of the bill.

Mr. MERRICK moved to strike out that that part of the bill which made a shipbuilder punishable if he had good reason to believe that the ship was for the slave trade; Mr. M. being understood to argue that he ought not to be punished unless he knew it.

The bill and the amendment were discussed by Messrs. DAVIS, CALHOUN, GRUNDY, KING, MERRICK, and WEBSTER.

Mr. MERRICK's motion was negatived, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, June 17, 1840.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution; which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, By the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) that Congress will terminate the present session, by adjournment sine die, on Thursday, the 9th of July next, at eight o'clock in the afternoon of that day.

Objection was made from all sides of the House.

[The friends of the Administration are anxious to terminate the present session at the earliest day possible consistent with the interests of the country, and with a due regard to the condition of the business which must be passed upon before the adjournment of the present session. They are, therefore, opposed to fixing a day until they can see some prospect ahead of finishing the business or of getting it in such a state of preparation as would justify them in fixing a day for the adjournment. They have made, and are now making, every effort to that end. They believe that all those who are really desirous to terminate the session at an early day, would and ought to come forward with an anxious desire to act upon the measures that must be passed upon, instead of consuming the time of the House in debate.]

Mr. WISE moved to suspend the rules for the reception of the resolution; and, on that motion,

Mr. CASEY having demanded the yeas and nays, they were ordered, and were, yeas 77, nays 86.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. CRAIG said, in order to make the most of their time, and with a view and in good faith that they may have an early adjournment, and to test the sincerity of those who profess to desire it so anxiously, he would ask the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That from and after this day, the daily hour of meeting of the House shall be 10 o'clock, ante meridian.

Mr. WISE objected to its reception.

Mr. CRAIG moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer it, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 105, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Bond, Boyd, Anson V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Bynum, Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chittenden, Clifford, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Deberry, Dickerson, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fillmore, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graves, Green, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, James, Jameson, Chas. Johnston, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kempshall, Kille, King, Leadbetter, Leet, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Calvary Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Osborne, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pope, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Simonton, A. Smith, J. Smith, Truman Smith, Thos. Smith, Steenrod, Storrs, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, F. Thomas, P. F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, C. H. Williams, and Worthington —105.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Briggs, John Campbell, Clark, Connor, Garret Davis, Dennis, Evans, Everett, Habersham, William Cost Johnson, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Palen, Peck, Petrikin, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Stanly, Sweney, Taliaferro, Toland, Warren, E. D. White, Thomas W. Williams, and Wise—30.

So the rules were suspended; and the resolution having been again read,

Mr. CRAIG moved the previous question, which received a second; and the main question having been ordered, it was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DANA asked leave to present a resolution, which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House cause to be published in one or more of the newspapers printed in this city, the names of all members of Congress who shall be absent without leave on any call of the House, or vote by yeas and nays.

Objection having been made to the reception of the resolution,

Mr. DANA moved to suspend the rules, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BANKS moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table.

Mr. DANA demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which having been ordered,

Mr. BANKS withdrew his motion to lay on the table.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules by yeas and nays; which were—yeas 106, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, A. G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Connor, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cross, Davee, Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fillmore, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Geary, Gerry, Goggin, Goode, Hammond, Hand, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of North Carolina, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randolph, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Simonton, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, P. J. Wagner, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and J. L. Williams—106.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, J. W. Allen, Banks, Baker, Biddle, Bond, Boyd, Briggs, Calhoun, Carroll, Chittenden, Clark, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Droomgoole, Evans, Everett, Gates, Giddings, Graves, Green, Griffin, Habersham, John Hastings, Hawes, Hill of Virginia, Hillen, Hoffman, James, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnston, Kempshall, King, Leet, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Menroe, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Rayner, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Slade, Albert Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Philip F. Thomas, Toland, Triplett, D. D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, E. D. White, T. W. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, Wise, and Worthington—76.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. ADAMS, by general consent, presented a memorial from the workmen on the public buildings; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use chemical or any other oil in the light-houses, and to make the necessary alterations for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Also reported back to the House, from the same committee, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to amend "an act regulating the passenger ships and vessels."

Mr. CURTIS hoped the bill would be put upon its engrossment. It did not require commitment. He explained the nature of the bill; which was understood to repeal so much of the existing law as restricted the passengers to two to each ton of the vessels carrying passengers, so far as the same might apply to steam vessels running to certain ports.

Mr. PETTRIKIN was opposed to the passage of the bill; which he said would give these vessels a monopoly and advantage over other vessels.

Mr. CURTIS made some further remarks in explanation of the object of the bill.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said it was a very important bill, and the House should not be taken by surprise by forcing the question upon it so soon. He spoke of the humane objects of the law which this proposed to repeal—it was a salutary one, having a regard to the comfort and health of the passengers. He believed, if it was repealed, so far as it related to the steamboats, the effect would be that those boats would be so crowded with passengers as to prove detrimental to their health. He was not prepared to vote in favor of the repeal, without some reflection and investigation. He therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till this day week; which motion was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS also, from the same committee, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of the owners of the British brig Despatch; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CURTIS also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report and chart of the survey of the harbors of Beaufort and Wilmington, in North Carolina, communicated to this House by the Secretary of the Navy; and the report of the chart of the surveys of the Southern coast, from Tybee island, in Georgia, to Hunting island, in South Carolina, prepared by Lieut. Wilkes, be lithographed; and that 2,500 of each report and chart be published.

Mr. CURTIS explained the importance of the charts, and hoped the question would be taken without delay.

Mr. TURNEY objected to the consideration of the resolution; and, consequently, it lies over one day.

On motion of Mr. REYNOLDS, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of H. H. Colgan, also from the correspondence between the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Recorder; also from the memorial of the Missouri Agricultural Society; and they were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. REYNOLDS also, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill, entitled an act for the relief of Zadoc Martin; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. R. also reported, from the same committee, a bill to grant a quantity of land to the State of Missouri, for the purpose of constructing a railroad from New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in the State of Illinois; which was read twice, and committed to the Committe of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions and papers of Silas M. Catching, Stephen Fox, and Wm. A. Powell, and they were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of John W. Monette, with an amendment, which was concurred in, and the amendment, according to order, having been engrossed for a third reading, the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of Jane Waller; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the rules of the House were suspended, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. BELL continued his remarks in opposition to the bill till 2½ o'clock, the hour of recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. BELL resumed his remarks in relation to the currency generally, and in opposition to a Sub-Treasury as a regulator of the currency. He went into a history of his own course with reference to that question, with a view to prove his consistency; and at 6 o'clock he gave way to

Mr. ALFORD, who moved that the committee rise.

On this motion tellers being demanded and ordered, it was found that there was no quorum.

Mr. BELL expressed his willingness to proceed without a quorum.

Mr. ADAMS objected, as did several other members, to the business being resumed without a quorum.

The committee then rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

Mr. TILLINGHAST moved to adjourn.

Mr. VANDERPOEL demanded the years and nays, which being ordered, were—yeas 50, nays 80, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Bell, Briggs, William B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Crockett, Edward Davies, Dawson, Dennis, Dellet, Evans, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graves, Hall, Hawes, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Naylor, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Rayner, Ridgway, Saltonstall, Slade, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Warren, Thomas W. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—50.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Burke, Carr, Carroll, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Cross, Dana, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Holleman, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Pickens, Prentiss, Reynolds, James Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Lewis Williams—80.

So the House refused to adjourn.

A quorum being now present,

The House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Independent Treasury bill, and

Mr. BELL resumed, and was replying to his colleague [Mr. BROWN] on another subject, when he was simultaneously called to order by the CHAIR, and by Mr. BEATTY of Pennsylvania.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he must insist that the rules be preserved.

Mr. WISE took an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] was out of order.

The question was then taken, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the committee, by tellers, and resulted—ayes 81, nays 38.

No quorum having voted,

Mr. VANDERPOEL said there was evidently a quorum in the House, and he moved that the CHAIR take another count, and the CHAIR was about dividing the committee for that purpose, when

Mr. WISE objected to having another count, and insisted that the committee should rise, and that it was the duty of the chairman to report the fact of there being no quorum, to the House; accordingly

The committee rose, and the CHAIR reported the fact to the House.

Mr. BUTLER of Kentucky moved that there be a call of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. TRIPLETT moved that the House adjourn; and

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which having been ordered, were—yeas 39, nays 88, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Wm. B. Campbell, Casey, James Cooper, Crabb, Crockett, Dawson, Dennis, Dellet, Evans, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graves, Hoffman, Lincoln, Naylor, Osborne, Rayner, Ridgway, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, C. H. Williams, and Wise—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Chapman, Clifford, Colquitt, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, Hawkins, Holleman, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Strong, Swearingen, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Weller, Wick, and J. W. Williams—88.

So the House refused to adjourn; and there now being a quorum present,

The House again went into committee.

Mr. WISE withdrew his hppeal from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. BELL was again about proceeding in his remarks; when

Mr. BEATTY called him to order, and insisted that he could not proceed, under the rule, unless permission was granted by the committee.

The CHAIR said, as objection was made, the gentleman could not proceed without permission of the committee.

Mr. WISE made some remarks as to the question of order, and moved that he be permitted to proceed in order; which was agreed to.

Mr. BELL said, unless he was permitted to reply to the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. BROWN,] he had nothing further to say, than that the charges of inconsistency against him were unfounded, &c. It was not his habit, he said, to trespass upon the rules, and therefore refrained from any further reply.

Mr. EVANS obtained the floor.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee asked him to yield it, to enable him to reply to his colleague, [Mr. BELL.]

Mr. EVANS said he would do so, but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] having been declared to be out of order, was not permitted to proceed in the remarks to which he wished to reply; therefore, it was evident that he [Mr. BROWN,] could not reply, if he were to yield him the floor.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the committee then rose, and

The House, at 10 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, June 18, 1840.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, through Mr. GARLAND, their Clerk, announcing the death of the Hon. ANSON BROWN, a member of that body, and their consequent proceedings thereupon; which proceedings having been read,

Mr. TALLMADGE rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The message from the other House, which has just been read, announces the death of the Hon. ANSON BROWN, late a Representative in that body from the State of New York.

I rise to ask of the Senate that tribute of respect which is due to his memory. I perform this melancholy duty with no ordinary emotions. But a few days have elapsed since the deceased was here in the regular discharge of the important duties of his station. Before he left for home, I heard him speak of his indisposition, but I had no apprehension of serious illness, much less this sudden and unexpected termination of his disease. He died at his own residence in Ballston, last Sunday evening, surrounded by his family and friends.

Mr. BROWN was a gentleman of a liberal education, and distinguished attainments as a scholar, of high standing in the legal profession, and posessed in an eminent degree the esteem and confidence of all who had the good fortune to make his acquaintance. He was kind and amiable in his intercourse in society, and no one was more happy in his domestic relations. As a husband and father, none can fully appreciate his virtues, except those who have been called to mourn his loss. My heart bleeds to contemplate the desolation of the widow and the orphan whom this afflictive bereavement has left behind. Cut off in the vigor of manhood, and in the midst of his usefulness, the community has lost one of its most valuable members, and his friends one of their most cherished associates.

His sudden death is one of those inscrutable dispensations of Providence to which we are all bound to bow with perfect submission. I will only add, that he was a man of the strictest integrity and honor, and that he lived respected, and died lamented, by all who knew him.

As a tribute of respect for his memory, I move for the adoption of the Senate the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate will testify their respect for the memory of the deceased, by wearing crape on the left arm for the space of thirty days.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS asked the Senator from New York, [Mr. TALLMADGE,] to give way for a moment, to enable him to make a motion, for doing which the present afforded the only opportunity.

Mr. TALLMADGE assenting,

Mr. DAVIS, at the request (he said) of several gentlemen, who desired that a more full vote should be taken on the subject of the claim of the heirs of Robert Fulton, moved to reconsider the vote by which that claim was rejected; which motion was agreed to, and the subject, for the present, was laid on the table.

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, June 18, 1840.

The journal having been read—

Mr. CURTIS rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of one of my colleagues, who has been a member of this House much longer than any of his companions, circumstances, in the opinion of my colleagues, have imposed upon me this morning the performance of a most painful duty.

I have risen, sir, to arrest the attention of the House, if possible, for a few minutes, to announce that death has passed upon one of its members; that death has broken the ranks of the representation from the State of New York. The honorable ANSON BROWN, a Representative from that State, died at his own residence, in the county of Saratoga, on Sunday evening last, at ten o'clock.

But a few days since, not now more than ten or twelve, I met him and conversed with him at one of the doors of this hall. He said he was about to visit his family for a few days, and that, before any final decision of the House should take place upon the subject then and now the principal topic of daily discussion, he expected to be again in his place; indeed, he said a letter from any friend, notifying him of its necessity, would command his immediate return. He shook me by the hand, and turned from me with some cheerful expressions of kindness. I saw him then, for the last time. Alas! sir, he has now gone beyond the calls of public duty, and the summons of private friendship addressed to him now will fall upon "The dull cold ear of death."

It was known to some of his colleagues and more intimate friends that, from the commencement of this session, Mr. BROWN had been the victim of impaired health; and yet, sir, his death was not more expected than that of the most vigorous of us who occupy these places to-day. But, sir, the event proves that, from the first day he entered this hall, the hand of disease was constantly pressing him downward to the grave in which death has now laid him. The event proves that, while his colleagues, from his punctual attendance upon the duties of this House, regarded him as but slightly indisposed, he was in fact struggling, in the performance of his public duty, with the pangs of a fatal malady.

I dare not trust myself to speak of this true-hearted man as his character deserves. I must check the promptings of friendship, early established, and long continued, without interruption. But I may say of him, to those who were not familiar with his character, that he possessed a mind so illuminated by knowledge and reflection, a spirit so imbued with deep sentiments of patriotism, that, in the absence of physical infirmity, he was fitted for a career of distinction and usefulness in this House that would have reflected honor upon his constituents and the people of the State to which he belonged.

It was not without the greatest reluctance on the part of Mr. BROWN that the people of his district induced him to enter upon the duties of public life; and it was his intention at the close of his term of office to have retired to those more congenial pursuits of a private citizen which he unwillingly surrendered at the solicitation of his friends. He loved his home, his family, his neighbors, and the agreeable excitement of a profession in which he had acquired the distinction of a sound and able lawyer.

Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of consolation with his colleagues, since in the providence of God the career of our valued friend was now to be cut short in the meridian of his life, that the fatal arrow did not reach him while separated from the solace of his family and the comforts of his home. He had closed an honorable life in the midst of those who knew him best and honored and loved him most. He has finished life where he began it. At the hour of death he was surrounded by those who knew him as an affectionate husband, a tender father, a faithful son, a kind neighbor, a high-minded, patriotic citizen, and a devoted Christian.

Sir, I knew this departed friend for years that run back to the days of college remembrances. I know, too, the intelligent constituency that he represented. They are the people of Saratoga and Schenectady, two of the oldest and most renowned counties in the history of New York. Among that people he was born; among them he had gained an enviable character for purity of purpose, and for honor and fidelity in all the relations of life; among them he lived in the affectionate regards of numerous friends, and in the universal respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens, of all classes and parties. In his untimely death, his district sustains an irreparable loss, the State is bereaved of one of her worthiest sons, and this House has parted with a member whose life and conversation were an honor to its body.

Sir, it is not my office to speak of the admonition to us who survive that comes from the early grave of one of our fellows. It cannot fail, however, sir, to teach us "what shadows we are," and, arresting us in the midst of this scene of active and exciting employment, it must remind us "what shadows we pursue."

Mr. CURTIS thereupon submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep sensibility of the death of the Hon. ANSON BROWN, a member from the State of New York, which took place at his residence, at Ballston Spa, on the 14th instant.

Resolved, That, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members of this House will wear crape on the left arm for the space of thirty days.

Which resolutions being unanimously adopted, thereupon the House, on motion of Mr. CURTIS, Adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, June 19, 1840.

The VICE SRESIDENT submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, showing, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the amount of revenue received between the end of the last fiscal year and the first of the present month; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The following is an abstract of the report:

Received from customs - -	$6,091,951
lands - -	1,396,202
miscellaneous -	32,676
	$7,520,837
Collected from former deposite banks	522,128
Issue of new Treasury notes -	1,427,166

Mr. HUBBARD presented a petition from sundry citizens of Racine, Wiskonsin Territory; also, two petitions from the citizens of Southport and Milwaukie, all praying for the construction of a harbor at ——, on Lake Michigan. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TALLMADGE presented the petition of sundry citizens of Dutchess county, New York, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law; which was read, and laid on the table.

Mr. ROANE presented the petition of the widow of John Vance, a soldier of the Revolution; which was referred to the Commitiee on Pensions.

Mr. LINN presented a memorial from Richard O. Davidson, praying an appropriation to test the practicability of an invention to carry the mails of the United States through the air; which was laid on the table.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Therese Malette, widow of Caspard Pheole; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

The resolution submitted some days since, by Mr. WALKER, for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the propriety of selecting Reporters for the Senate, was taken up, and after being discussed by Messrs. WALKER, TAPPAN, CLAY of Kentucky, NORVELL, ALLEN, ANDERSON, KING, and CLAY of Alabama, its further consideration was postponed for the present.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, the bill to authorize the Mount Carmel and New Alabany Railroad Company, to enter, on a credit, a quantity of land to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from New Albnny, in the State of Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in the State of Illinois, was taken up, as in committee of the whole; and after discussion by Messrs. WEBSTER, BENTON, LINN, YOUNG, and WHITE,

Mr. BENTON moved for its indefinite postponement; which was lost—ayes 12, noes 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Andersen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Roane, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Webster, White, and Young—16.

On motion,

The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 19, 1840.

The CHAIR having announced that reports of committees were first in order—

Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill, entitled "An act to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a reversion in the State of Alabama;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Also, reported back, without amendment, Senate bill, entitled, "An act authorizing the States to tax any lands within their limits, sold by the United States;" which, after a few remarks by Mr. HUBBARD in favor of the immediate passage of the bill, and Mr. TILLINGHAST in favor of its commitment—

On motion of Mr. L. WILLIAMS, it was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. H. also reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefits of the act granting pre-emption rights," which was approved on the 19th June, 1834.

Mr. H. made some remarks explanatory of the principle of the bill; and moved, that instead of taking the usual course of reference, it be put upon its passage.

Mr. TILLINGHAST made some remarks in opposition to that motion, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRABB considered that the principle of the bill had been settled in the pre-emption act already passed, which bill was much stronger in principle than this He was opposed to the commitment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland spoke of the frauds which had been committed upon the Creek reservations in Alabama, and was opposed to the passage of any bill of the kind to settle claims on the reservations till the commission which had charge of the subject shall have made a report in full.

Mr. CRABB, in relation to the frauds referred to by the gentleman from Maryland, replied, that if they existed to the extent spoken of, they were not committed by citizens of Alabama, but by citizens of Maryland as well as the citizens of other States. He had heard a great deal said about friendship for those who lived in log cabins; he wished to see some evidence of it. Every friend of the log cabin boys would, and ought to vote for this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland cared not whether the frauds were committed by citizens of Maryland or Alabama, or any other State, or by those living in log cabins, or by those living in palaces; he was opposed to them, and would condemn them wherever they existed, or by whomsoever committed. He wanted time to examine the bill, and he hoped it would be committed for that purpose.

Mr. BRIGGS was opposed to committing the bill to the Committee on the state of the Union. It was a private claim, and he saw no good reason why it should have an earlier or more favorable consideration than other private claims before the committee. He therefore moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, instead of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as proposed.

Mr. LINCOLN also spoke in favor of giving this bill the same direction as other private claims. It involved a principle different from that in the pre-emption law, as asserted by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CRABB]

Mr. TURNEY had always voted for these pre-emption rights, but he was opposed to having the morning hour consumed on a question of reference, or of putting the bill out of its proper channel, if it was determined, instead of referring the bill, to have action upon it; and for the purpose of getting at the question, he moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were not ordered.

At the suggestion of several, and for the purpose of having the bill referred, Mr. TURNEY withdrew his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. GRAVES renewed the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. CRABB asked for the yeas and nays; which were refused.

The question was then taken, and the bill was laid on the table, on count by ayes and noes.

Mr. GRAVES said he heard a gentleman intimate his intention to move to reconsider the vote; he therefore made the motion to reconsider now.

Mr. CRABB hoped the House would grant him the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—yeas 107, nays 64, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Dvies, John Davis, J. W. Davis, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Giddings, Goode, Griffin, Habersham, Hand, J. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Henry, Hillen, Hook, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Parrish, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Robinson, Ryall, Shaw, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and John T. Worthington—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Landaff W. Andrews, Baker, Bond, Botts, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Chittenden, Clark, Connor, Cranston, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dromgoole, Evans, Floyd, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Hall, Wm. S. Hastings, Hill of North Carolina, Jackson, James, Chas. Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Newhard, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Paynter, Peck, James Rogers, Saltonstall, Samuels, Sergeant, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stanly, Storrs, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—64.

So the vote to lay the bill on the table was reconsidered; and

The question recurring on the motion to lay on the table, it was negatived; and the bill was then referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Public Lands, made adverse reports on the petitions of Jacob Houseman and William C. Bethel. Also, made a report on the memorial of the Montgomery Railroad Company, praying the right of way through the public lands, discharging the said committee from its further consideration on the ground that a general bill had been reported for the attainment of that object. Also, made an adverse report on the petition of David R. Mitchell. On motion of Mr. H. the committee was also discharged from the further consideration of certain memorials from the Legislative Council of the Territory of Iowa.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Elisha Moreland, Robert J. Kennedy, and Madison C. Lewis; and a bill for the relief of Joseph Wilson of Lauderdale; which bills were read twice, and committed to the Committe of the Whole.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, rsported a bill for the relief of Henry Nuringham; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CRARY, from the same committee, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill, entitled "An act to create an additional land office in the State of Michigan and for other purposes; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the Legislature of Michigan in relation to the University lands; and from the memorial for a bounty in land to the commissioned officers of the war of 1812.

Mr. McKAY, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back to the House the bill for the establishment of certain post routes in the Territory of Iowa, and to discontinue others therein named; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. McKAY, the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James T. Feas; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill, entitled "An act to amend an act approved 18th January, 1839, entitled an act to amend an act entitled an act to require the Judge of the District of East and West Tennessee, to hold a court at Jackson, in said State, approved June 18, 1838, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. TURNEY, the bill was now read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SERGEANT also reported back to the House, from the same committee, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to establish a board of claims, to hear and examine claims against the United States;

Also reported back, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to authorize the payment of equitable commissions to the agents or attorneys of persons in whose favor awards have been made, under three annual treaties between the United States and certain foreign powers; which awards have been retained in the Treasury, in payment of debts due to the United States; and

Senate bill entitled an act respecting the heirs of Agnes Dundas;

Which bills were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act in addition to an act respecting the judicial system of the United States; which Mr. S. asked might be put upon its passage, if there was no objection; but the morning hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. EVANS, who was entitled to the floor, examined into the state of the currency at different periods since the formation of the Government, and the course of the past and present Administrations with reference to it; which course he censured, and to which he attributed all the present evils of the times. He examined the bill under discussion, and gave his reasons why he would not vote for it. He spoke till the hour of 2½ o'clock, at which time

Mr. TILLINGHAST obtained the floor, and the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. TILLINGHAST spoke until half past eight o'clock, in opposition to the bill. He examined it in all its bearings, with a view to show that it would not prove so good a regulator of the currency as a Bank of the United States.

After he had concluded,

Mr. COLQUITT obtained the floor; when the committee rose, and

The House, at half past eight o'clock, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, June 20, 1840.

Senate bill entitled "An act in addition to the act restricting the judicial system of the United States," which was reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary on Saturday, was read the third time and passed.

The CHAIR announced that the next business in order was the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Commerce a few days ago, viz:

Resolved, That the report and chart of the survey of the harbors of Beaufort and Wilmington, in North Carolina, communicated to this House by the Secretary of the Navy, and the report of the chart of the surveys of the Southern coast, from Tybee island, in Georgia, to Hunting island, in South Carolina, prepared by Lieut. Wilkes, be lithographed; and that 2,500 of each report and chart be published.

Mr. FETRIKIN opposed the adoption of the resolution, because he believed the matter of lithography had become a thing of local speculation. He then spoke of the manner in which the lithographing had been conducted.

Mr. HABERSHAM said he was obliged to conclude that, from the manner of the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he was entirely ignorant of its merits or claims. If he had inquired into its merits, there certainly cou'd not have been any objection from him. Mr. H. then showed the great importance of the chart, and advocated the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BRIGGS had no doubt that the chart was a meritorious one, but he was opposed to having it printed until there was a thorough investigation into the manner in which the lithographing had been done. He then cited an instance in which a chart had been engraved by order of the Senate, and the same lithographed by order of the House, and that done at the instance of the House cost double as much as that ordered by the Senate. It should not be lithographed unless the House was better informed of the expense. He would then go for the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved to amend the resolution by adding the following: "and also to have printed, in like manner, 5,000 copies of the geological report lately submitted to this House, for the use of the members thereof, under the direction of the Topograpical Bureau."

Mr. C. spoke of the ability of the above paper, and characterized it as one of the best of the kind ever submitted to the House. To save the time of the House, he moved the previous question.

Mr. STEENROD moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 71, nays 96.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question recurring on the call for the previous question, there was a second; and the question now being, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. BRIGGS demanded the yeas and nays; which the House refused.

So the main question having been ordered to be put, and the question being, "Shall the resolution pass?"

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The CHAIR said, upon an examination of the amendment, he found that there was another and similar motion pending, and the amendment was not, therefore, in order; and the question would be on the adoption of the original resolution.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the resolution on the table; which the House refused to do.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and it was passed—yeas 93, nays 82, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Biddle, Bond, Brockway, Albert G. Brown, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Clark, Clifford, Colquitt, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John W. INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. COLQUITT being entitled to the floor, after some introductory remarks, in which he showed the necessity of separating prejudice and feeling from debates on all questions, and the liability of every one to be led astray by such influences, he showed that the people had now become too wise to be satisfied with mere declarations of zeal for rights, and required a more satisfactory kind of evidence, viz. the actions of their servants.

It had been said that the bill before the committee was fraught with ruin, with desolation, and with wo. It therefore became their duty to examine it dispassionately, and by the rule of reason, instead of violent declamation or party prejudice, to judge of its merits.

As the Opposition, in a body, were censuring this measure, he contended that they were bound to propose some other plan to the country for accomplishing the desired end. It would not answer, that individuals should get up on the floor and denounce the bill, and talk about an antagonistical measure. It was the duty of the party to propose some measure which they considered would answer the end.

From what had been said, there could be no doubt but that a National Bank was the favorite scheme of the Opposition. Then why did they not at once come out boldly, and propose that measure to the people. This, however, he presumed would not be safe, as in some parts of the country such a proposition would not answer. Hence this crooked policy of opposing this bill, without having the courage to propose any thing in its stead. It was far more easy for them to run foul of this measure, than to propose any thing else.

Mr. C. then at some length argued the question of the constitutionality of a National Bank, and contended that the advocates of such an institution could not sustain their position for a moment, if they took the Constitution in its plain literal meaning. At the time the Constitution was framed, there were living too many men, whose rags and hardships proved they knew the value of freedom, to think of protecting a great moneyed interest, to the exclusion, and at the expense, of all the rest. Whether a man got his living by the saw or the plane, or served behind the counter, the Constitution was designed to throw the mantle of protection around all classes, instead of sacrificing them at the shrine of a great moneyed institution, for the support of men who were too idle to earn their bread by industry, and too proud to work.

He then read numerous authorities, showing the very "consistent" course of the old United States Bank, and that during its existence, instead of securing prosperity to the country, it caused nothing but distress and insolvency.

After adverting to all these facts, he asked with what consistency the Opposition could charge that this bill would bring ruin and distress, when such alone were the bitter fruits of the system they were seeking to establish. Let gentlemen, when they speak of "hard times," not forget to tell their constituents what kind of times there were when that bank was in operation.

In the course of his remarks he alluded to the charge of the Opposition, that, by destroying the banks, credit would be destroyed at the same time. He denied this, and contended that credit had always existed long before the existence of banks, and that the honest and industrious man could always get credit. Banks were not the foundation, but the abusers of credit.

By way of illustration, Mr. C. caused to be read the letter of Governor Throop on the subject. In the course of the reading, several of the Whig party objected to its introduction, on the ground that it consumed the time of the House. But, as its introduction was strictly relavent, their objection did not prevent its being read through.

The remarks of Mr. C. will appear in full hereafter.

Mr. RHETT then took the floor, and, at much length, replied to the various objections urged against the bill, which he contended was the measure of the people and for the benefit of the people. He had not concluded at 2½ o'clock, at which time the House took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess, the House went again into Committee of the Whole, and

Mr. RHETT resumed his remarks in reply to the several objections urged against the bill. After showing that the banks of England and France, could not be referred to as arguments for a National Bank in this country, which was not to be responsible to Government, he went on to show, what in his opinion was the cheapest mode of collecting the revenue. He contended that the cheapest and most Republican of collecting the taxes, and what would be least burdensome to the people, was by direct taxation. Indirect taxation was objectionable for many reasons. The first was that the people were not conscious of the amount of taxes they were paying. Again, five times the amount could be collected by indirect taxation that would be submitted to by direct taxation. Thus it was an admirable contrivance for tyranny to conceal from the people what they were actually paying. He also showed the evils of such a system in case of war, when importations ceasing, the very means by which Government depended for its support would be cut off.

Mr. R. proceeded to show that the evils arising from the fluctuation in prices, etc. were attributable solely to the banking system, for the support of which this tariff system had been fostered. He contended that the banking system was not necessary for the business of the country, and that were it not for that expansions and contractions of those institutions, and their occasional suspension of specie payments, that business would move on with regularity.

He did not mean to be understood as contending that there should be no banking. If capitalists issued their paper, and were able to redeem that paper, he had no objection to it. What he objected to was that the arm of Government should interfere for the purpose of gaining facilities to these banks beyond their means. The banking system could never be destroyed. If it were possible to destroy all the banks to-morrow, the system would remain. The interchange of paper between individuals could not be prevented. His sole object in supporting this measure was the establishment of a system for the proper collection and safekeeping of the public money. If it went beyond that, or had any other object in view, he should deem it unconstitutional.

Mr. R. after adverting to the oppressive conduct of the United States Bank, and examining the exaggerated statements as to the use of such banks, said, yet this was the very state of things that the Opposition sought to re-establish. They wished to place us again in the power of banks, who, in case of another war, could say they would or would not pay their debts, just as they pleased. All these dangers he considered would be effectually avoided by the adoption of this Independent Treasury system.

As for a National Bank, the grand alternative of this great system, he should say but little. It was needless for him to argue the unconstitutionality of such an institution. He was a State Rights man, and contended that if such a Bank were necessary, then all the people of the country whom it was to affect, should govern and rule it. He then went on to show that the existence of such a bank was inconsistent with the independence of the States, and adduced instances when, under the old United States Bank, the State institutions were made to succumb to her superior strength. He admitted that one of the effects of the present measure would be a restriction of State influence; but it would be nothing, compared with the oppression of a National Bank. The provisions of this bill were calculated to operate without partiality, and it would be evident that we ought always to base our legislation on the great fundamental principle of equal rights, etc.

Mr. R. concluded by saying that he had merely glanced at the various important principles involved, as he did not wish to detain the committee, for if it was proper the bill should pass at all, it was necessary that it should pass speedily.

Mr. DAVID D. WAGENER, after some preliminary remarks, proceeded to notice the objection raised by Mr. EVANS on yesterday, viz: that this bill was pressed to the exclusion of the appropriation bills. Mr. W. could not suppress his surprise and astonishment at such an objection. In the early part of the session, were not the Opposition continually taunting the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means, and asking him why he did not bring forward the bill? Were they not continually insinuating that the Administration party dare not, and would not bring forward the bill? And now, forsooth, when the bill was brought forward, these very same gentlemen were complaining about "delay of the appropriation bills, etc."

Mr. W. then proceeded to notice the great outcry which had been raised in relation to the "war of Govenment upon the banks." He showed that this charge was as ridiculous as it was unfounded. The act of June, 1836, empowered the Secretary to deposite the public money in such banks as paid specie for their notes, and which did not issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars. Now as soon as the banks refused to pay specie, by the words of the law, they ceased to be depositories. After their suspension the Secretary had no power to continue their use as depositories. Was the committee, then, willing to continue the immense power and responsibility of disposing of the money in the hands of the Secretary, under the supervision of the President? Had not the President called upon them repeatedly for the passage of this bill establishing additional safeguards, and had not those calls been as repeatedly unheeded. He was surprised at the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts the other day, censuring the Executive in relation to these banks, when he must have known that the law was imperative, and that when the banks ceased to pay specie, from that moment they could no longer be depositories.

Mr. W. then took a review of the shameful course pursued by the old United States Bank, and asked whether gentlemen were really willing for the re-establishment of another institution, which must and would produce similar results. In the course of his remarks on this branch of the subject, he introduced a curious piece of evidence to prove the unconstitutionality of such a Bank. It was no other than a report made by Mr. Clay of Kentucky, in the Senate, in 1811, on a memorial from the stockholders of the Bank, asking an extension of one year for the purpose of winding up its affairs. That report stated that "as they did not consider a Bank of the United States as constitutional, they could not grant the prayer," etc. Mr. W. said he merely referred to this for the benefit of the Opposition, that they might know what the opinions of Mr. Clay were at that time.

He next took a survey of all the circumstances connected with the employment of the State banks, and showed most clearly that their separation from Government was entirely their own act, in suspending specie payments, and not by any compulsory measure on the part of Government.

Mr. W. then replied at length to the various objections urged against the present bill, and showed that such objections needed only to be examined to be confuted. In the course of his remarks, he introduced a speech of Mr. Webster in 1816, on the currency, in which was the following remarkable sentence: "the sooner you collect your money in gold and silver, the better."

Mr. W. made also other extracts, which will be given as soon as his remarks can be written out in full.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania next took the floor, and on his motion the committee rose: ayes 45, noes 44.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved to adjourn.

Hr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were—yeas 54, nays 51.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Black, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, William B Campbell, Casey, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Cushing, Edward Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Everett, Galbraith, James Garland, Goode, Green, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, James, Kempshall, King, Marvin, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Petrikin, Pope, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Slade, Storrs, Stuart, Sumter, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, P. J. Wagner, Warren, and Thomas W. Williams—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, John W. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Banks, Beirne, Blackwell, William O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Clifford, Connor, Wm. R. Cooper, Crabb, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Earl, Fisher, Floyd, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, Hill of North Carolina, Holleman. Hubbard, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kille, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Montanya, Newhard, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Prentiss, Rhett, Samuels, Albert Smith, Steenrod, Swearingen, Sweney, J. Thompson, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—51.

So at half past five, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, June 22, 1840.

Mr. TAPPAN rose and said, that when the resolution submitted some days since by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] in relation to the Reporters for the Senate, was before the body, he had incidentally made the remark that we had frequently elected officers of different politics from a majority of the Senate. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] asked me in a somewhat bantering manner, to name an instance, and I replied by naming the Chaplain of the Senate. I did this on information from sources, which I deemed satisfactory, that his political sentiments were such as I represented them to be. Mr. T. said, that he had since been informed by the Chaplain that his assertion was incorrect. That he belonged to neither of the political parties of the country. That he conceived it to be his duty, as a minister of the Gospel, to abstain from any interference in political matters, considering that it would have a tendency to limit his usefulness, and prevent him doing as much good as he was desirous of doing. Every man, of course, knows his sentiments best, and Mr. T. felt convinced that he had done the Chaplain injustice in the remark he had made. Feeling thus, it gave him great pleasure to retract the statement.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a memorial from merchants of New York and other citizens, on the subject of the bankrupt law, declaring that whatever was their opinion of the expediency of passing such a law at this time, they were all agreed that the consent of the majority of the interest of creditors should be made necessary to the release of the debtor, and that the bill should not go into effect till one year after its passage.

The memorial, on motion of Mr. W. was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred

The memorial of David Green, and

The memorial of the administratrix of G. W. Owen, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which the petitions and the joint resolution for the relief of the sufferers by the tornado at Natchez had been referred, reported the joint resolution back, with an amendment, authorizing the Planters' Bank and the Agricultural Bank of Natchez to retain the public money now in their hands three years longer, from the 8th of July next, in case those banks would accept the offer, for the purpose of relieving the sufferers in question, the banks alone to continue responsible to this Government. The amendment was read, ordered to be printed, and laid on the table, Mr. W. giving notice that he should call up the bill as soon as convenient.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred House bills

For the relief of Josiah Strong;
For the relief of Samuel Brown;
For the relief of John Allison;
For the relief of William York;
For the relief of John Black;
For the relief of Thomas Collins;
For the relief of John H. Lincoln;
For the relief of Hiram Saul;
For the relief of Nathaniel Davis;
For the relief of Barton Hooper; and For the relief of Isaac Justice; severally reported the same without amendment, and recommended their indefinite postponement.

Mr. PIERCE, from the same committee, to which was referred House bills

For the relief of Peter W. Short;
For the relief of Israel Parsons; and For the relief of Medad Cook;

reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred House bills

For the relief of Samuel M. Asbury;
For the relief of James Bailey;
For the relief of William Sloan;
For the relief of Levi M. Roberts; and For the relief of John Davis; severally made adverse reports thereon.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to which was refered House bill

For the relief of Sylvester Tiffany, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred bills from the House

For the relief of Myron Chapin;
For the relief of Joseph W. Knipe;
For the relief of Simeon Knight;
For the relief of Robert Lucas;
For the relief of Wilfred Knott;
For the relief of William Poole; reported the same without amendment, and recommended their indefinite postponement.

Mr. P. form the same committee, reported the bill for the relief of Seneca Rider.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of Joshua Knnedy, assignee of George Tucker, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to purchase repeating rifles and pistols for the use of the navy; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of American citizens, resident at Malaga, respecting a burial place, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, which was agreed to.

The joint resolution for the relief of Langtree and O'Sullivan;

The bill for the relief of certain companies of Missouri volunteers;

The bill for the relief of the executor of Thomas Cooper, deceased;

A bill to refund a fine, imposed under the sedition law, to the heirs of Matthew Lyon, deceased; were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill giving the assent of Congress to the acts of Virginia incorporating the Falmouth and Alexandria Railroad Company, and for other purposes, was taken up as in committee of the whole, and, after a very interesting and animated debate, in which Messrs. TAPPAN, MERRICK, ALLEN, ROANE, WALKER, WALL, BUCHANAN, CRITTENDEN, SMITH of Connecticut, HUBBARD, and CALHOUN participated—the question, on a motion by Mr. TAPPAN to strike out the third section of the bill containing the appropriation of 300,000 dollars, being taken, it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, and White—25.

Mr. TAPPAN offered an amendment, requiring such security for carrying the mail as the Secretary of the Treasury should deem sufficient.

Mr. PRENTISS offered, as a substitute, a provision for a lien on that part of the road within the District.

After a brief conversation, the action on the bill was suspended.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, took up the bill (from the Select Committee) establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Select Committee, submitted various minor amendments, which were severally agreed to.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, having offered two or three minor amendments, which were agreed to, moved to amend the bill by securing from its operation the rights of married women, and liens and mortgages on property, all as established by State laws, so far as would not be inconsistent with certain provisions of this bill. This amendment had special reference to the laws and usages of Louisiana.

Mr. WRIGHT opposed this amendment with great earnestness, particularly as going to sanction preferences which the Senate had expressly exploded.

Mr. WEBSTER argued at some length that there was nothing of such preferences in this amendment.

Messrs. MOUTON, WALL, WALKER, PRENTISS, and CRITTENDEN also participated in the long and intricate debate on this amendment.

The amendment was then agreed to by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, and Webster—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Lumpkin, Pierce, Robinson, Sturgeon, Wall, White, Williams, and Wright—8.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted a variety of amendments, the most important of which was to require a majority of interest of the creditors, in order to obtain the release of the debtor. These amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUGGLES also offered several amendments, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented two memorials of citizens of New York, on the subject of the proposed bankrupt law, similar in tenor to those submitted by him at the commencement of the sitting; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, June 22, 1840.

Mr. CLIFFORD asked the general consent of the House to submit a resolution; which was read for the information of the House as follows:

Whereas Senate bill 127, entitled an act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, was taken up in the Committee of the Whole whole on the state of the Union on the 20th of May last, and has been under discussion to this time; and whereas the period has arrived when it is proper to close the present session of Congress with as little delay as possible; and whereas much of the indispensable public business is yet to be acted on; therefore

Resolved, That the said committee be discharged from the consideration of said bill, from and after Friday next, unless the same shall be reported to the House at an earlier day; and that said bill, with such amendments, if any, as shall have been adopted in said committee, shall be taken up in the House on Saturday next, at 12 o'clock noon, and be the special order, until finally disposed of, reserving to said committee the right, according to the rules of the House, to report the same sooner if the discussion shall terminate.

Mr. WISE objected to the reception of the resolution; and

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. WISE moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in, when 128 members answered to their names; the list of absentees was called over, until 159 answered to their names; when,

On motion of Mr. GALBRAITH, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with.

The question recurring on the motion to suspend the rules, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, were taken, and were—yeas 109, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Wm. O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chinn, Clifford, Colquitt, Connor, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, J. W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Goggin, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, J. Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hook, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Carter, Chittenden, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Davies, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goode, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Stanly, Storrs, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Peter J. Wagner, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—76.

So the House refused to suspend the rules, there not being two-thirds.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania, who was entitled to the floor, opposed the passage of the bill. In an examination of the causes of the derangement of the currency at the present day, and the consequent evils resulting therefrom, he traced it to the removal of the deposites from the Bank of the United States. He attributed all the issues of State stocks to the stimulation produced by the deposite of the revenues of the Government with the State banks. Such stocks being forced into the market abroad, produced the flood of imports which has crushed the best interests of the country; finally he attributed all the evils of the times to the "experiments" of the Administration. He then spoke of the Bank of the United States, and the good currency which that institution afforded the country.

Mr. RAYNER opposed the bill, and advanced many reasons why he would not vote for it. He, as a State Rights man, advocated a Bank of the United States as an antagonist measure to the Independent Treasury bill, and the only proper measure for the relief of the country. A National Bank, he said, was the child of the revolution; and he went for it because he believed it was a Republican measure. He then examined the course of General Jackson with reference to the currency, and attributed his intermeddling with it as the cause of all the evils and derangements complained of heretofore as well as at the present time. He also spoke of his own efforts in favor of Gen. Jackson, and acknowledged that he was deluded and misled into his support. He denounced him as a tyrant. He went into a history of the course of General Jackson in relation to the late Bank of the United States; and said, so soon as that institution refused to bow to the dictates of the tyrant, the war was commenced. He vetoed it, and all the suffering of the country was the result of it. He spoke of the deposite system which had exploded, and said he had nothing to do with forming the connection between the Government and the State banks, and he would have nothing to do with severing that connection. He then spoke of the economy of establishing a Bank of the United States to disburse the revenues, instead of passing the Independent Treasury bill. This bill would cost the Government many thousand dollars to put it in operation; but on the other hand the Government could get at least one and a half millions as a bonus to grant a charter for a bank. He then went into an argument to show the duty of the National Government to take care of the interests of the people; and in doing which he observed, that when he spoke of taking care of the interests of the people, he did not mean to be understood as referring to the wretched rabble of our cities, who shouted and hallooed at the elections, but he meant the rich as well as the poor, and the capitalist, through whose means the business of the country was carried on. Before Mr. R. concluded,

The House, at 2½ o'clock, took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. RAYNER concluded his remarks in opposition to the Independent Treasury bill, and in favor of a National Bank as its antagonist measure. He spoke of the beneficial effects of that institution as a regulator. It heretofore kept the moneys safe, the currency and exchanges regular, and could do it again. He made an argument in favor of the constitutionality of such an institution, grounded on the opinion that it was indispensably necessary to carry out that provision of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution, which gives the power to Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, to pay the debts of the Government."

Mr. HOLLEMAN then took the floor, and said that in the few words he had to say, he should not, like the gentleman who had last spoken, depend on his imagination or glowing descriptions of historical scenes. He had always been taught that denunciation and declamation were poor substitutes for argument. And he was surprised that the gentleman should have so far mistaken the character of the American people as to imagine that they would be led away by mere senseless denunciation. The gentleman had, in the course of his remarks, asked "whence all this hurry in pressing this bill." Now, did not the gentlemen remember, that a few months ago his party were constantly taunting the friends of the Administration about the "delay" of the bill? Did not the gentleman remember the sarcastic allusions to it, and the insinuations that the bill would not be brought forward at all? Yet now the bill was taken up, the friends of that gentleman had suddenly changed their cry, and the Administration members were denounced for endeavoring to pass the bill. Now what was to be done? If the bill was not brought up, the Opposition were displeased; and if it was brought up, the same course of abuse and denunciation was pursued.

After some further preliminary remarks, Mr. H. proceeded to discuss the merits of the bill, and to show its great superiority over any other system.

Alluding to the charge that losses would occur under the operation of this bill, Mr. H. asked where was the system, however well contrived, under which losses had not taken place? At what period was it, when Governments were not defrauded more or less by officers, through whose hands its money passed? Such would ever be the case, so long as the imperfection of human nature existed; and until the time when the "Millenium" should arrive, and all men become honest, such losses must be expected.

He showed that the cry about an "exclusive currency for the office holders" was as ridiculous as it was false. He asked whether the hard money would not be paid out to the numerous pensioners, our soldiers who fought our battles, and our hardy sailors who toiled on the deep. Instead of this bill being for the benefit of a few only, it was for the benefit of the mass.

Mr. H. then went into an examination of the career of the United States Bank, and from documentary evidence proved how futile were the boasted assertions of its being a "Regulator," &c. He had not concluded at eight o'clock, at which hour,

Mr. ANDREWS moved that the committee rise; which motion prevailed.

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 23, 1840.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of Ann W. Angus, widow of the late Captain Angus of the navy, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution in addition to a joint resolution authorizing certain certificates to be cancelled and reissued; which, on motion by Mr. W. and by unanimous consent, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. LUMPKIN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the memorial of the Southern Steam Packet Company for compensation for carrying the mail, asked to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. CALHOUN said the memorial was presented by his colleague, [Mr. PRESTON,] who was not now in his seat; and he hoped the action of the Senate would be delayed until he was present; which was agreed to.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred bills from the House,

For the relief of Elijah Fouchee;

For the relief of Hugh Davis;

For the relief of Jabez Collins;

For the relief of Thurston Cornell; and made adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

The House bill to refund a fine imposed on the late Matthew Lyon, under the sedition laws, to his legal heirs and representatives;

A bill for the relief of the executor of Thomas Cooper, deceased;

A bill for the relief of certain companies of Missouri volunteers; were read a third time, and passed.

The joint resolution for the relief of Langtree and O'Sullivan was taken up on its third reading, and after debate, in which Messrs. PORTER, TAPPAN, WALL, DAVIS, and BUCHANAN participated, it was recommitted to the Joint Committee on the Library.

The resolution of the Committee on the Post Office, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Southern Steam Packet Company, was taken up, and after some remarks by Mr. LUMPKIN and Mr. PRESTON, was agreed to.

The bill for the relief of the sureties of Archibald Sneed, deceased; and were severally considered as in committee of the whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes;

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. PRENTISS spoke at some length on the general merits of the bill. He drew a distinction between insolvent laws and bankrupt laws, which distinction, he argued, prevailed in England till long after the adoption of the Constitution in this country. He argued from this, and from other considerations and documents, that the power of bankruptcy in the Constitution was merely a supplemental part of the power over commerce; and that a bankrupt law, therefore, ought to be confined to the commercial classes, and should be carefully made to do equal justice to debtor and creditor.

While Mr. P. admitted that this bill might be productive of highly beneficial and desirable results, it would inevitably open wide the way for various evils which Mr. P. specified, the chief of which was the introduction and practice of frauds. On the whole, Mr. P. dared not try it, even as an experiment; for he was greatly apprehensive that it would work a revolution of the worst kind, both in the morals and business of the country.

Mr. P. having concluded his remarks,

Mr. WRIGHT offered an amendment, requiring the voluntary bankrupt to set forth in his petition to the court for a discharge under the act, a list of his creditors, their respective places of residence, and the amount due to each; together with an accurate inventory of his property, rights and credits, of every name, kind, and description, and the location and situation of each and every parcel thereof; these statements to be made upon oath, and according to the best knowledge and belief of the debtor.

This amendment was adopted without a division.

Mr. WRIGHT then offered a further amendment, to add an additional cause for involuntary bankruptcy, to those enumerated in the bill, in substance as follows:

"That in case the debtor, being arrested or surrendered in the discharge of his bail, shall remain in prison forty days, or shall escape therefrom, or shall not within forty days give the necessary bail, or security, required by law, when his person, lands, or effects, shall be arrested or attached, by process issuing out of any court of record, then the creditors should be authorized to proceed under the bankrupt law against him as a bankrupt."

This amendment was advocated at some length by Messrs. WRIGHT and WALL, and opposed by Messrs. HUNTINGTON, CRITTENDEN, WALKER, WEBSTER, and PHELPS, and negatived—ayes 18, noes 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, and White—23.

Mr. WALL offered an amendment, to add an additional clause for involuntary bankruptcy, to those enumerated in the bill, in substance as follows:

"That in case the debtor shall make any fraudulent gift, sale, or other transfer of his goods, chattels, credits, or property of any description, or shall declare himself to be insolvent, or unable to pay his debts, or other engagements, then the creditors should be authorized to proceed under the bankrupt law against him as a bankrupt."

The amendment was lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Roane, Robinson Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Wall, Wright, and Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, and Williams—20.

Mr. WRIGHT then offered a further amendment, of the following substance:

"That in cases where a creditor makes the application for a commission of bankruptcy against a debtor, any other creditor may come before the court, or the jury, and offer proof of collusion in the application between the creditor making the application and the debtor against whom it is made; and if such proof should be made to the satisfaction of the court, or jury, then the proceedings should be discontinued, and no certificate, or discharge, given to the bankrupt under the act."

Mr. WEBSTER inquired what could be the necessity of this amendment, when every bankrupt could make his own application at pleasure?

Mr. WRIGHT replied that, as the bill stood, the amendment would be wholly unimportant; but that another amendment, which he proposed to offer, if adopted, would make this very essential. In order, however, to enable the Senate to act clearly and intelligibly, if the Senate would give him leave, he would pass this amendment, and offer that one upon which this particularly depended, though not in the proper order of his amendments offered yesterday, and now printed and upon our tables.

A general call of "leave, leave," being responded,

Mr. WRIGHT offered an amendment, in substance as follows:

"That in every case of voluntary bankruptcy, the certificate and discharge provided for in the law shall not be granted without the consent of at least one half, in amount of debts, of the creditors of such bankrupt."

This amendment was lost by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, and White—22.

Mr. WRIGHT then declared his willingness to omit his preceding amendment, depending upon that just rejected, and proceeded to offer a further amendment, in the following words:

"And in case it shall be made to appear to the court, in the course of the proceedings in bankruptcy, that the bankrupt, his application being voluntary, has, subsequent to the first day of January last, or at any other time in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt law, by assignments or otherwise, given or secured, any preference to one creditor over another, he shall not receive a discharge, unless the same be assented to by a majority in interest of those of his creditors who have not been so preferred."

This amendment was strongly opposed by Mr. WEBSTER, and advocated by Mr. WRIGHT, and agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, and White—21.

Mr. WRIGHT then offered the following further amendment:

That the bill should take effect from and after the thirtieth day of June next, and not sooner.

Mr. WALKER objected to the length of time, and proposed the first day of January next.

Mr. WRIGHT said if the gentleman will accept the fourth day of March next, I will so modify my amendment.

Mr. WALKER assenting,

Mr. WRIGHT modified his amendment so as to read from and after the fourth day of March next, instead of the thirtieth day of June next.

The amendment was; adopted; ayes 23, noes not counted.

Mr. WILLIAMS then offered an amendment of the following substance:

"That the debtor shall not be discharged, in case a majority of his creditors, in number and value of debts, and who shall have proved their debts before the court, shall file their written dissent against the granting of such discharge."

This amendment was adopted without a division.

Mr. W. then offered an entirely new section to the bill, in the following words:

"And if, in any case of bankruptcy, a majority in number and value of the creditors who shall have proved their debts at the time of hearing of the petition of the bankrupt for a discharge, as hereinbefore provided, shall, at such hearing, file their written dissent to the allowance of a discharge and certificate to such bankrupt, or if, upon such hearing, a discharge shall not be decreed to him, the bankrupt may demand a trial by jury, upon a proper issue, to be directed by the court, at such time and place, and in such manner, as the court may order; or he may appeal to the circuit court next to be held within the district after fourteen days from the time of claiming the appeal, and such appeal shall be claimed, and notice thereof given to the court below within ten days after the decision appealed from, and said appeal may be heard by said court summarily or by a jury at the option of the bankrupt, and the creditors may appear and object against a decree of discharge and the allowance of the certificate as hereinbefore provided. And if, upon a full hearing of the parties it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court, or the jury shall find that the bankrupt has made a full disclosure and surrender of all his estate as by this act required, and has in all things conformed to the directions thereof, the court shall make a decree of discharge and certify the same to the court below, whereupon the court below shall allow the same, and grant a certificate as provided in the fourth section of this act."

This amendment also was adopted without a decision.

Upon the motion of Mr. RUGGLES, an amendment was then made as to the description and amount of property to be surrendered to the bankrupt and his family, and giving to the assignee and court certain discretion in that matter, but we did not take the particular contents of the proposition.

On motion of Mr. CRITTENDEN, the amount of debt requisite to entitle persons in general to the benefit of this bill, was not fixed at any sum, and for merchants, bankers, &c. it was fixed at $2,000 and above.

Mr. WALL offered two amendments (formal and technical) which were severally agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to confine the operation of the bill exclusively to future contracts, and called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and this amendment was rejected—yeas 14, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, and Tappan—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, and Young—32.

Mr. WALL, after some remarks on the propriety of giving the appointment of the assignees to the creditors of the bankrupt, moved to recommit the bill, for the purpose of so modifying it, which was disagreed to—ayes 20, noes 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, and Williams—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, and Young—26.

Mr. HUBBARD then moved an adjournment, which was disagreed to—ayes 21, nays 26.

Mr. RUGGLES then moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision, declaring any attachment on mesne process null, which should be made subsequent to the passage of the bill, and to the detriment of a portion of the creditors. The amendment was rejected—ayes 11, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Knight, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, and Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, and Young—35.

No further amendments being offered, the bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendments made in committee of the whole were concurred in.

The question then coming up on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and the ayes and noes being ordered thereon,

Mr. WALL moved that the bill, as amended, should be printed; but this motion being declared to be out of order, he moved to lay the bill on the table, for the purpose of having it printed; which was agreed to—ayes 24, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, and Williams—23.

The Senate then went into Executive session for a short time,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, June 23, 1840.

Mr. WISE asked the consent of the House to submit a joint resolution for the adjournment of both Houses of Congress sine die, on Saturday, the 11th day of July next.

Objection was made to its reception.

Mr. WISE moved to suspend the rules; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in till 146 members answered to their names; when,

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with.

The yeas and nays having been ordered on the motion to suspend the rules, were taken, and were, yeas 75, nays 94.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. ADAMS presented to the House from ——, a work on political economy; which was, on his motion, ordered to be deposited in the Library of the House.

The CHAIR announced that the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by Mr. McKAY, was the first thing in order; which were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to prepare and report to the House, at the commencement of the next session, a list of all the post roads in the United States, with a diagram or diagrams, on which they shall be delineated, showing how long they have been in operation; the kind of service on each, whether on horseback, sulkey, stage, railroads, or in steamboats; the amount of receipts, and the cost of transportation on the same, respectively; also, showing the new routes named in the petitions and resolutions presented at the present session, with an estimate of the probable expense of putting each of them in operation.

Resolved, That all petitions and memorials for the establishment of post-roads presented, and resolutions of inquiry for the same purpose, adopted at the present session, be referred to the Postmaster General for his information.

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to prepare and report, at the same time, a list of all post-roads where the mails, though now carried in stages, might be carried on horseback, or in sulkeys, with the amount paid for the stage service, and the average cost of carrying similar mails on horseback or in sulkeys, in the sections of country where such routes may be respectively located.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. BROWN of Mississippi, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of J. M. Strader; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMONTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred the bill of the House entitled an act to regulate the fees of clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the Northern and Southern Districts of the State of Mississippi, reported it back with an amendment as a substitute; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMONTON, from the same committee, to which had been referred the petition of Joseph Ramsey, in relation to a pension, made a report in which it was argued that Mr. R. was a party to the fraud; and the report was accompanied by a resolution that he was not entitled to any relief.

Mr. HOPKINS made some remarks, showing that Mr. R's claim to a pension was well established; and that he was not a party to the fraud which had deprived him of the pension obtained from the Government. He concluded by moving that the report be committed to the same committee, with instructions to report a bill for his relief.

Mr. SERGEANT opposed that motion, and made some remarks showing that Mr. R. having given agents a power of attorney to obtain the pension from the Government, and those agents having defrauded him of the same, in equity he, and not the Government, should lose. He having given the power of attorney, was, though innocently so, to that extent a party to the fraud. Mr. S. concluded, by moving that the subject be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. SAMUELS, the report and papers were ordered to be printed.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to authorize the judicial adjustment of the claim of the Municipality No. 1, of the city of New Orleans, to certain lands within said municipality; which was read twice, and Committed to the Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. CRARY, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the House, instructing that committee to inquire into the propriety of reporting a bill in relation to the apportionment under the census of 1840.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Charles Lewis, John Winston, Elipha-let Spafford, William Ruckman, John McCollan, and Richard Pauletts; which were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ELY, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of John Briggs, the representatives of William Slaughter, Dennis Purcel, the heirs of Captain John Stokes, Stephen Graham, deceased, and Captain Robert Vance; which were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CRAIG, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Thomas Chapman, Lathrop Allen, Samuel Jones, Captain Trupley White, and Roger Staynor; which were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of John H. Kelly, and a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Jane Fentenburgh, late widow of Captain Hawkins Boone; which were read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Francis Malone, Harriet Baker, Theodore Middleton, Asa Clark, Henry Whiting, and Richard Mack; which were severally ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of George Mayfield; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Also reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of Joseph Bogy; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. R. GARLAND, from the same committee, reported a bill to confirm to the heirs and legal representatives of John Brown, deceased, their title to a tract of land; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Also, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to confirm the claims to land in the districts between the Rio Hondo and Sabine rivers; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana, from the same committee, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bills, entitled

An act for the relief of George de Passo, of Louisiana;

An act for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of William Conaway;

An act for the relief of James Smith of Arkansas;

An act confirming the claim of the heirs of Joseph Thompson, sr. deceased, to a tract of land in Missouri; and which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HASTINGS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Erwin; and a bill for the relief of Hugh Riddle, of the State of New York; which were read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. H. also made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Silas Wells, Charles Holmes, and Stephen Howard; which were ordered to lie on the table; and on the petition of Thomas G. Smith, reported that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

On motion of Mr. WICK, the Committee on Private Land Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Abraham Wayland and others, Amos Burdyne and George Williams, and that the latter have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. W. also reported back to the House, from the same committee, without amendment, Senate bills entitled

An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Pierre Bonhomme; and

An act for the relief of Thomas P. Copes; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DILLET, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Lewis Durete; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Also, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Maurice Wright; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which had been referred Senate bill entitled an act to regulate duties on the importation of the production of the fine arts, reported the same back to the House without amendment, and with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. A. then made some remarks in relation to the impropriety of the Senate originating such a bill—it being a revenue bill. After which,

The question was taken on the recommendation of the committee, that it be indefinitely postponed, and agreed to.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of Jubal B. Hancock; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. B. also made unfavorable reports on the petitions of James Smith, Charles Lewis, and Thos. A. Walker; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. B. also reported from the same committee the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of the House of the 7th March last, as declared the expediency of suspending the further execution of the first and second clauses of the fourth article of the treaty made with the Winnebago Indians in 1837, be rescinded.

Mr. CRARY moved to lay the resolution on the table, till the committee shall have reported on the subject committed to them for investigation; but he withdrew the motion at the suggestion of

Mr. BELL, who said the committee had just closed a most laborious investigation; and so soon as an abstract of the testimony (which was voluminous) shall have been prepared, the committee would make a full report. The committee had directed him to report, in part, this resolution. The committee did not believe there was sufficient evidence to justify a new commission; but there were many things developed which they were desirous to lay before the House, with their opinions thereon. The reason why they had directed him to report in part, was that some of the claims were without exception, though they were very large; and he did not think there was sufficient evidence which would go to show that the smallest claim should be disallowed. He believed that a great deal of injustice had been done these claimants, and that there should be reparation without delay. He had not concluded, but the morning hour having expired,

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole (Mr. BANKS in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. HOLLEMAN being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from last evening in support of the bill, and in exposing the fallacy of the argument adduced in favor of the re-establishment of a National Bank.

In adverting to the history of the old United States Bank, he showed that it commenced in fraud, and said it was no wonder it should end in ruin. He reminded the committee that a great portion of the stock was purchased by men who, after their names were set down, immediately borrowed money from the Bank to pay for that stock—thus paying in the capital in the notes of the Bank itself. He also showed from authentic sources that instead of that institution acting as a regulator, at one period specie was selling at its own doors at a premium.

In ths course of his remarks, Mr. H. flanked his position against the Bank, by some pointed extracts from a speech of Mr. Webster in 1816 in favor of a system of hard currency, etc. and who said "the sooner that system was adopted the better." He also caused to be read extracts of a similar character from speeches of Mr. Senator Rives in 1834, strongly recommending the measure, but who somehow had since wheeled round, and was now attacking the system with all his might. He, Mr. H. would not pretend to say what were the causes which produced this great change. Perhaps there were some private griefs, or disappointed expectations which had an agency in the matter.

Mr. H. then illustrated the disastrous results of the continued expansions and contractions of the currency under the banking system, and the injurious effects such a system produced on the laboring classes. [His remarks will hereafter appear in full.]

Mr. JENIFER then took the floor in opposition to the bill. He had not concluded at half past two o'clock, when the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BANKS in the Chair, on the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. JENIFER being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks, expressing his intention to oppose the bill. Before proceeding to do so, Mr. J. commenced an examination of the political course of several members of the House in relation to the bill. Among others, he referred to the course of Mr. BLACK of Georgia.

Mr. J. was repeatedly and loudly called to order by several members for irrelevancy in introducing papers, etc. having no connection with the subject under debate.

Mr. J. contended that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLACK] had been permitted to allude to the course of Col. Gamble, and that he had not been called to order for so doing.

Mr. BLACK stated that, in his reference to Col. Gamble on a former day, he was strictly in order, as he was showing the vote of that gentleman on the Sub-Treasury bill of Mr. Gordon in 1834.

Mr. JENIFER then proceeded to make further allusions to the course of Mr. B. in relation to the bill under debate, when

Mr. BLACK rose and said that, if the committee permitted the gentleman from Maryland to attack his course on the Sub-Treasury bill, he trusted, as a matter of justice, he would be permitted to reply.

Mr. PETRIKIN called Mr. B. to order.

The CHAIR wished to know whether th gentleman from Maryland yielded the floor to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. JENIFER replied that he had yielded the floor to the gentleman for the purpose of explanation.

Mr. BLACK said, no, not for explanation. My course needs no explanation. What I wish is, an opportunity to reply. I have no explanation to make; but I have a reply.

After some debate, of a conversational character, Mr. BLACK resumed his seat, stating, however, that, at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, he should demand, as an act of justice, an opportunity to reply to the attack.

Mr. JENIFER then resumed his remarks, and proceeded to make some allusions to the conduct of certain gentlemen who had attended a meeting at Bladensburg, in his State, on Saturday last, for the purpose of enlightening the people, &c. He was understood to regret that those gentlemen had not given him notice of the meeting, that he might have extended to them the hospitality of his State. He, however, gave them an invitation to meet him there on the 4th of July.

The remarks of Mr. J. were delivered in so low a tone, that the Reporter was unable to comprehend their import, in many cases. Mr. J. was understood to charge that some of those who attended the above meeting had uttered "base calumnies," &c.

Mr. HOPKINS explained, that he, for one, had attended the meeting by invitation. It was the first time he had ever been there, and he found some very clever, warm-hearted people. Mr. H. then asked Mr. J. to state whether he applied the charge to all who attended, or whether he made any exception.

Mr. JENIFER was understood to disclaim having any allusion to Mr. H. and made some further remarks in relation to others, which it was impossible to hear.

Mr. J. then referred to the speech of Mr. STRONG as published in last evening's "Globe," on which he appeared desirous to make some comments. He begged first to ask Mr. S. whether there was any thing in the speech, as published, which was not delivered in the House.

Mr. STRONG explained that when, on a former day, he was addressing the committee, he was called to order by the CHAIR. In publishing his speech, he had inserted what he intended to have said before he was so called to order. Also, that he had inserted those portions of the speech in such a way, that there would be no difficulty in perceiving how the case stood. He wished to know if the gentleman from Maryland was answered.

Mr. JENIFER then wished Mr. STRONG to inform him, whether the following portion of his speech was delivered in the House or not.

"This lesson throws a broad and strong light on the future. The view it affords is full of encouragement to the friends of popular liberty. It shows them that the people will act honestly and intelligently; that they will treat the "log cabin and hard cider" flummeries and fooleries of the Opposition with the scorn and the contempt they merit. It presents to their admiring gaze the entire and total rout and overthrow in the coming contest of the combined factions of Abolitionism, Conservatism, political Antimasonry, and Federalism, and the brilliant victory of Van Buren and Democracy."

Mr. STRONG replied in the affirmative, and that it was the concluding paragraph of his speech.

Mr. JENIFER was then understood as expressing his intention to proceed in the discussion of Abolitionism, etc.

The CHAIR decided that Mr. J. was out of order, on the ground that the discussion of Abolitionism, Conservatism, political Antimasonry, and log cabin and hard cider, was irrelevant to the subject under debate.

From this decision Mr. JENIFER, after making some remarks not distinctly heard, took an appeal.

The CHAIR then stated the ground of his decision, which was, that the gentleman from Maryland was going on to discuss Abolitionism, hard cider, log cabins, etc. because the gentleman from New York had put those words into his speech, and that such a discussion would be out of order.

Some conversation here took place between Mr. STRONG and the CHAIR, on the subject of the paragraph alluded to.

Mr. STRONG explained that the words there used had been delivered in the House, but were the concluding sentences of his speech, (which probably accounts for his not being called to order, as before the CHAIR could have risen, Mr. S. had resumed his seat.)

The CHAIR then informed the gentleman from Maryland that he could not be permitted to proceed in the discussion of such subjects.

The question being on the appeal—

Mr. BARNARD rose for the purpose of propounding a question to the CHAIR as to the state of the facts. His question was simply whether, because the gentleman from Maryland was not going on to say something about Abolitionism, on the ground that the gentleman from New York had referred to it in his speech——

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Several members here called Mr. BARNARD to order, and a scene of great confusion arose, which lasted for some minutes.

After the disorder had somewhat subsided, Mr. PROFFIT called for tellers on the appeal, which were ordered.

The question then being put as follows: "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the committee?" The ayes were 68.

Mr. JENIFER here complained that his appeal had not been fairly stated, and on that he called upon his friends not to vote. Messrs. PROFFIT, BARNARD, and others took the same ground, and called to their friends, "Do not let us vote."

Mr. JENIFER said he hoped no friend of his would vote.

The confusion and disorder was here renewed with increased violence, upwards of a score of members being on their feet and attempting to speak at once.

The CHAIR again stated the grounds of his decision, viz: That the gentleman was going on to discuss Abolitionism, hard cider, etc. because the gentleman from New York had referred to those subjects in the concluding paragraph of his speech, and that such was irrelevant, etc.

Mr. PROFFIT protested, in a loud voice, against this statement, and denounced it as unfair.

Several members called Mr. PROFFIT to order, and insisted that he should take his seat.

The question on the appeal was taken by tellers; Messrs. BRIGGS and CHAPMAN of Alabama acted as such; and those opposed to the decision of the CHAIR refusing to pass through the tellers, and their being no quorum of the affirmative votes,

The CHAIR had no alternative than to rise and report the fact to the House.

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair,

Mr. JENIFER was proceeding to refer to what had occurred in committee, when he was called to order by the SPEAKER, on the ground that there could be no debate.

At the request of several members, the SPEAKER counted the House, and a quorum appearing in their seats, the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole—Mr. BANKS in the chair.

The question being on the appeal,

Mr. JENIFER contended that the CHAIR, in stating the ground of the appeal, had erred as to the fact. Mr. J. said he was not proceeding to discuss the subject referred to in the speech of the gentleman from New York, but had merely expressed his intention of so doing. When he was called to order, he had not gone on to discuss them—he had not said a single word.

The CHAIR repeated that he had called the gentleman to order on the ground that he was proceeding to discuss the subject of Abolition, etc.

Mr. BRIGGS coincided with the CHAIR as to what he believed were the facts of the case. The gentleman from Maryland, after reading the paragraph from the speech of the gentleman from New York on the subject of Abolition, was then proceeding to speak upon it, when the CHAIR interfered, and he (Mr. B.) thought very properly.

The CHAIR again propounded the question on the appeal, on which tellers had been ordered, and there were—ayes 68 in favor of the decision. The Whigs opposed to the decision of the CHAIR again refused to vote.

Mr. ADAMS and others called upon their friends not to vote, and the result was, that the CHAIR was again compelled to rise and report the absence of a quorum, although there was a quorum in their seats.

The SPEAKER having resumed the CHAIR,

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama moved to adjourn.

On this motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 20, nays 119.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. JENIFER then addressed the SPEAKER on the subject of his appeal in committee, and complained that he had been denied the right of speaking on his own appeal, which he demanded as a right, etc.

Mr. KEIM asked if the gentleman was to be the sole judge of what was right.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman was under the control of, and must abide by, the decisions of the committee.

Mr. JENIFER wished to know if he had not the right to ask the SPEAKER to appoint another chairman.

Mr. BANKS rose to reply, as did other gentleman, when

The SPEAKER said there could be no debate; and, as a quorum was now present, the House would go again into committee, and the CHAIRMAN would be pleased to resume the chair.

Mr. BANKS accordingly resumed the chair, and the question still being on the appeal,

Mr. WISE having been absent, desired the CHAIR to re-state the ground of his decision.

The CHAIR did so as follows, that, after the gentleman from Maryland had read the paragraph from Mr. STRONG'S speech, on Abolition, etc. he was proceeding to debate the subject.

After some debate of a conversational character, Mr. JENIFER reduced his appeal to writing, and it was read by the CLERK as follows:

"Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland, read in his place a paragraph from a speech delivered by Mr. STRONG of New York, in the same committee, on the same subject, viz: the Sub-Treasury bill, which paragraph is as follows, (see above.)

"Mr. STRONG answered that it had been delivered by him, and Mr. JENIFER then avowed his intention of replying to the allegations and matters contained in that paragraph. The CHAIR called Mr. JENIFER to order, and Mr. JENIFER appealed from that decision."

The question was then taken by tellers, on sustaining the decision of the CHAIR, and resulted—ayes 80, noes 51.

So the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed, and Mr. JENIFER decided to be out of order.

Mr. HOPKINS then moved that the gentleman from Maryland be permitted to proceed in order; which motion prevailed.

Mr. JENIFER then resumed his remarks, and proceeded to make some comments on the political course of Mr. BROWN of Mississippi, and more especially on the vote of that gentleman when a member of the Mississippi Legislature, in relation to the issue of post notes. He also referred to a recent speech of Mr. B. in which the letter denied having voted for post notes in 1839.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi reminded the gentleman that his colleague [Mr. BROWN] had made no speech on the present bill, and was understood to raise a point of order as to the propriety of referring to a speech delivered on another subject.

Mr. JENIFER proceeded and said he could show from the record that Mr. B. did vote for the issue of post notes in Mississippi.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi again rose and reminded Mr. J. that his colleague [Mr. BROWN] was absent. He would, however, undertake to say that his colleague, if present, could explain the matter to the entire satisfaction of the gentleman and the House He hoped, therefore, that no question would be raised calculated to affect his colleague's veracity. Mr. T. added that if it was in order he himself would explain the matter to the satisfaction of the House and the people of the country.

The CHAIR said it would not be in order.

Mr. JENIFER said he was going to show that the Legislature of Mississippi had issued post notes, and that the gentleman [Mr. BROWN] had voted for these notes in lieu of United States Bank notes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi wished to ask the gentleman from Maryland if he was going to debate the subject of post notes.

Mr. JENIFER said he was going to show that the record falsified what the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. BROWN,] had said in his speech.

Mr. THOMPSON said the record was false, and he could show that the man who made the record had admitted he had placed Mr. BROWN in a false position.

Mr. JENIFER was understood to say that if the record was false, that altered the case. All he intended to say was, that the record as it stood, falsified what the gentleman [Mr. BROWN] had said in relation to his vote on the issue of post notes.

Mr. THOMPSON, in the absence of his colleague, asked leave to explain the matter. He then made a statement in relation to the record, in substance that the man who made the record, had published in the newspapers a statement as to the manner in which the record was made, and how he had placed General BROWN in a false position, etc. The people of Mississippi understood the matter perfectly well. Besides, he would remind the gentleman from Maryland, that his colleague, Mr. B. had not denied having voted for post notes in 1836. On the contrary, he had admitted it. All he denied was voting for them in 1839.

Mr. JENIFER made some further remarks, pending which

Mr. THOMPSON informed him that he had despatched a messenger for his colleague, who would no doubt like to answer for himself.

Mr. JENIFER brought his remarks to a close, protesting that the freedom of debate no longer existed, and assuring the committee that what he had been prevented from saying in the House, shall appear elsewhere.

Mr. ALLEN of Ohio next obtained the floor, when

Mr. BROWN of Mississippi, having now arrived, with the permission of Mr. ALLEN, took the floor for the purpose of making an explanation in relation to the charge of Mr. JENIFER, on the subject of the Mississippi post notes. He spoke of the chivalry of the gentleman from Maryland making an attack on him when he was absent. He observed that having had no notification that the gentleman from Maryland intended to make any allusions to his course in the Legislature of Mississippi, he had left the House for the purpose of fulfilling an engagement; but he had been informed, that during his absence the gentleman from Maryland had said, that he (Mr. B.) had denied having voted for the issue of post notes in 1836.

Now he appealed to the gentleman from Tennessee, and several other gentlemen, who heard his remarks, whether he did not expressly state that he did vote for the issue of post notes in 1836. Such was the fact, and the gentlemen near him would testify to the truth of the statement. But, although he had said that he voted for those post notes in 1836, he had also distinctly denied having voted for them in 1839, although that charge had been made again and again, by persons in his own State, having no regard for decency or political honesty. He would now repeat what he had said on a former occasion—that, when the post note system was first introduced in Mississippi, acting under the advice of certain bank directors, he did reluctantly vote for them; but it was soon discovered that they would not answer, and the system exploded. After its failure, he then voted against them, as it was then ascertained by all parties that they were not the things which they expected them to be.

He must also be allowed to say that he could not refrain from expressing his surprise at the most extraordinary course of the gentleman from Maryland in raking up the votes of honorable members of the House, given in their own State Legislatures. What object the gentleman could have in thus searching out the votes of individual members when in their State Legislatures, for the purpose of holding them up to the country, he would leave to the House to determine. What was it to he gentleman from Maryland how he acted when a member of the Legislature of Mississippi? What was it to the gentleman if he voted a thousand times for post notes? It was the business of none but the people of Mississippi, and they had proved their satisfaction by giving him increased majorities at his elections.

Mr. BLACK here rose and appealed to the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN] to permit him to reply to the attack made upon him by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER.]

Mr. ANDREWS objected, and called Mr. B. to order.

The CHAIR stated that the gentleman from Ohio was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLACK. I am aware of that, and I appeal to the courtesy of that gentleman to allow me to repel the attack which has been made upon me by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. ANDREWS contended that it was not in the power of the gentleman from Ohio to yield the floor, without losing it himself.

Mr. BLACK, with much vehemence, asked if the House would not give him an opportunity to reply to the unjust attack which had been made upon him.

Here a scene of great confusion arose, and Mr. BLACK persisted in urging his request for an opportunity to repel the attack, amidst loud cries of "order," "go on," etc.

The CHAIR having restored order, stated that, as objection was made, the gentleman from Georgia must resume his seat.

Mr. BLACK did so, remonstrating however at the want of courtesy in those gentlemen who objected to afford him a chance to reply.

A motion was then made that the committee rise, and tellers being ordered, the vote was—ayes 63, noes 63.

The CHAIR voted in the negative. So the motion was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN then commenced his remarks, and continued until 8 o'clock in opposition to the bill, when he gave way to a motion that the committee rise; which motion prevailed.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, June 24, 1840.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judicary, reported

A bill to amend the act approved May 13, 1800, entitled "an act to amend an act, entitled an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," and

A bill to authorize the stereotyping, printing, and publishing of a complete edition of the laws of the United States, and the distribution thereof; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MOUTON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill confirming the claim of the heirs of Antonio Gras to a tract of land in Louisiana.

The joint resolution in addition to a joint resolution authorizing certain certificates to be cancelled and re-issued;

The bill for the relief of the sureties or Archibald Sneed, deceased; and

The bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes, were severally read a third time, and passed.

GENERAL ORDERS.

The bill further supplemental to an act entitled "an act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases," passed February 24, 1839, after being discussed by Messrs. WALL, KNIGHT, and TALLMADGE;

The bill to enable the United States to discharge liens and incumbrances upon any real estate which now is, or hereafter may become, the property of the United States, after being debated by Messrs. WALL, DAVIS, CALHOUN, and BUCHANAN; were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to regulate the legal proceedings, and to provide for the more speedy trial of causes in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, was discussed by Messrs. WALL, KING, WALKER, and SMITH of Indiana, and amended by striking out the additional compensation; and after some further remarks by Messrs. KING and LINN, it was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the bill for the bill for the relief of Auguste Davezac, William D. Jones and Nathaniel Niles, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. HUBBARD moved in Senate the amendment rejected in committee, compelling the debtor to become bankrupt if on his arrest or imprisonment he should not procure bail or security in 40 days.

After a few remarks by Mr. KING, showing that this amendment might operate oppressively, it was withdrawn by the mover.

Some minor amendments having been made on motion by Mr. Williams and Mr. Wall—

Mr. WALL moved the compulsory bankruptcy of a debtor in case he should declare himself to be insolvent.

The amendment was rejected by—ayes 8, noes not counted.

Mr. WALKER asked if the Senator from New York (Mr. Wright) would consent to change the time when the bill would go into operation from the fourth of March to the first of January or February, assigning as a reason for the request that, in a particular district in Mississippi, the postponement to the fourth of March, would in effect postpone the time several months longer. To save the trouble of voting, &c. Mr. W. would now agree to the first of February, if none objected, though he should much prefer the first of January, and should move that time, if it should be necessary to make a motion at all.

Mr. WRIGHT, after a few remarks as to a point of order, said he could not consent to this request.

Mr. WALKER now moved to reconsider the vote by which the fourth of March was fixed as the day when the bill should go into operation.

This motion was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, and Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—19.

Mr. WRIGHT now moved the first of February, Mr. WALKER the first of January, and Mr. HENDERSON the first day of December next.

After an irregular conversation on order, precedence, and a renewal of the compromise at first proposed by Mr. WALKER—

Mr. KING said it was in order to vote for the fourth of March, which was the question to be reconsidered; and that day was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, aud Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, and Webster—24.

Mr. WALKER now moved the 1st of January, and Mr. WRIGHT the 1st of February; and, after a short conversation, precedence was understood to fall on Mr. WRIGHT'S motion, as an amendment to the motion of Mr. WALKER.

And, accordingly, the 1st of February next was fied as the day when the bill should go into operation, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—25.

YAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster and White—21.

The operation of the bill being limited to two years,

Mr. DIXON moved to strike out this limitation, leaving the time indefinite. He said there might be occasion for legislation, where a limited period of time for the existence of a law would be very proper; when, for instance, the law was to remedy a mere temporary or partial evil. But a law that was intended as the commencement of a permanent national system, regulating finally the great relation of debtor and creditor, and that, too, in pursuance of a constitutional provision of the Federal Government, he could not but deem such a limitation unnecessary, to say the least of it, inasmuch as Congress could at any session repeal the law, whenever that repeal might be deemed expedient. It might be harmless enough for a man to make bargains with himself, and prescribe limitation for his own action, because, while in the exercise of free agency, he could enforce or cancel them at pleasure, without the imputation of bad faith, and so a Legislature in many matters may limit their acts of legislation to a given period of time, which they can always control. But, in relation to this subject, this limitation would be worse than useless; it will give to the intention of this law an inauspicious character. It will be considered that the makers of it, instead of forming a law for a permanent bankrupt system, have only intended it as a mere temporary relief law, for a particular class—as a mere sponge to wipe out the old scores of the present insolvent debtors. All will admit that ought not to be the only object of the law, although it would be among its very desirable ends. It has been supposed that this effort for a bankrupt law was made as another experiment for that system of bankruptcy authorized by the Constitution, and contemplated from the commencement of the Government. But is two years a fair proportion of time for such an experiment? It will be long enough to show its imperfections and its abuses; for all new systems are obnoxious to abuse, and in their first operations develope their latent defects.

But it is said the law can be extended. That may happen; but it is more probable that such will be the use made of it as to render it unpopular, and put an end to further legislation on that subject. The doubt that will be entertained of any extension of the law, or the passage of any other law on the subject, will enrol thousands on the bankrupt calendar. When the period of this bankrupt law is drawing to a close, many a man who might get on well enough in business would begin to reflect on his chances of fortune some time hence, and calling to mind the sufferings of the insolvent debtor when there is no bankrupt law, would seize the opportunity as it passed. The prompt and watchful spirit that pervades this country marks the periods of time when self-interest may be best promoted, and when self-preservation can be best secured. What course do men adopt when statutes of limitation are passed? Cutting off State demands of any other law of limitation, do you not see a general movement to come within the law? Do you not see your dockets enlarged with cases, and your courts of law filled with suitors? All act upon the maxim of making hay while the sun shines. Thus you will see men in crowds moving for the bankrupt law. Some upon the voluntary principle will rush into it, while others upon the coercive principle are thrust into it. All, for aught I know, may be very appropriate subjects, for I am only speaking of the effects it will have on the fate of the experiment. This will be the period when the public will have the subject under consideration, and the long list of bankrupts will be alarming, bring the system into public odium, and there will be an end of bankrupt laws.

Would the people of this country be in favor of this law if they supposed nothing more was intended than two years' use of it? The adoption of this system involves sacrifices; it contravenes a salutary maxim of legislation; it is retrospective in its operation on past contracts now outstanding; it adds another change in business relations, to the inconvenience of a people already worn down with changes; it gives a new character to the relation of debtor and creditor; all which would be borne, and cheerfully borne, to secure the desirable end of a permanent bankrupt system. But, a two years' regulation of an abiding evil would only serve to confuse rather than regulate the relations of business. It would, to be sure, relieve many useful and deserving men from the bondage of their indebtedness, whose efforts are now paralyzed, and who are entitled to this relief. But the condition of the present class of insolvent debtors is not the only consideration which should govern in forming this bill. And whatever limitation gives rise to jealousy—that it is a mere temporary relief law—will render the law unpopular, and destroy all hope of any permanent system.

Mr. D's motion to strike out the limitation was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Dixon, Henderson, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Tallmadge, White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Walker, Wall, Webster, Williams, Wright, Young—32.

After a minor amendment, moved by Mr. CRITTENDEN—

Mr. WALL moved to insert a requisition that notice, personal or by letter, of any bankruptcy under this bill should be given, when practicable, to all the creditors.

This amendment, after a few remarks by Mr. W. for it, and by Mr. CRITTENDEN against it, was agreed to as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, William, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Henderson, Knight, Merrick, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, and White—19.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, and Wall—23.

The Senate, having held an Executive session, adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, June 24, 1840.

Mr. BOTTS observed that he understood that now, after the lapse of ten days, the record of the trial of Lieutenant Hooe before a court martial was returned from the Department, and was now on the SPEAKER's table; he called for its presentation to the House, that it might be read.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked if he was to understand the CHAIR as putting the question then.

Mr. BOTTS said, no; he himself raised the question, and he wished the documents to be presented to the House.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to any communication of the kind being taken up out of the regular order of business. He had not the slightest objection to the presentation of the documents in the regular order, when the SPEAKER should ask leave to present the documents on his table; but he did object to any particular document being called up from the rest, by any member.

Mr. BOTTS said he had been charged with sending poison through the country, and he now wished to embrace the first opportunity of furnishing the antidote; and if objection was made, he would move a suspension of the rules, in order that the communication might now be received by the House, and read.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said he had no objection, provided the SPEAKER presented the documents in regular order.

Mr. PETRIKIN said: I object during the morning hour. It would interfere with the reports of committees. After that, he would have no objection.

Mr. GRAVES and others demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. JONES of Virginia inquired whether Mr. BOTTS moved that the rules be suspended during the morning hour only, or generally.

Mr. BOTTS said he would modify his motion to the morning hour only.

The question being taken, the yeas and nays resulted as follows: Yeas 145, nays 25.

So the rules were suspended during the morning hour.

The CHAIR then laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, containing the proceedings of a court martial at Pensacola, summoned for the trial of Lieut. Hooe, together with the approval thereof by the Secretary of the Navy, Lieut. Hooe's protest and memorial to the President, and certain remarks of the Secretary in defence of his course in approving the sentence, together with a legal opinion of the United States District Attorney, Francis S. Key.

The reading having proceeded for some time—

Mr. BOTTS interrupted the reading, and (with much anxiety and surprise depicted in his countenance) said: Mr. Speaker, that is not the document expected, and which was called for under the resolution of the House. It was one which had never been shown to him. It seemed to be a defence of the Administration. Is that the document, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. I do not know.

[A considerable buzz now prevailed in the hall; and evident surprise and disappointment, if not mortification, were depicted in the countenances of those who instigated the call for the document. There was much undertone conversation, and a confounded thinking: some of the exclamations were sufficiently audible to enable the Reporter to catch them—such as, "It is a defence of the President and Secretary!" "It is not what was expected!" "The preamble and resolutions would have answered a much better purpose!" "The thing should not have been pressed after the motion to suspend the rules for the reception of the preamble and resolution." That was the point on which to rest it. Considerable confusion. Cries from the friends of the Administration, and accompanied by some laughter, at the apparent chagrin and astonishment expressed by those who introduced the preamble and resolution. "Read on! read on! that is the identical document! that is a part of the proceedings called for—it embraces ALL." Considerable conversation in the undercurrent, by the friends of the Administration, (who appeared to be much pleased,) of which the Reporter caught the words: "He is caught in his own trap! not so much political capital as was expected!" "No go!" "How impolitic to try to make capital out of every thing!" "The Lieutenant will not thank him." "It must be printed!" "It puts a new face on the circumstances!" Many other things were heard, which the Reporter will not give.]

The document was read through.

A number of gentlemen rose simultaneously.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, moved to refer this communication to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on that motion he demanded the previous question.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON called for the reading of the documents accompanying the communication.

They were read accordingly. The reading having proceeded some time—

Mr. RHETT moved to suspend the reading, but it was objected to, as against the rule; and Mr. R. did not press the motion.

The reading then proceeded.

Mr. BOTTS. That is not the record of the trial; that is a defence of the Administration.

The SPEAKER. The record is here, and will now be read.

The reading of the record of the trial was then commenced; but before it was concluded, the morning hour expired.

Mr. JONES moved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but temporarily withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. CRABB of Alabama, who moved a reconsideration of the decision of the House made yesterday to receive and place in the Library of Congress a copy of Raymond's Political Economy. Having examined that book, Mr. C. had discovered that it contained doctrine and language highly exceptionable to him as a Southern man, and which he believed came within the rule on the subject of Abolition; in case of reconsideration, he wished to move the reference of the book to the Committee on the Library, in order that it might be examined and reported on to save the time of the House.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was seconded, put, and carried; and the main question being on reconsidering—

Mr. JAMES demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS rose amidst cries of "order," and was going on to express his surprise at the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, and to give some account of the book, when he was arrested by the CHAIR.

Mr. A. remonstrated.

The CHAIR insisted that he could not proceed but by general consent.

Objections were loudly uttered.

Mr. LINCOLN said that unless his colleague should be permitted to proceed, and give the House some account of the book, Mr. L. should demand that the book itself be read.

Mr. TURNEY inquired if it was in order to ask for the reading of the book on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LINCOLN demanded that the book be read.

The CHAIR decided that as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LINCOLN] was called to vote respecting this book, he had a right, under the rules of the House, to have it read, if he so demanded.

Great confusion arose.

Mr. HABERSHAM, Mr. TURNEY, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. HOPKINS, and others, were on their feet, all simultaneously addressing the Chair.

Mr. HOPKINS called for the reading of the rule of the House, and also of Jefferson's Manual on the question of order.

Mr. ANDREWS inquired if it was not in order for the gentleman from Massachusetts to make an explanation.

The CHAIR said it was not, except by leave of the House.

Mr. LINCOLN wished to explain, but the Chair refused, the previous question having been ordered.

The CHAIR then stated his decision, and explained the grounds on which it rested.

Mr. HOPKINS took an appeal; but before any vote was taken on the appeal—

Mr. RAMSAY moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. CRAB wished to explain, but was arrested.

The question being stated from the Chair—

Mr. ADAMS addressed the House. [Loud cries of order.] The gentleman from Alaba——

The CHAIR called to order.

The gentleman from Alabama has undertaken [order, order] to be grand inquisitor for this House; to speak [order] its opinion on a certain book. [Here the cries of order were very loud, and the Chair ordered Mr. Adams to resume his seat.]

The question being again stated—

Mr. CRABB demanded the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them.

The vote being taken, the CHAIR declared it to be decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CRABB remonstrated, declaring that he had demanded a count.

Mr. NAYLOR inquired of the CHAIR whether, the whole subject was laid on the table, it would take the book out of the library, and place it on the table.

The CHAIR replied, no.

The question was again put, and the House dividing, the ayes were 123, the noes 30.

So the House determined that the whole subject should be laid on the table.

Mr. CRABB rose and stated to the CHAIR that he had, previously to the last vote, demanded that one chapter of the book of Mr. Raymond be read to the House.

The CHAIR replied that he had had heard no such demand.

Mr. CRABB now, under much excitement, demanded the reading of the chapter, that the base libel of this author on the South and its institutions—[Here the uproar became very great: Mr. CRABB continuing to speak with more and more animation: the CHAIR calling to order: shouts of order mixed with loud laughter resounding from all quarters of the hall.

Mr. C. however, amidst the confusion, said that the book was a base libel on Southern institutions; and was smuggled into the House.

Mr. ADAMS, at the top of his voice, cried good! good! [Much laughter.]

Order being at length with difficulty restored—

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the House went once more into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, [Mr. BANKS in the chair,] and resumed the consideration of the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. ALLEN of Ohio, who had the floor, resumed his speech in opposition to the bill, and continued to address the committee until one o'clock, showing the advantages of a Bank of the United States as an antagonist measure to the Independent Treasury.

Mr. SERGEANT next obtained the floor and spoke till the hour of half past two o'clock, in opposition to the bill, at which time the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SERGEANT resumed his remarks. He pointed out the demerits of the Independent Treasury system, and the advantages of a Bank of the United States. He had not concluded at half past six o'clock, p. m. at which hour he gave way to

Mr. GRAVES, who moved that the committee rise; which question was taken by tellers, and resulted—ayes 65, nays 57. So the committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WISE said he was about to make one of the shortest speeches that he had ever made. He expected to be absent for a few days. He gave notice to the House and to his constituents, that he would, if present when the question was taken on the Independent Treasury bill, vote against it. He therefore moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HAND demanded the yeas and nays on that motion, which having been ordered, were—yeas 76, nays 69.

The House accordingly adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, June 25, 1840.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented to the Senate the petition of Mr. Petromueski, a Polish exile, in relation to the distribution of the lands granted by the Government; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the request of the citizens of New York for the recall of Consul Trist from Havana, asked to be discharged from the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, who were investigating the charges against Mr. Trist; which was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported House bill for the relief of Hiram Lassell, with an amendment.

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Territory of Iowa, in relation to the extinction of an Indian title; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of J. F. Sarchet, asking that appeals in the collection of the revenue from District and Circuit Courts to the Supreme Court of the United States might be allowed.

The following bills were read a third time, and passed:

The bill further supplemental to an act entitled "an act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases," passed February 24, 1839.

The bill to enable the United States to discharge liens and encumbrances upon any real estate which now is, or hereafter may become, the property of the United States.

The bill for the relief of Augustus Davezac, William D. Jones, and Nathaniel Niles.

The bill for the relief of the administrator of William Hogan, was taken up as in committee of the whole, and

Mr. HUBBARD opposed the bill at much length, reviewing the various items in detail, and demonstrating that the claim was not only unfounded, but that there actually was a charge of some thousands of dollars against the claimant on the books of the Treasury at this day.

Mr. STRANGE rose to reply, but gave way to the suggestion that the time for taking up the special order had arrived.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which, by unanimous consent, was considered and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to the Senate the amount of all the moneys appropriated to be expended in the District of Columbia by acts of Congress since the location of the seat of Government within the District. Also, the amount appropriated in lots, lands, or other public property, exclusively of the ordinary expenditures of the Government; and that he separate such appropriations in tabular form, as follows: giving the appropriations of each year in the order of time, the amount of each appropriation, and the particular object to which each appropriation was made, whether made to the District, to either of the cities, or to any corporation or individual within the District.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States having been read a third time and several amendments, suggested by Mr. WALL, not interfering with the general principles of the bill, having been adopted,

Mr. TAPPAN briefly submitted his reasons for having opposed the bill, and why he should record his vote against its passage. He entertained no doubt that the Constitution gave to Congress full power over the whole subject, but he thought the exercise of that power at this time, of extremely doubtful expediency. The bill now before the Senate, though general in its character, will not be uniform in its operation; that is, its operation will not be the same on the merchant of New York as on the farmer of Ohio. He thought that the sentiments of the great mass of the community were in opposition to such a law, and instanced the fact that the former enactment of Congress on this subject was permitted to remain but two years on our statute book. He concluded by expressing his opinion, that though the Constitution conferred the power of making laws on the subject of bankruptcy to the General Government, it was one of those matters which sound policy dictated should be left to the legislation of the respective States.

Mr. LUMPKIN said the time had now passed for a detailed investigation of the merits of this important measure; he rose for no such purpose; his object was to submit a few general and brief remarks in justification of the vote which he intended to give.

Mr. L. said he had been true to the pledge which he had given to the Senate, at an earlier stage of the discussion on this subject. He had not suffered himself to make up a definitive opinion, until full time and opportunity had been afforded the leading friends of this measure to amend, modify and mould its provisions, to suit their views of the interest of those intended to be benefited, including both debtor and creditor. But, sir, the time has now arrived when the final action of the Senate is called for upon the final passage of the bill; and, for one, I am ready for that decision. After the most patient investigation and mature consideration of the whole subject, aided as I have been in the formation of my conclusions, by the ability and intelligence of this enlightened Senate, I no longer hesitate. I am ready to give my vote against the passage of the bill. This, sir, is a measure of importance, on account of the principles involved, as well as the great individual interests now at issue on the question. It is a measure upon which Congress should not legislate, so long as a strong doubt of the propriety of the legislation proposed rests on the mind of the legislator. That pure and sensible statesman, Nathaniel Macon, advised me twenty-five years ago never to vote for an important measure, so long as I entertained doubts of the expediency, and especially of the constitutionality of the measure proposed. The advice was good, sir, and deserves the consideration of every statesman. We all admit the constitutional authority of Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. But, sir, I doubt the constitutionality of this law. To my mind its operation will not be uniform. It will be partial and unjust in many respects to both debtor and creditor. Should this bill become the law of the land, I now venture the opinion that it will become an odious and offensive law to the larger portion of the people of this country. Its injustice and partial effects will be more fully developed by its operation than can be done by any argument on the floor of the Senate at this time. Equal laws, and equal political rights, are the letter and spirit of our institutions. I dislike all legislation designed for the enclusive benefit of the few. Moreover, sir, this bill, to my mind, interferes too much with individual contracts and obligations. I can find no power in the Constitution which authorizes Congress to impair the obligation of individual contracts. A proper sense of moral duty compels every man to consider his vows and obligations sacred. An honest debtor, if legally absolved from the embarrassment of all his debts, would nevertheless feel himself bound, if the smiles of fortune should afterwards enable him to do so, to hunt up and discharge all his old contracts.

Mr. President, I protest, sir, against being numbered amongst those who have no sympathy for honest debtors, for suffering humanity, wherever it may exist. I am not only in favor of abolition from imprisonment, and all other shackles for debt, but my feelings incline me to admire the policy of ancient times, when at regular periods the whole people could look forward to the coming year of jubilee, when there would be a full, free, and entire release from all indebtedness and harassing obligations and demands.

But, sir, when debts are contracted with a view to existing laws and regulations in society, the case is altered. The indebtedness of the people of this country has been incurred under a Government which holds out no hope of a year of general release. Hence the great delicacy of the subject, when we attempt by legislation to interfere with debtor and creditor. It is not only a delicate subject in itself; but under our system the division of power between the States and Federal Government, in relation to the proper legislations which in necessary to guard the interest of both debtor and creditor, is such as to require from legislators great circumspection and care.

Sir, the more I have reflected on this subject, in connection with my attention to the able and extended discussion in this chamber, the more I incline to the opinion, that the States are best qualified to provide for the evils which this bill is intended to remedy. The States unquestionably, by their insolvent laws, and other appropriate legislation, have the power to guard the honest but unfortunate debtor, from the unfeeling tyranny and oppression of the assuming creditor; and in most of the States it has already been done.

This bill, if it becomes the law of the land, will doubtless afford great relief to a comparatively very few individuals. But I do verily believe the great majority of both debtors and creditors will be injured by the passage of this bill.

I believe the great majority of both debtors and creditors, under the existing laws of the several States, are in a much better condition than they will be if you pass this bill. The benefits of this measure will extend to but few. A few unfortunate and imprudent merchants, speculators, and traders, will derive benefits from this measure, especially such as do business on a large scale. But, sir, a large majority of the poor suffering debtors of our land will never think of relief from your bankrupt law; and if they do, it will only aggravate their suffering, for they will never derive any benefit from its provisions. Sir, I consider this a measure better calculated to benefit lawyers, than either debtors or creditors. Yes, sir, this bill will push many a rich fee into the pockets of legal gentlemen. Sir, there is scarcely any one out of the seventeen sections of the bill, that will not require a lawyer to explain its provisions. Indeed, sir, scarcely any two jurists in this Senate have been able to agree upon the construction of any section of the bill. The discussion here has awakened me to the endless litigation this measure will create. The estate of every rich bankrupt throughout the land will afford a feast of fat things to the lawyers. To that class of the community this measure holds out the prospect of a rich harvest.

Mr. President, the system and subject of credit has of late become an enteresting theme with politicians. I have often, sir, heard the present Administration of the Federal Government denounced for destroying the credit system. To me, sir, this is all idle, perfectly fallacious. My views of a sound and salutary credit lead me to fear nothing, ask for nothing, from the Government, in the way of credit. What has this Government to do with the credit of individuals? The only true basis of credit is industry, economy, punctuality, and honesty.

The man who earns and receives more than he spends—who contracts no unreasonable debts—who manages all his affairs with discretion and prudence—is but rarely the subject of Providential suffering and distress—and when such cases do occur, the moral sense of the community will protect such a one from the avaricious oppression of an unfeeling creditor. Sir, I have always had more credit than money. I have never had one moment's distress for fear my credit would fail. The credit of individuals and Governments can only be sustained by the true dignity of living within the means at command. It is not in the power of individuals, or Government, to sustain credit by laws of bankruptcy, or by substituting any kind of fiction for reality. Honesty, sir, is not only the best policy, but it is a moral duty. We should advise the people to work more and spend less; to pay their old debts, and be cautious how they contract new ones. The course suggested will banish distress, and bring prosperity to our beloved country, without the aid of bankrupt laws.

Mr. ANDERSON addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: The bill upon your table is now on its final passage; and I rise, sir, with very great reluctance, to ask the indulgent attention of the Senate, while I state, in the briefest possible manner, the reasons which will induce me to record my vote against it. There are occasions, sir, when a man may not be excused for his silence; and so I think my duty, under the present circumstances, to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, demands of me that I should bear, thus publicly, my testimony against this dangerous and searching measure.

My distinguished colleague, before the recommitment of the former bill, took the occasion, then, to express his entire disapprobation of the adoption of any general bankrupt law at this time, whatever might be its provisions, and adverted to the fact that he had no reason to suppose that Tennessee wished a system of this kind. I concurred most fully in the views which he entertained, and have now to state, that I have not myself, up to this time, received any evidence that the opinions of the people of Tennessee are in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law. It may well be supposed, therefore, that at the moment when such a mighty power is about to be brought into existence, in a crisis of such peculiar character as that which now pervades this country, I should feel the deepest anxiety for the result, which may, perhaps, fall most unwelcomely, and unexpectedly, upon my constituents.

This bill provides that all persons may become bankrupts at their election, upon petition, verified by oath, and stating their inability to pay their debts; and that a certain other class, including the merchants, shall be liable to be made bankrupts, under particular and specified circumstances. It has been partially modified with a view to protect the interests of the creditor, by amendments offered by my distinguished friend [Mr. WRIGHT] from New York. Several propositions which he made, intended to effect this object to a greater extent, I regret to say, it was the pleasure of the Senate, by very small majorities, to reject. I voted for most of them, in order to make this bill less exceptionable than I believed it to be, as originally reported by the select committee. Still, sir, I look upon it as a measure teeming with mischiefs of no ordinary character, to the highest welfare of the Republic.

I shall not now advert to the constitutional questions which this bill involves. They have already been fully and ably discussed by others, and I shall, therefore, call the attention of the Senate to the expediency and probable results of this measure. I confess, sir, I cannot contemplate its passage, without the deepest solicitude for the interests and character of our common country. Without, as it seems to me, sufficient evidence of public opinion, we are pushing it forward with an ardor, and a haste, for which we can offer no adequate justification. We have before us the progress of more than fifty years of fruitful experience, and it is now nearly forty since we dismissed from our statute book, with disgust and indignation, the trial of this system, which was made in eighteen hundred. We had then a population of not much more than four millions of people, and the difference between that number and sixteen millions—between thirteen independent sovereignties and twenty-six of greater magnitude—with our agriculture, commerce, and manufactures multiplied in a far higher proportion—with the pursuits of men not only augmented, but in the general progression of every thing immensely diversified beyond any former example, has added much to the increased importance of the question under consideration, and, as I think, to the doubtful character of its policy. Sir, in such circumstances, what are we about to do? We seem upon the very verge of exercising a power which is destined to search this vast and extended population—to try its most vital interests—to take absolute and summary possession of the great relations of creditor and debtor—to supersede, at a single step, long established opinions—to overlay the varied customs and legislation of twenty-six States, differing widely in their interests. All this is to be done by one great, paramount, inflexible, and uniform law—a law which tramples beneath its foot the private rights of individuals, and the judicial power of the States, which interposes for relief, or remedy, between the creditor and the debtor—a law which carries with it into twenty-six distinct and independent jurisdictions more than the power of the writ of summons, and more than the power of the writ of possession. Release is founded upon the oath, and fraud legally presumed at the will of the applicant. The house and the lands of the citizen are to be taken without notice or preparation. The whole system of things is to be changed by the single move of the creditor or debtor. In a contradictory spirit of concession, you give to the most wicked of either class the right to destroy others, and compel, by your policy, the more virtuous to enter into the competition. Accidents and oaths, under this law, may accomplish either end, and it offers the singular spectacle of granting the immunities of voluntary bankruptcy to all, upon the condition that the creditors may make a particular class of debtors liable to their compulsory process. Thus the catastrophe of bankruptcy is to be completed, where undisturbed industry, prudence, integrity, and talent, might relieve the incumbent, without the odium of the injury forever clinging to his name, and rankling in his heart.

If the proposition were now made for the first time, to grant this power, I have no doubt it would be refused by a large majority of the American people. It has an extent, as it stands in the Constitution, far beyond what could originally have been designed, and which partly arises from the more fully developed, and better understood nature and construction of our peculiar Government.

Hitherto the danger has been that of obtaining power by construction, but this is so broad and so comprehensive, in its literal sense, that we find ourselves resorting to the expedient of reducing it by appealing to the standard of English authority. And, sir, there is no country in the world where its practical influence would be so peculiarly felt as in ours, both by the people and the Government. It would turn the fears and the hopes of the one to an entire concentration upon the other, and bring that other into the possession of a strength which would give it a consolidated mastery, ultimately, over all things, over men, and over States. In this may be found, in part, connected with other intrinsic objections, the explanation why the exercise of the power was so long postponed, though pressed from seventeen hundred and ninety, annually, until eighteen hundred; and why it was afterwards so early discontinued, and has been since so steadily resisted, until at length, yielding under a succession of panics and disasters, the natural product of the vast bank power of the land, we seem about to re-enact this great statute sponge, to be applied, retroactively, upon all the pecuniary responsibilities in the country. Sir, this long postponement, the early repeal of the law, the resistance against its introduction since, present to us, the instructive portion of the history of this subject, and we ought to regard it, until we shall be otherwise informed, as expressive of the deep sense of the American people in favor of the policy of leaving the power entirely dormant in the General Government, and to be supplied by the legislation of the States.

The first blow which will be struck, I fear, will fall heavily upon the moral feeling of society. It will superinduce on the one side temptations to seek immediate relief by a single act of surrender, where perseverance and skill would, in the course of a few years, recover the unfortunate debtor from his embarrassments. It is certainly true, that the very offer of legal relief, in the first moment of a public panic, is an invitation to cease to make efforts, and will practically be an extinguishment of all debts, without a struggle to pay. On the other hand, it bestows a power upon the creditor which it is illusory to suppose will not be often abused, and as often productive of the most mischievous results. The whole basis of the measure invites fraud on the one side, and suspicion on the other. You bring into active application two utterly antagonistical principles—the newly awakened hope of the debtor to escape from responsibility, and the vigilance of the creditor to overtake the debtor for a delinquency, which he may not disregard, for fear of leaving to him the ultimate advantage of the law upon his own terms. The main pillar of credit, that confidence which is mutually inspired by integrity and by justice, will be struck down at a single blow. You destroy, at once, all mutuality of feeling, of forbearance, and of interest. No compositions will ever be proposed, and which might be effected at less expense and less risk between the parties. It will be a race of escape and pursuit, and in the present condition of the country, we will confound the honest and persevering debtor, who would finally pay, with the man of desperate fortunes. We will make an indiscriminate sweep of the unfortunate who yet bear themselves against the tide, with the bold and reckless speculators, who are already ruined; and with this solitary act we will render memorable, in all time to come, the present epoch of our calamity, by a great legal catastrophe, fashioned with singular zeal, anxiety, and labor, from our own hands. If it were possible to limit the effect of the bill before us, I am not prepared to say that it would be without a useful and happy influence upon the condition of society. But, sir, one of the very features which recommend it most strongly to the support of its warmest advocates, is, that it goes to the extent of every interest, and every class in the community, not by merely discharging the contracts of those who are hopeless and remediless, but that the offer of emancipation from debt is universal. The practical effect of this, we know, will spread itself through all the relations of life, but the final end no man can tell. When you shall have broken up the moral bond of union which strengthens and protects the transactions of men, as much as law itself legalizes them, it is impossible to estimate the consequences. I speak not of solitary exceptions—the plundered, willing or unwilling, must struggle with the plunderers—the virtuous with the vicious—and the blow which fells to the earth your next neighbor, will carry with it another, and another, without being able to say who shall escape, and who shall be counted last.

This measure, let it be remembered, has been urged by an eloquent appeal to our sympathies; that he, whose head was bowed down, should be lifted up; that the tears of his wife, and his innocent children, would be dried; that the wretched and forlorn should again take their place in society. Sir, no man, I trust, feels more deeply for his fellow man than I do, or would go farther to relieve him under the pressure of distress. But, sir, does justice, does humanity require that we should save some by destroying others? That to dry tears, which already flow, we should strike new fountains from which they would be shed more abundantly? That we should multiply the unfortunate in order to relieve them? That we should disregard the claims, the interests, and condition of the largest business class of men in the nation; and that, of all others, they should be made to feel that we legislate not for them, but for those who are already desperate? Is this fair? Is it just? Is it wise? Is it humane? Will you lay your hand most heavily upon the commercial community, under a mere suspicion that they may deal harshly with others, while your generosity is poured redundantly upon the head of the speculator? Is this, sir, the boasted love of that great interest? Is this the tender mercy which the mercantile class is to receive at the hands of their peculiar friends? Sir, it is the embrace of death—death to credit—death to confidence; that confidence which procures rank and station to the trader; which sustains him in many a sore and trying struggle; that confidence which, when every honest effort is expended, would, upon a surrender of his effects, discharge him from his liabilities; that confidence, above all, which reposes upon our justice and our wisdom!

Mr. President, this measure has, to my mind, the most peculiar aspect. It comes before us under the potent auspices of the most singular compromise ever presented in legislative history. I repeat, it is no more or less than that the voluntary bankrupt is to be allowed to escape from his creditor, upon condition that creditors may be allowed to oppress a particular class of debtors. The first would not be permitted, but it is the condition of power to the latter; and, on the other hand, the latter is to be conceded on the condition of that special benefit to the former. It seems to me, sir, that if either would be wrong, and publicly mischievous singly, because of the peculiar state of the country, that the two united will certainly augment the measure of injury. I am unable to understand the philosophy of this subject in any other way. It has been contended that neither, alone, ought to be adopted; if so, a compromise, by which both may be efficient, must therefore, I think, add a double force to the objection that lies against this great experiment.

Sir, I would address Senators, in the language of Mr. Burke, when he wrote to his constituents, with whom he had differed: "I would appeal from the opinions which you now have, to the opinions which you will have five years hence." From the present excitement, to the practical results which we are now preparing, and when every other influence will have passed away, except that experience which will then come home to the feeling and observation of all men!

The policy of this measure may be partly estimated by the amount of debt which exists in the country, and upon a large portion of which it will be immediately directed. It is probably a fair calculation, that the mercantile debt owed by that portion of the country which is now within the range of the suspended banks, is equal to one hundred millions of dollars. Of this, I understand the computation for the city of New York alone to be upwards of sixty millions. The remainder may be divided between Philadelphia and Baltimore. This debt is to be extinguished in two methods; by the voluntary act of the bankrupt, and by the compulsory process which you give to the hand of the creditor. The contracts were made in a period of the highest prices and a swollen currency. That currency has been reduced by the curtailment of the banks, and with their action has fallen the price of wages and of property. They were the primary causes of the first, as they have been of the last; and although over one-half of the nation they are now suspended, and refusing to pay their own notes in specie, the utmost extent of their paper currency is not more than one hundred millions of dollars—not equal to the precious metals which they have driven into retreat. It is in this state of things that you propose this measure of voluntary and compulsory bankruptcy. And, sir, to whom have you given that power of coercion, upon mere petition, without being verified upon oath? without even the right of traversing the question of fraud by a trial by jury, until after the decree is entered up—until after the blow is struck? We most graciously propose to bestow it upon those very banks, as well as upon individuals—the banks, to whom we have been told, in this debate, that there is a sum of four hundred and sixty millions of dollars owed by the citizens of the United States. They are to be brought into the great field of action, and to become the potent competitors in the general work of ruin and distress. Are we prepared for a scene like this? One vast scene of disaster, of which no man can tell the end? One wide, deep, and lasting excitement. Sir, the country will stand aghast at the practical march of this measure, with its train of clients, of debts, of agents, of assignees, of lawyers, of courts of power, and of patronage! And who will reap the harvest? Most surely, not the creditors! What is the experience of those who bore a part in the administration of the bankrupt act of eighteen hundred? I have before me the testimony of one whose talents and character entitle his opinions to the highest respect. I am not disposed to surrender a question of this magnitude to the mere authority of names; but Mr. Tazewell of Virginia delivered this testimony in the Senate, upon the debate on the bankrupt bill in eighteen hundred and twenty-seven, and spoke of that which he personally knew, and which no man will venture to controvert, and which I have no doubt, upon examination, will be found to be sustained by the facts that transpired in almost every State of the Union. I beg leave, sir, to read his statement. He says: "When the former bankrupt law was in existence, he resided in a seaport town, and was engaged in almost every case of bankruptcy that occurred during its operation; and he could assure the Senate that he never knew a solitary case, in which the creditor obtained one cent. The debtors had often large estates—there was a large amount of property somewhere; but by the time it had been filtered through the hands of the assignees, of the commissioners, and their deputies, and agents, and this, and that, and the other officer, appointed to act upon it, not a fraction was left for the creditor. The whole had been absorbed in its progress." And such, sir, I have no doubt, will be the progress of this measure, in the contact and process of agents and of courts.

There is another consideration connected with this subject, which, I think, is entitled to some weight, and ought to be felt, at least by those who complain of the expenditures of this Government. The total sum which will, in all probability, be extinguished, either by payment or discharge, cannot fall much short of two hundred millions of dollars. The number of bankrupts will be, perhaps, not less than two hundred thousand. I have heard it estimated to be much greater. Be this as it may, it is very certain that your courts, as at present constituted, cannot possibly execute the immense mass of business—the almost endless suits, in addition to the separate cases of bankruptcy, which will be cast upon them. It is true that this bill provides that they shall be considered as always open to applications under the act, but their number is too few to enable them to go through but a small portion of the causes. You will be compelled to increase the number of your judges, and subdivide your present districts, or to create a special set of commissioners, for the sole purpose of executing this law. Let those who are the special friends of this measure, be prepared to take also this responsibility. It will be found to be one of no inconsiderable magnitude.

The period now fixed, at which it is to take effect, is the first of February next. Why not then postpone any legislation until the next session of Congress, as we shall have, in the interval, the opportunity of returning to our constituents, and consulting them upon a subject scarcely inferior in importance to any which may require their consideration? Or is it possible that the anxiety to pass this bill will not brook delay? Sir, that delay would bring back upon us the judgment which may reverse the decision which we are probably this day to make.

Mr. President, I fear it is in vain to hope for the defeat of this measure. But, sir, I think it would have been prudent, in the midst of the present excitement and pressure, to have trusted a little longer to the forbearance and magnanimity of the creditor, to the honesty, the industry, and the perseverance of the debtor. In Tennessee, sir, like every other portion of this Union, we are considerably in debt; and although we cannot pay to-day, or to-morrow, or next day, we are essentially a solvent and a paying people. We want no sponging retroaction—but will, in the end, with few exceptions, pay the last cent for which we are liable. But establish this law, and though it may cast the sunshine of hope upon the path of many a worthy and unfortunate man, who is bent beneath the burden of his disasters, it will just as surely overshadow with misfortune others of equal merit, who would, if undisturbed, pass triumphantly through the impending calamities. For every bankrupt it may relieve, the very moral, as well as compulsory power of its provisions will follow, pari passu, to add its victim to that object of your mercy. The very mercy of this twofold system will stimulate the fears of the creditor, who will most naturally avail himself of every advantage against the debtor, whom the law has armed with the choice of his own fortunes, and we shall exhibit the great national spectacle of fierce passions and private plunder, overruling the mastery of every nobler feeling, under the influence of such temptations as few can resist, and the impulse of such a revolution as none can stay. Instead of being a measure to cure the evils under which we are suffering, it will propagate bankruptcies with a prolific hand. Whatever may be the theory of gentlemen upon this subject, however they may expect to bring peace, hope, and joy to the bosom of the ruined, there is another side of this picture, upon which the statesman cannot look without apprehension and doubt; it is where those are to be seen on whom ruin will be brought. The law will take its course. The fears and cupidity of men will sweep over the land in one deep and rapid stream! No industry, no integrity, no perseverance, no probable prospect of success can arrest it. I would that we could pause before we adopt this terrible and delusive measure. There is nothing in the history of the past to assure us of the wisdom of the step we are about to take.

If the Constitution contemplates such a measure as this for the protection of commerce, our prosperity, for nearly forty years, is proof that it is not demanded. It is said to have this basis for its policy in England, but with all her advantages, and the aid of its protection and encouragement, we have advanced many per cent. in the proportion of the whole, beyond her commercial and navigating interests. As a permanent measure, it would be found, as I think, to have no such influence. Even as a temporary remedy, the power is too dangerous, and the consequences are too alarming.

Let us pause before we pass this bill. It will array the North against the South. It will engender a suspicion, a distrust, a deep rooted prejudice, which can scarcely be obliterated during the quarter of a century. It will be a standard subject of reference for the guidance and action of the next generation, and instead of promoting the prosperity of commerce, I fear it will materially affect its best interests, particularly by its premature adoption.

Besides all this, the country has not had half time to right itself—to recover from the stupor of its extravagance—to return to habits of economy—to make a steady, united, and persevering effort to pay its debts. Let us, therefore, look not so much to fear as to hope—to despair as to a firm resolve to pay—to the forbearance of creditors—to the justice and industry of debtors. Our countrymen are full of a noble love, and a noble confidence towards each other; and it becomes us, as the grave advisers and lawgivers of the land, not to weaken, discourage, or destroy these sacred relations. We may rely upon it, sir, public opinion is not fully ripe for this measure. The time may come when it may demand some system of this kind, for relief and for remedy; but let us not hastily and prematurely, at the first alarm, produce a revolution in our laws, and the laws of twenty-six States, which, when put into motion, cannot be arrested by a hand less powerful than our own. Let us not be borne down by the mental pressure of the moment, but standing erect, with a wise forecast, ask ourselves the question, how this will be, after the experiment has been passed, and the experience of years has sealed its character?

Mr. WALL stated that he had, from the commencement of the debate on this question, had the strongest desire that the bill should assume such a shape as would enable him to give it his support, but in this he had been thwarted; and though no one could feel more the necessity of passing some measure for the relief of a large portion of the community, he could not vote for the bill in its present shape. Mr. W. then referred to various misrepresentations which had been made as to his course on this bill, and referred particularly to the printed speech of Mr. WEBSTER, in which his arguments were misstated and misrepresented. Mr. WEBSTER explained, and disavowed any intention to misrepresent the Senator.]

Mr. W. then proceeded at considerable length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON said this bill was not such, of all others, as most challenged his approbation. Against its compulsory process he could not too earnestly protest. He disapproved of that feature in toto, and did not believe it could ever operate for good. The power of the States, in respect to the redress of the creditor against his debtor, was already ample, and in his opinion demanded no aid from Congress. But, in this opinion, he had been overruled by a majority of the Senate. He submitted to that decision from necessity. But this bill contained the essential and salutary power, the redeeming power, of breaking the prisoner's chains and setting the captive free—a power which no State could assert, and this Government alone could exercise. This consideration alone reconciled him to the measure: and, in his judgment, overbalanced the objectionable principles it adopted and furnished a preponderating apology for the Federal machinery it necessairily put in operation. He should, therefore, vote for the bill.

Mr. YOUNG said he had examined with great care the records of the Supreme Court on this subject, and he had found that, unless Congress should interfere, a large portion of debtors would be wholly without remedy. Mr. Y. read some extracts, which went to show that, by the exertion of the whole power of the States, there could be no discharge of the bankrupt debtor, except in cases between citizens of the same State.

The bill was now passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, and Wall—19.

On motion by Mr. HENDERSON, the Senate took up the bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to extend further indulgence to the late deposite banks at Natchez.

Mr. H. moved so to amend the bill as to extend the time, without interest, provided there should be like abatement of interest in ratable proportion among the sufferers by the late tornado, debtors to said banks.

This amendment was sustained by Messrs. HENDERSON and WALKER; but, before any definite question was taken, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, June 25, 1840.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland asked the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw the motion, to enable him to make a motion to take up the bill for rechartering the banks in the District of Columbia. Their charters expire on the 4th of July, and it was important that the bill should be acted on immediately. If the House would agree to take up the bill, he would be willing that a silent vote should be taken on its passage. He would refrain from making a speech himself, and move the previous question on its passage.

Cries of no! no! I object!

Mr. JOHNSON moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of considering the bill.

The SPEAKER said that there was one motion to suspend the rules for another purpose pending, which must have precedence.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said that when the morning hour expired on yesterday, the House was in the midst of the reading of the documents and proceedings in relation to the trial of Lieutenant Hooe; he hoped that the rules would not be suspended till that subject was disposed of.

Mr. BRIGGS said it would take two hours to read the proceedings of that court martial through, and could not yield his motion.

Mr. CUSHING demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules, which having been ordered, were—yeas 82, nays 50.

Mr. McKAY hoped the House would by general consent agree to suspend the reading of the document containing the proceedings of the court martial in the case of Lieutenant Hooe, and have the same printed.

Mr. CUSHING objected.

Mr. McKAY gave notice that he intended to move a resolution for the printing of that document on to-morrow.

THE INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. Banks in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. SERGEANT being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks from last evening in opposition to the bill, and in favor of a National Bank. He concluded at half past one, p. m.

Mr. HASTINGS of Ohio then took the floor, and spoke until the recess in favor of the bill, and in an able refutation of the arguments which had been urged against it. His remarks will appear in full hereafter.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

Mr. HASTINGS of Ohio resumed, and concluded his remarks in support of the bill.

Mr. COST JOHNSON then took the floor, and spoke until a quarter past eight in opposition to the bill, and in support of a substitute he intended to offer.

Mr. McCARTY followed, but immediately gave way to

Mr. MONROE, who moved that the committee rise.

On that motion tellers were ordered, and the vote was—ayes 39, noes 67; no quorum.

The committee then rose, and the CHAIR reported that fact to the House, whereupon,

Mr. HOFFMAN moved to adjourn, on which motion the yeas and nays being ordered, were—yeas 41, nays 65.

So the House refused to adjourn.

After an ineffectual motion for a call of the House,

Mr. TILLINGHAST said, as the House refused to order the call, he would renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DUNCAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 47, nays 62.

So the motion was negatived.

Mr. McCARTY, wishing to defer his remarks until morning, having yielded the floor to Mr. Andrews,

Mr. RHETT hoped that, by general consent, the House would go again into committee, as he understood the gentleman from Kentucky was willing to go on and conclude his speech that evening.

Several gentlemen objected to going into committee without a quorum.

After some debate of a conversational character, a call of the House was again demanded and ordered.

Mr. CURTIS moved to adjourn, on which motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 37, nays 74.

So the House refused to adjourn.

A call of the House having been previously ordered, the roll was called, when 111 members answered to their names.

The names of the absentees were then called, after which 126 members appeared within the bar.

A quorum now appearing,

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANDREWS then took the floor, and proceeded to say that he was elected a whole figure tariff man, an advocate of a National Bank, and a distributor of the surplus revenue arising from the sales of the public lands. After telling the committee how the old United States Bank was "murdered," he went on to show why he preferred a similar institution to the present bill.

He concluded at a quarter past ten o'clock.

The committee then rose, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, June 26, 1840.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing the annual statement of the commerce and navigation of the United States for the year ending September 30, 1839; which was laid on the table, and the usual number of extra copies ordered to be printed.

We copy the following abstract of the contents of this document, from the letter of the Register to the Secretary of the Treasury:

The imports during the year have amounted to $162,092,132, of which there was imported in American vessels $143,874,252, and in foreign vessels $18,217,880. The exports during the year have amounted to $121,028,416, of which $103,533,891 were of domestic, and $17,494,525 of foreign articles. Of the domestic articles, $82,127,514 were exported in American vessels, and $21,406,377 in foreign vessels. Of the foreign articles, $12,660,434 were exported in American vessels, and $4,834,091 in foreign vessels. 1,491,279 tons of American shipping entered, and 1,477,928 tons cleared from the ports of the United States. 624,814 tons of foreign shipping entered, and 611,839 tons cleared during the same period.

The registered tonnage, as corrected at this office, is stated at - - -	834,244	54.95
The enrolled and licensed tonnage at - - - -	1,153,551	85.95
And fishing vessels at - -	108,682	34.95
Tons -	2,096,478	81.95
Of the registered and enrolled tonnage, amounting, as before stated, to - - - -	1,987,796	47.95
There were employed in the whale fishery - - -	131,845	25.95

The total tonnage of shipping built in the United States during the year ending the 30th of September, 1839:

Enrolled - - -	65,922	82.95
Tons - -	120,988	34.95

Mr. BENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which had been referred the bill for the relief of J. W. Beeson and others, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. BENTON, from the same committee, reported back the papers in relation to the claim of Wallace and Arthur; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which had been referred the claim of J. Mitchell and J. P. Fox, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorials of the heirs of Eleazer W. Ripley, and Mathew J. Ketch.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the various memorials which had been referred to said committee in relation to the employment of blood hounds in Florida, and moved that said committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, the same committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislature of Connecticut on the subject of a national foundry.

Mr. ROBINSON, on leave, introduced a bill amendatory of the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department; which was twice read, and referred.

The Senate took up, in committee of the whole, the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the bill for the relief of the administrator of Michael Hogan, deceased, and after an animated debate, in which it was zealously supported by Mr. STRANGE, and as warmly opposed by Mr. HUBBBARD, the question on engrossment was taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 28.

Mr. HUBBARD said that, in the early part of the sitting, the CHAIR had submitted the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the commerce and navigation of the United States. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, he had moved that the usual number of extra copies should be printed for the use of the Senate. He had since been informed that the number had varied for the last three or four years, and that five thousand was the number ordered at the last session. It would therefore be proper for the Senate to express their opinion as to what number they would wish to have printed on the present occasion.

Mr. KING thought that three thousand extra copies would be sufficient, and, unless the general sense of the Senate preferred a larger number, he would move for the printing of that number. Last year, he said, five thousand extra copies of this document were printed; the year before, three thousand; and the two years preceding that, two thousand.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped the largest number of copies, five thousand, would be printed. This was one of the most important of the documents transmitted to Congress, and he found that it was more called for than any other. His supply had not been sufficient to meet the demand made on him for it. It was important, too, that the country should be furnished with the valuable information contained in this document at this time; for, next year, Congress would be called on to adjust the tariff, and their constituents should be able to understand more fully the important questions that would come before them.

Mr. DAVIS could see no propriety in printing a large number of this document. The extra number usually printed had been fifteen hundred. Two or three years ago, it had been increased to two two thousand; and last year, by some means or other, he could not tell how, five thousand had been ordered. He thought two thousand copies were amply sufficient, and any amount over that number would be superfluous, and of little service to any body.

Mr. BUCHANAN would just observe, that in the State of Pennsylvania there were sixty counties, and he thought that at least one copy should go to each county in all the States. Besides, there was not a leading merchant in Philadelphia not anxious to get a copy, and the same might be said in relation to the manufacturers of Pittsburg. He was generally averse to printing a large number of extra copies of the documents laid before them, but this document was an exception. They had heretofore printed extra numbers of documents which were comparatively unimportant. This document, as he said before, contained more valuable commercial and manufacturing information than any other, and yet they were to be restricted to 2,000 copies.

Mr. WALKER expressed the hope that 5,000 copies would be printed. It was an exceedingly important document, and ought to be disseminated. He wished to send one copy to each editor in his State.

The question was then taken on printing 5,000 copies, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, the joint resolution for the relief of the sufferers by the late tornado at Natchez was again taken into consideration, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. H. to remit the interest on the public money to be entrusted for three years longer with the two banks at Natchez.

After a few remarks by Mr. WILLIAMS, not distinctly heard by the Reporter,

Mr. WRIGHT objected to the amendment, that, in carrying it into effect, the banks might aid some of the sufferers, and not others, so as to occasion inequality and discontent. He stated that, in the case of the New York fire, which was analogous to this, the duties were remitted in cases where the goods were totally lost. But in cases of a mere extension of the time for the payment of duty bonds, with a view to relief, be found that six per cent. interest was required on the bonds; and he argued that to remit the interest in this Natchez case would be nothing short of a direct donation.

Mr. HENDERSON replied that the resolution itself provided for a pro rata relief to the sufferers. Mr. H. also argued that this case ought to be compared to the former branch of Mr. WRIGHT's parallel, that is, the remission of duties, rather than to the latter branch, that is, the extension of duty bonds, to which Mr. WRIGHT had confined it. And if the remission of interest would in this case be a donation, the remission of duties in the New York case could be no less a donation.

After some remarks by Mr. WALKER, in which he advocated the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. CALHOUN concurred entirely in the views of the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT.] The remission of interest would be in fact a gratuity of the amount through the agency of the banks and not direct from the Government, which would be more gracious. He thought the extension of time to the banks was going as far as they had any power to go, and he was not willing to go any farther.

Mr. WRIGHT said he did not know on what ground Congress had acted in remitting the duties to the New York sufferers; but he presumed it to be this. It was true that bonds had been given, and in form the money was due to the Treasury. But still, if those goods had been re-exported, as they might have been, the drawback upon them would have prevented any thing from going into the Treasury. And on what ground was the drawback allowed? It was, that other goods would come in to supply their place, so that nothing would be really lost to the Treasury. So, in the case of the loss by fire, it made from for other goods to come in, so that the Treasury would be made good.

The amendment of Mr. HENDERSON was loss and the resolution, giving an extension of the time of payment for three years to the banks, was ordered to be engrossed.

After the consideration of Executive business,

The Senate adjourned until Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, June 26, 1840.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the following resolution, viz:

Whereas Senate bill 127, entitled an act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, was taken up in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the 20th of May last, and has been under discussion to this time; and whereas the period has arrived when it is proper to close the present session of Congress with as little delay as possible; and whereas much of the indispensable public business is yet to be acted on; therefore

Resolved, That the said committee be discharged from the consideration of said bill, from and after Monday next, unless the same shall be reported to the House at an earlier day; and that said bill, with such amendments, if any, as shall have been adopted in said committee, shall be taken up in the House on Tuesday next, at 11 o'clock, a. m. and be the special order until finally disposed of, reserving to said committee the right, according to the rules of the House, to report the same sooner if the discussion shall terminate.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved a call of the House; which having been ordered, was proceeded in till 160 members answered to their names; when,

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

The question recurring on the motion to suspend,

Mr. BRIGGS said if the gentleman would strike out the preamble, he would vote for it.

Mr. CLIFFORD, at the solicitation, modified the resolution so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House be so far suspended that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the consideration of Senate bill No. 127, entitled A bill to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue from and after Monday next, unless the same shall be reported at an earlier day; and that said bill, with such amendments, if any, as shall have been adopted, be taken up in the House on Tuesday next, at 11 o'clock a. m., and be the special order until finally disposed of, reserving to the said committee the right, according to the rules of the House, to report the same sooner if the discussion shall terminate.

Mr. C. called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which were ordered, and were—yeas 127, nays 53.

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson, Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, Calhoun, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Goggin, Griffin, Hall, Hammond, Hand, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Osborne, Parrish, Parris, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randolph, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Simonton, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—127.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Bond, William B. Campbell, Carter, Crabb, Cranston, Cushing, Davies, Garret Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goode, Habersham, Hawes, Hunt, James, Kempshall, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Palen, Proffit, Randall, Rayner, Reed, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Warren, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—53.

So the rules having been suspended,

Mr. C. moved the previous question; which received a second; and the main question having been ordered, and the question now being, 'Shall the resolution pass?"

Mr. PROFFIT demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 123, nays 58.

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sumpson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Cross, Dana, Davee, J. Davis, J. W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Cross, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Griffin, Hall, Hammond, Hand, Jno. Hastings, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parrish, Parris, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randolph, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Simonton, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—123.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Bond, Brockway, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chittenden, Crabb, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Dromgoole, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goode, Habersham, W. S. Hastings, Hawes, Hill of Virginia, Hunt, James, Kempshall, Lincoln, Marvin, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Palen, Proffit, Rariden, Rayner, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Warren, E. W. White, Thos. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—58.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LEET of Pennsylvania, by general consent, moved the following resolution, which was adopted.

Resolved, That the claim of John McFarlane of Pennsylvania, against the Winnebago tribe of Indians, for depredations committed upon his property in the year 1812, be referred with the accompanying documents and proofs to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions to said committee, if upon examination they should find said claim to be equitable and just, to report by bill or otherwise, directing its immediate payment.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. SERGEANT asked the general consent of the House to take up the bill called the Bankrupt bill, for the purpose of having it referred and printed.

Cries of no! no! from all parts of the hall.

Mr. DROMGOOLE inquired of the CHAIR, whether the bill was on the SPEAKER's table.

The CHAIR replied that it was.

Mr. DROMGOLE said he was willing that the business on the SPEAKER's table should be taken up and disposed of, and after the bill was reached in its regular order, he would be willing to have it referred; until then he objected.

Mr. SARGEANT moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. DROOMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays on the motion, which were ordered.

Mr. D. called for a division of the question, so as to take the vote simply on the motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken, and resulted—yeas 88, nays 88.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, J. W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Briggs, Brockway, Albert G. Brown, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Carter, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clifford, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John W. Wagener, Warren, Edward D. White, Wick, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, W. B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cross, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Eastman, Ely, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Goggin, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Lowell, Lucas, McCarty, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parris, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taliaferro, Taylor, Triplett, Turney, Vroom, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and Worthington—88.

There not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. DOWNING gave notice that he would on to-morrow ask leave to introduce a bill more effectually to protect the people of Florida in their lives and property, and to bring the Seminole war to a close.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. VANDERPOEL, the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. McCARTY spoke one hour in opposition to the bill, and in an examination of the policy of the past and present Administrations with the currency.

Mr. BIDDLE followed, and entered into an elaborate defence of the banking system, which, he contended, was infinitely superior to the system contemplated by the present bill. In the course of his remarks, he endeavored to show that the suspension of the old United States Bank arose solely from its zeal in placing its resources at the disposal of Government, by taking up its loans, etc. He had not concluded at half-past 2 o'clock, the hour of recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

Mr. BIDDLE resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia then obtained the floor. After adverting to the manner in which the last gentleman who addressed the committee had given his "parting blessing," Mr. C. then proceeded to explain that he would have taken an earlier opportunity of giving his views in favor of the bill, had it not been for peculiar circumstances in relation to his connection with certain gentlemen of the committee. Mr. C. then alluded to the position in which he and his colleagues from Georgia stood in relation to this question, and intimated that he had postponed his remarks, for the purpose of hearing the speeches of his colleagues, in order that he might have the benefit of their suggestions, on which he could reflect before he came to act on the subject. He did this, because he held himself bound by nothing but the honest convictions of his own mind; and in the vote he should give, he would be guided by that conviction alone.

The end he proposed to carry out was, first, to confine the action of Government to its proper limits; and second, to limit the revenue to the wants of the Government. That was the sum and substance of his political faith; and if he could show that this bill was calculated to produce that effect, he would be justified in his own mind in supporting it. Mr. C. here yielded the floor to

Mr. ALFORD of Georgia, who, as his colleague had expressed a wish first to hear the views of other members from that State, requested the floor on that ground. Mr. A. then proceeded to recapitulate the circumstances attending the election of the delegation from Georgia, and expressed his sorrow that any of his colleagues should think it their duty to support this bill. Mr. A. then gave his reasons why he could not vote for it, and in a very amusing manner told the committee how the late President Jackson had "whipped" the United States Bank. He said he had no fault to find with the old General for killing the Bank; but he did blame him for his inhumanity in not leaving it alone after it was dead.

Mr. COOPER then resumed his remarks in favor of the bill, and in reply to the arguments urged against it; but more particularly to those of Messrs. SERGEANT and BIDDLE. He read a number of authentic documents to show that the deposites had formed the basis of the circulation of the banks instead of their own capital; and that as the shadow moved on the dial plate, so the amount of deposites invariably indicated the amount of circulation. He then showed that the great evils which must result from placing the revenue of the country in the power of banking corporations to serve as a basis of their circulation; also the inevitable ruin which must ensue, when that basis should be withdrawn, leaving the paper in circulation without any power on the part of such banks to redeem it. In reply to the assertion that the deposites were of no use to the old United States Bank, Mr C. asked how it was that the Bank broke when the deposites were withdrawn.

In the recent speech of Mr. SERGEANT, that gentleman had made an elaborate calculation, showing the expense of the Independent Treasury system. He had also spoken with earnestness on the loss that would accrue by keeping five millions of specie constantly in the hands of the receivers general, showing how much pork, and how many barrels of flour might be bought with the interest on that sum. As a set-off to this, Mr. C. introduced a table showing the great amount which might have been realized by Government on the millions deposited with the United States Bank, estimating the interest at 6 per cent only. He then showed that the Bank used this money, as its circulation was always guided by the amount of deposites. And in addition to the profit on its bills, the Bank realized an immense sum by exchanges, etc. Mr. C. then contended that the cost of the Independent Treasury system was nothing in comparison to the former system, and that the gentleman from Pennsylania had been peculiarly unfortunate in raising such an objection. After adverting to many other objections to the bill, which he confuted by authentic documents, Mr. C. concluded at a quarter past ten.

Mr. W. B. CAMPBELL of Tennessee then took the floor, but gave way to a motion that the committee rise. This motion prevailing, the committee rose, and

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, June 27, 1840.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a communication from the Hon. William L. Storrs, resigning his seat as Representative from the State of Connecticut.

CASE OF LIEUT. HOOE.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama moved to take up the communication from the Navy Department, containing the proceedings of a court martial at Pensacola, summoned for the trial of Lieut. Hooe, together with the approval thereof by the Secretary of the Navy, Lieut. Hooe's protest and memorial to the President, and certain remarks of the Secretary in defence of his course in approving the sentence, together with a legal opinion of the United States District Attorney, Francis S. Key.

Objection being made,

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking the subject up.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved a call of the House; which having been ordered, was proceeded in till 156 members answered to their names; when

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

Mr. TALIAFERRO said that the gentleman who had instigated the call of these documents [Mr. BOTTS] was necessarily absent with his family, and whose wish it was that the question should not be taken on the reference and printing, unless he was present.

Mr. CRAIG replied, that when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] moved to suspend the rules for the introduction of the preamble and resolutions, making the call on the Department for these documents, he with much emphasis said "he would bring these Democrats up to the bullring," and it would not do to back out from the question. The documents are here, and should go forth to the people to enable them to have the whole truth.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi stated that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOTTS] knew, before he left, that the previous question was moved on the motion to refer the documents to the Committee on the Judiciary, and to have them printed. He had no idea that the question should be delayed because a gentleman thought proper to absent himself. He had been told that the motion for the previous question would not be withdrawn.

Mr. MONROE moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The CHAIR suggested that it would take no more time time to dispose of the question to supend the rules, than it would the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. M then withdrew his motion.

Mr. ANDREWS inquired of the CHAIR whether the motion was to suspend the rules for the morning hour, or without limitation?

The CHAIR replied that the motion was a general motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ANDREWS. Then, if it is to suspend the rules generally, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi said that the previous question had been moved on the proposition for reference; and if the rules were suspended, the subject could be disposed of before the expiration of the morning hour, as there could be no debate. The gentleman need not entertain any fears that it will extend beyond the horning hour, if his friends will meet the question at once.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to suspend the rules, taken, and were—yeas 105, nays 58.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, J. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, John Davis, J. W. Davis, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Habersham, Hammond, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leet, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Nisbet, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Rayner, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Vanderpoel, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—105.

NAYS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Andrews, Briggs, Calhoun, William B Campbell, Chittenden, Clark, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Davee, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dennis, Edwards, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gentry, Gerry, Goode, Green, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lincoln, Lowell, Marvin, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Naylor, Newhard, Osborne, Parrish, Randolph, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Thomas W. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—58.

So the rules were not suspended.

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee, who was entitled to the floor, spoke in opposition to the bill, and in favor of a Bank of the United States, as its antagonist measure. He then made some remarks in relation to the taunts which had been thrown out by the friends of the Administration, that the Opposition had no measure of relief antagonistical to the Independent Treasury bill. The Opposition have always had a measure of relief. They are in favor of recurring to the olden times, that gave a currency of more uniform value than specie—the times when the people asked no changes in the manner of collecting, keeping safe, and disbursing the public revenues. Those are the times, he dare say, the Opposition would like to see adopted. He argued in favor of a Bank of the United States as the only proper and the constitutional and expedient measure for the cure of the evils of the times, and in the course of which argument he denounced those who opposed a National Bank as the Loco Foco agrarian party. He also adverted to the expenses of the Administration, and censured the vote which increased the standing army in 1838 to fight and suppress the Indians, as one of the causes of the increase in the expenditures. It was done, he said, to increase the power and patronage of the Government. He also adverted to the late plan of the Secretary of War for the reorganization, under the authority of the State Governments, of the militia, and denounced it as more odious than the alien and sedition law of the elder Adams.

Mr. HAND, of New York, then took the floor in support of the bill. After adverting to the instructions of the Legislature of his State, which he denounced as a piece of arrogance, he proceeded to meet the numerous objections urged against the bill.

In the course of his remarks he exposed the fallacy of referring to England as an argument in favor of a paper system. He showed that it was not the amount of bank paper that constituted the wealth of a nation, but its productive industry. Gentlemen might argue as they pleased, but they could not disprove the fact, that labor alone created wealth.

Referring to the condition of the laboring classes in England under the operation of the boasted paper system, Mr. H. mentioned an instance when a witness, appearing before a committee of the House of Commons, was so weak from his water gruel diet, that he was obliged to sit while his evidence was taken, not having strength to stand.

The hour of 2½ o'clock having arrived, the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

Mr. HAND resumed his remarks in support of the Independent Treasury bill. In the course of his speech, he repelled, with much warmth, the attack made by Mr. Biddle upon the President of the United States. He was surprised that a gentleman of so much talent, should, in his valedictory, have seen fit to aim a parting arrow at the person of the Chief Magistrate—an arrow pointed with malice; impotent, however, as all such attacks would be. Mr. H. after an able vindication of the present bill, expressed himself as being no enemy to the banks, provided they kept within their own proper sphere. He contended that the Government ought to have no connection with such institutions, or it had no right to interfere with the currency. All that the friends of the Government wanted, was, that it should take care of its own money without intermeddling with the institutions of the States.

Mr. REED next obtained the floor, and spoke at some length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. JOHN DAVIS of Pa. followed in support of the bill. He prefaced his remarks by stating that he was a plain farmer, born to no other inheritance than the plough. Some were of opinion that a blacksmith might, with as much propriety, attempt to mend a watch, as a farmer to legislate. Be that as it might, he thought he understood the matter then under consideration sufficiently well to show and prove from facts, that an Independent Treasury system would be infinitely preferable to the ruinous banking system which had hitherto oppressed the country. Mr. D. was surprised at the complaint made by his colleague [Mr. SERGEANT] a few days ago, of the interest that would be lost on the five millions of specie, which, under this bill, would be in the hands of the receivers. In reply to that objection, Mr. D. exhibited a calculation showing the immense sums which would have accrued to Government, in the shape of interest, on the millions deposited for so many years with the United States Bank. The loss under the present measure on that head, would be comparatively nothing compared with the deposite system.

Mr. D. then referred to a table he had compiled from authentic sources, showing that the Independent Treasury system would not withdraw from circulation any more specie than was constantly, for so many years, in possession of the United States Bank. He then proceeded to show that it was the loss of those deposites that created the strong opposition to the present measure. The Bank did not like to give up the money after enjoying its use for so many years.

The gentleman had also said that the worst times the country had ever seen were under this Sub-Treasury system. Mr. D. would remind him of the great distress that prevailed at various periods during the existence of the United States Bank, and ask him whether the sudden and ruinous revulsions under that institution, were at all to be compared with any distress of late years. The people of Pennsylvania understood these "panic speeches" too well to pay any attention to them. The alarm had been raised too often to produce any effect now.

Mr. D. was surprised to hear the friends of the banks admit that those institutions could not stand without being propped up by the Government. He was much disappointed in hearing gentlemen make out so bad a case; as the fact that the banks could not stand without the aid of Government, was of itself a sufficient argument why the public money should not be entrusted to them. He was no enemy to the banks. He wished to make no war upon them. All he desired was a peaceable dissolution of the unprofitable partnership.

Mr. D. then exhibited a table, showing that the imports, the prices of produce, of property, etc. were all governed by the amount of circulating medium in the country. Also, that so long as any bank had the control of that circulation, by using the public revenue, the most disastrous results would inevitably ensue. What had been, would be again, if the public money should be placed in the hands of a great moneyed institution, using it for its own private advantage.

He then alluded to the ingratitude of the Opposition in assailing the President on the subject of Treasury notes. He referred to the time when assistance was generously extended to the Whig merchants of New York, by extending the time for the payment of duty bonds. That measure necessarily cut off from the Treasury a great source of revenue, and in order to supply the deficiency created by this indulgence, it was found necessary to ask for Treasury notes. Yet although these notes were required solely on account of the extension of the time for the payment of bonds, the merchants, for whose express benefit it was designed, turned round and raised the cry of "Treasury shinplasters." Mr. D. said he would disown a class of farmers in Pennsylvania, who would act so ungratefully.

As one strong reason why the bill should pass now, Mr. D. alluded to the probability that at the next session there would be a revision of the tariff system, when if the banks were not separated, they would bring their great influence to bear upon the House, in favor of a high tariff, so as to create a surplus revenue. It was important then to pass the bill now, and thus give the banks no chance of being interested in the question of the tariff at the next session.

Mr. D. adverted to a variety of other reasons to show why the bill ought to pass without delay. His remarks will appear in full hereafter.

Mr. HUBBARD then took the floor in support of the bill, and in a very striking manner illustrated its advantages over the banking system. The world had been governed by priestcraft, and then by kingcraft, but this was the age of bankcraft, the age of corrupt men, who make money without capital, etc. Mr. H. then gave a vivid picture of the system of modern banking, and its ruinous effects upon the country. He afterwards showed the great superiority of the present measure, which would operate as a check upon excessive imports, and prevent a recurrence of the disastrous scenes of former years.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. MORGAN, HILL of Virginia, CRABB, and CHITTENDEN, in opposition to the bill, until past 12 o'clock.

Mr. DUNCAN then obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise; which motion prevailing,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, June 29, 1840.

Mr. STURGEON presented the petition of a number of citizens of Pittsburg, boat owners, boat builders, and masters of boats navigating the Ohio river, remonstrating against the passage of any law requiring them to use exclusively any description of steam machinery: ordered to be printed, and laid on the table.

Mr. WALL presented the petition of a number of masters of vessels engaged in the commerce of the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the pilot law: referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the petition of George Turnley, praying for a pension in consideration of Revolutionary services; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which the same had been referred, reported the bills for the relief of Robert Whittle; for the relief of Lyman N. Cook, and for the relief of Benjamin McCullough, severally without amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which had been referred the several acts amendatory of the act establishing and regulating the Post Office Department, reportep the same with amendment.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Joint Committee on the Library, to which had been referred the resolution on the subject of the minerals and geological specimens preserved in the War and Navy Departments, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported unfavorably on the bill for the relief of Andrew Low, senior partner and assignee of Low, Taylor, and Company, of Savannah, Ga.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the memorial of John McClanahan, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. P. also from the same committee, recommended the indefinite postponement of the bill for the relief of James Cummings.

Mr. P. from the same committee, to which was referred the bills from the House for the relief of Daniel W. Going, William Bowman, Ichabod Beardsley, and Peter A. Myers, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bills from the House for the relief of James Cummings, Christian Brougher, John Piper, and John Lybrook, recommended their indefinite postponement.

Mr. BENTON, from the same committee, to which had been referred the bills to provide for satisfying outstanding claims to bounty lands for military services in the late war with Great Britain, reported the same without amendment, and recommended that further action thereon be postponed until the next session of Congress; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. B. submitted the following resolution, which lies one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to the Senate, at the commencement of the next stated session of Congress, a report showing the number of soldiers enlisted into the army of the United States, and entitled to bounty land, during the late war with Great Britain, designating those who were entitled to 320 acres from those who were entitled to 160 acres; also, the number of warrants which have been drawn and satisfied for each of said quantities; also, the number of warrants undrawn or unsatisfied at this time, with the names of the soldiers entitled to receive the same, and how far it may appear from the rolls of the army that they have died in the service, or been discharged honorably, or otherwise.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which had been referred the bills for the relief of William Butterfield, David Wilson, and John Brown, reported unfavorably upon the same.

The joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to extend further indulgence to the deposite banks, was read the third time and passed.

On motion by Mr. WALL, the bill to amend the act approved May 13, 1800, entitled "An act to establish the judicial system of the United States," was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill in addition to the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a road from Dubuque, in the Territory of Iowa, to the northern boundary of the State of Missouri, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1800, was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole; and after some remarks from Messrs. YOUNG, HENDERSON, CLAY of Alabama, PIERCE, KING, and TAPPAN, was, on motion of Mr. TAPPAN, laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. PIERCE, the bill to regulate the pay of the officers of the line and staff of the army was taken up, and explained and advocated by Mr. P.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought that there was hardly time enough left of this session to act on this billin both Houses, and that it would be better to postpone it to the next session. He was in favor of equalizing the pay of the officers of the line and the staff, but he thought that object could be better attained by giving them a fixed salary in lieu of all allowances, as contemplated by the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER]

Mr. BUCHANAN suggested to the Senator from New Hampshire, to let the bill lie over for the present. The Senator had entirely convinced him [Mr. B.] that there ought to be an equalization of the pay of the officers of the staff and line of the army; but the Senator himself had expressed the opinion that this subject could not be satisfactorily acted on this session. He would therefore suggest to the gentleman, that it would be better to let the subject lie over till the next session, when they would have the information required from the War Department by the resolution of the gentleman from Arkansas.

After some remarks from Mr. PIERCE, the bill was laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. KING, the Senate took up and considered, as in committee of the whole, the bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to procure steam vessels for the revenue service; and, after some remarks in explanation from Mr. K. it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. A. VAN BUREN, his secretary.

To the Senate:

The importance of the subject to the tranquillity of our country makes it proper that I should communicate to the Senate, in addition to the information heretofore transmitted in reply to their resolution of the 17th of January last, the copy of a letter just received from Mr. Fox, announcing the determination of the British Government to consent to the principles of our last proposition for the settlement of the question of the Northeastern boundary, with a copy of the answer made to it by the Secretary of State. I cannot doubt that, with the sincere disposition which actuates both Governments to prevent any other than an amicable termination of the controversy, it will be found practicable so to arrange the details of a conventional agreement on the principles alluded to as to effect that object.

The British commissioners, in their report communicated by Mr. Fox, express an opinion that the true line of the treaty of 1783 is materially different from that so long contended for by Great Britain. The report is altogether ex parte in its character, and has not yet, as far as we are informed, been adopted by the British Government. It has, however, assumed a form sufficiently authentic and important to justify the belief that it is to be used hereafter by the British Government in the discussion of the question of boundary, and as it differs essentially from the line claimed by the United States, an immediate preparatory exploration and survey on our part, by commissioners appointed for that purpose, of the portions of the territory therein more particularly brought into view, would, in my opinion, be proper. If Congres concur with me in this view of the subject, a provision by them to enable the Executive to carry it into effect, will be necessary.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, 27th June, 1840.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.

WASHINGTON, June 22, 1840.

The undersigned, her Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has the honor to transmit to the Secretary of State of the United States, by order of his Government, the accompanying printed copies of a report and map which have been presented to her Majesty's Government by Colonel Mudge and Mr. Featherstonhaugh, the commissioners employed during the last season to survey the disputed territory.

The undersigned is instructed to say, that it will of course have become the duty of her Majesty's Government to lay the said report and map before Parliament; but her Majesty's Government have been desirous, as a mark of courtesy and consideration towards the Government of the United States, that documents bearing upon a question of so much interest and importance to the two countries, should, in the first instance, be communicated to the President. The documents had been officially placed in the hands of her Majesty's Government, only a few days previously to the date of the instruction addressed to the undersigned.

Her Majesty's Government feel an unabated desire to bring the long pending questions connected with the boundary between the United States and the British possessions in North America, to a final and satisfactory settlement; being well aware, that questions of this nature, as long as they remain open between two countries, must be the source of frequent irritation on both sides, and are liable at any moment to lead to events that may endanger the existence of friendly relations.

It is obvious that the questions at issue between Great Britain and the United States, must be beset with various and really existing difficulties; or else those questions would not have remained open ever since the year 1783, notwithstanding the frequent and earnest endeavors made by each Government to bring them to an adjustment. But her Majesty's Government do not relinquish the hope that the sincere desire which is felt by both parties to arrive at an amicable settlement will at length be attended with success.

The best clue to guide the two Governments in their future proceedings, may perhaps be obtained by an examination of the causes of past failure: and the most prominent amongst these causes has certainly been a want of correct information as to the topographical features and physical character of the district in dispute.

This want of adequate information may be traced as one of the difficulties which embarrassed the Netherlands Government in its endeavors to decide the points submitted to its arbitration, in 1830. The same has been felt by the Government in England: it has been felt and admitted by the Government of the United States, and even by the local Government of the contiguous State of Maine.

The British Government and the Government of the United States agreed, therefore, two years ago, that a survey of the disputed territory, by a joint commission, would be the measure best calculated to elucidate and solve the questions at issue. The President proposed such a commission, and her Majesty's Government consented to it: and it was believed by her Majesty's Government that the general principles upon which the commission was to be guided, in its local operations, had been settled by mutual agreement, arrived at by means of a correspondence which took place between the two Governments in 1837 and 1838.

Her Majesty's Government accordingly transmitted, in April of last year, for the consideration of the President, the draft of a convention to regulate the proceedings of the proposed commission. The preamble of that draft recited textually the agreement that had been come to by means of notes which had been exchanged between the two Governments; and the articles of the draft were framed, as her Majesty's Government considered, in strict conformity with that agreement.

But the Government of the United States did not think proper to assent to the convention so proposed.

The United States Government did not indeed allege that the proposed convention was at variance with the result of the previous correspondence between the two Governments; but it thought that the convention would establish a commission of "mere exploration and survey;" and the President was of opinion that the step next to be taken by the two Governments, should be to contract stipulations bearing upon the face of them the promise of a final settlement, under some form or other, and within a reasonable time.

The United States Government accordingly transmitted to the undersigned, for communication to her Majesty's Government, in the month of July last, a counter draft of convention, varying considerably in some parts, as the Secretary of State of the United States admitted in his letter to the undersigned of the 29th of July last, from the draft proposed by Great Britain. But the Secretary of State added, that the United States Government did not deem it necessary to comment upon the alterations so made, as the text itself of the counter draft would be found sufficiently perspicuous.

Her Majesty's Government might certainly well have expected that some reasons would have been given to explain why the United States Government declined to confirm an arrangement which was founded upon propositions made by that Government itself, and upon modifications to which that Government had agreed; or that if the American Government thought the draft of convention thus proposed was not in conformity with the previous agreement, it would have pointed out in what respect the two were considered to differ.

Her Majesty's Government, considering the present state of the boundary question, concur with the Government of the United States in thinking that it is on every account expedient that the next measure to be adopted by the two Governments should contain arangements which will necessarily lead to a final settlement; and they think that the convention which they proposed last year to the President, instead of being framed so as to constitute a mere commission of exploration and survey, did, on the contrary, contain certain stipulations calculated to lead to the final ascertainment of the boundary between the two countries.

There was, however, undoubtedly, one essential difference between the British draft and the American counter draft. The British draft contained no provision embodying the principle of arbitration; the American counter draft did contain such a provision.

The British draft contained no provision for arbitration, because the principle of arbitration had not been proposed on either side during the negotiations upon which that draft was founded; and because, moreover, it was understood at that time that the principle of arbitration would be decidedly objected to by the United States.

But as the United States Government have now expressed a wish to embody the principle of arbitration in the proposed convention, her Majesty's Government are perfectly willing to accede to that wish.

The undersigned is accordingly instructed to state officially to Mr. Forsyth, that her Majesty's Government consent to the two principles which form the main foundation of the American counter draft; namely, first, that the commission to be appointed shall be so constituted as necessarily to lead to a final settlement of the questions of boundary at issue between the two countries; and secondly, that in order to secure such a result, the convention by which the commission is to be created shall contain a provision for arbitration upon points as to which the British and American commissioners may not be able to agree.

The undersigned is, however, instructed to add that there are many matters of detail in the American counter draft, which her Majesty's Government cannot adopt. The undersigned will be furnished from his Government, by an early opportunity, with an amended draft, in conformity with the principles above stated, to be submitted to the consideration of the President. And the undersigned expects to be at the same time furnished with instructions to propose to the Government of the United States a fresh local and temporary convention, for the better prevention of incidental border collisions within the disputed territory, during the time that may be occupied in carrying through the operations of survey or arbitration.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Secretary of State the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

H. S. FOX.

The Hon. JOHN FORSYTH, &c. &c. &c.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, 26th June, 1840.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has had the honor to receive a note addressed to him on the 22d instant by Mr. Fox, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain, enclosing printed copies of the report and map laid before the British Government by the commissioners employed during the last season to survey the territory in dispute between the two countries, and communicating the consent of her Britannic Majesty's Government to the two principles which form the main foundation of the counter proposition of the United States for the adjustment of the question.

The undersigned, having laid Mr. Fox's note before the President, is instructed to say, in answer, that the President duly appreciates the motives of courtesy which prompted the British Government to communicate to that of the United States the documents referred to; and that he derives great satisfaction from the announcement that her Majesty's Government do not relinquish the hope that the sincere desire which is felt by both parties to arrive at an amicable settlement, will at length be attended with success; and from the prospect held out by Mr. Fox, of his being accordingly furnished, by an early opportunity, with the draft of a proposition amended in conformity with the principles to which her Majesty's Government has acceded, to be submitted to the consideration of this Government.

Mr. Fox states that his Government might have expected that, when the American counter draft was communicated to him, some reasons would have been given to explain why the United States Government declined accepting the British draft of convention, or that, if it thought the draft was not in conformity with previous agreement, it would have pointed out in what respect the two were considered to differ.

In the note which the undersigned addressed to Mr. Fox on the 29th July of last year, transmitting the American counter draft, he stated that in consequence of the then recent events on the frontier, and the danger of collision between the citizens and subjects of the two Governments, a mere commission of exploration and survey would be inadequate to the exigencies of the occasion, and fall behind the just expectations of the people of both countries, and referred to the importance of having the measure next adopted bear upon its face stipulations which must result in a final settlement, under some form, and in a reasonable time. These were the reasons which induced the President to introduce in the new projet, the provisions which he thought calculated for the attainment of so desirable an object; and which, in his opinion, rendered obviously unnecessary any allusion to the previous agreements referred to by Mr. Fox. The President is gratified to find that a concurrence in those views has brought the minds of her Majesty's Government to a similar conclusion; and from this fresh indication of harmony in the wishes of the two cabinets, he permits himself to anticipate the most satisfactory result from the measure under consideration.

The undersigned avails himself of the opportunity to offer to Mr. Fox renewed assurances of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

H. S. Fox, esq. &c. &c.

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN, the message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

The bill to authorize the Mount Carmel and New Albany Railroad Company to enter on a credit a quantity of land, to aid the company in the construction of a railroad from New Albany, in the State of Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes, was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole; and after a debate, in which Messrs. BENTON, WHITE, GRUNDY, SMITH of Indiana, CALHOUN, YOUNG, DAVIS, and TAPPAN took part,

On motion by Mr. BENTON, the bill was indefinitely postponed—yeas 18, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Pierce, Preston, Roane, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White, and Young—16.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 29, 1840.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to suspend to the rules for the reception of a resolution that Congress adjourn on the 15th of July next.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 83, nays 43.

No quorum having voted—

The roll was again called, when the vote resulted—yeas 81 nays 89.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DROMGOOLE appealed to him to withdraw the motion.

But Mr. B. referring to the fact that this was the last day in which the Sub-Treasury bill could be debated, refused to withdraw.

Before the question was taken,

Mr. JENIFER asked leave to correct a mistake which it appeared that a member of the House [Mr. BROWN of Mississippi] had committed, in a published correction of a report in the Intelligencer of the substance of what took place a few days since, when Mr. J. had been speaking on the Sub-Treasury bill.

Leave being given, Mr. J. went into a recapitulation of the facts, (which he said were truly stated in the report, with the solitary exception that the issue of veracity referred to was not with the Legislature but with the citizens of Mississippi.) The gentleman from Mississippi complained that it had been there stated that Mr. J. had given him notice beforehand that he should notice the speech he had made, and should refer to a question of veracity he had before adverted to as between that gentleman and the Legislature of his State. Mr. J. said he had distinctly mentioned in the House that he should reply to several gentlemen, and particularly to the gentleman from Mississippi. The gentleman, in his correction, further stated that he had asked Mr. J. whether any such notice had been given to him, and he (Mr. J.) had denied it. In this the gentleman was certainly mistaken.

Mr. BROWN explained in reply, expressing his gratification that Mr. J's explanation was made in a feeling of courtesy which, from former exhibitions, the House had not expected from him. Mr. B. then again denied that Mr. J. had given any such notice as was stated in the report, either to himself personally, or to the House, in his hearing. A friend had indeed informed Mr. B. that Mr. J. had said he should allude to him; but Mr. B. did not, and could not know beforehand, of what nature the allusion was to be, whether political or personal, nor could he anticipate that a question of personal veracity was to be raised in regard to him. The impression given by the report was that Mr. B. having received previous notice that a question of veracity was to be made in respect to him, had, under such circumstances, left the House to escape exposure; at which he seemed somewhat indignant. He was happy Mr. J. had now disclaimed any desire to make such an exposure. As to the second point, Mr. B. did certainly understand Mr. J. as admitting that he had given no notice, personally, to him, of his intention to allude to him, and others had so understood him at the time. Whatever warmth there might appear in his manner, Mr. B. entertained no ill feeling toward the gentleman from Maryland, nor had he any intention of making a personal assault upon him or any other member of the House, either in or out of the House, and he should hold himself prepared at all times to repel any, should it be made on himself.

Mr. JENIFER, by leave, said a few words in rejoinder. The gentleman did him no more than justice in not expecting from him any thing in the form of a personal attack. Mr. J. had never meant to charge the gentleman personally with any want of veracity; he had only referred to the respectable authorities on which he had stated that the gentleman had voted in favor of the issue of post notes by the Bank of Mississippi in 1836, though he was now so strenuous in opposing banks, and advocating a Sub-Treasury.

The House now went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. BANKS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

INDEPENDENT TREASURY BILL.

Mr. DUNCAN of Ohio had the floor, but yielded it at the request of Mr. FLOYD of New York, who wished to make a personal explanation in reply to a charge made by his colleague [Mr. CHITTENDEN] on Saturday evening, of having made a false statement in relation to a sale of New York stocks below par.

Mr. F. said, had it not been for the very late hour (12 o'clock) at which the gentleman spoke, he would have appealed to the courtesy of the committee at that time to permit him to reply. He then procceded to say that he had heard several days before that his honorable colleague had made great preparations for replying to his [Mr. F's] speech, delivered on the 11th instant; and if he was not mistaken, the gentleman had shown to several members the reply he intended to make. The principal matter to which his honorable colleague had alluded, was that portion of the speech in relation to the credit system, and which asserted that the stocks of New York fell in a single year 22 per cent. below par.

The gentleman had said it was untrue that the stocks of New York had ever been sold below par, thus placing him in the position of having asserted a falsehood. But the gentleman had produced no authority to prove the statement untrue It was, therefore, his mere bare assertion, and rested solely on that assertion. Now he [Mr. F.] would not act like the schoolboy, who, when he was charged with lying by his comrade, gave the lie back again. No; he would apply to his colleague the words of Junius, who said, "I will not call you a rascal, but I will prove you one." He likewise would not say that his colleague had spoken that which was untrue, but he would prove that what he had said was untrue, by a reference to a Whig authority.

Mr. F. then referred to the following extract from the New York Journal of Commerce of September, 1839, to prove that what he had said in relation to the fall of New York stocks was not untrue, unless it could be shown that the extract itself was untrue:

"A sale of $100,000 New York and Erie Railroad stock, bearing 4½ per cent. interest, payable quarterly in New York, was made on Saturday at auction, under the direction of the Comptroller, and taken by Messrs. Prime, Ward, and King, as follows: $10,000 at 79, $10,000 at 78¼, $30,000 at 78, and $50,000 at 77½, the closing price. The stock is redeemable in 1859, and was sold on terms, one-third down, and the balance in thirty and sixty days."

Mr. CHITTENDEN replied, denying that he had charged Mr. FLOYD with falsehood, in asserting that New York stock had been sold below par. What he had charged was, that his colleague had asserted what was not true, when he asserted that the Legislature of New York had, under Whig auspices, embarked in the credit system, and, by so doing, had brought the stock of the State under par in the market. And in relation to the New York Journal of Commerce being Whig authority, such was not the case, for it was sometimes on one side, and sometimes on the other.

Mr. DUNCAN being entitled to the floor, addressed the committee with much point and humor, in reply to the objections urged against the bill. In the course of his remarks he intimated that he had called into requisition the services of his "poet," whose effusions he intended to give to the world when his speech should be written out.

Mr. D. took a review of the disgraceful system of modern banking, and commented with keen sarcasm on the shinplaster system, more especially in reference to it as adopted in Mississippi. He exhibited to the committee several specimens of the abominable trash by which the poor man had been robbed of the fruits of his industry by the associated bank shavers. Among other specimens he held up to view a twelve and a half cent plaster, which informed the fortunate holder that so soon as he could muster forty of those small shinplasters, by going to a certain place, some hundreds of miles distance, he would be entitled to receive one large shinplaster! Such were the beautiful effects of the paper system.

Mr. D continued his remarks until half-past two o'clock, when the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

Mr. DUNCAN resumed his remarks, and spoke with much earnestness against the abuses of the paper system, and in defence of the present measure, which he contended was the measure of the Constitution itself. He concluded at 10 minutes before 5 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Virginia followed. He expressed himself very reluctant at this late period to intrude upon the committee; and in doing so he was obeying the dictates of duty rather than his feelings. After alluding to the great importance of the present measure, he said it was needless to observe that it had called down the abuse of the Opposition in proportion to that importance. Yes, he would say abuse, for it was nothing but abuse and declamation with which it had been assailed, for no solid argument had hitherto been urged against it. This abuse, however, was nothing more than the Administration had to expect, for it struck at the vitals of a system by which a powerful, bold, and experienced Opposition had derived unjust advantages, which they were not willing to relinquish without a struggle.

After some further remarks, Mr. J. proceeded to comment on the inconsistent course of the Opposition, who at the early part of the session, were continually taunting him for not calling up the bill in preference to the appropriation bills; and then when the bill was taken up, the very same members were eloquent in their abuse that the appropriation bills had been passed over. He thus showed, in very pointed language, that let the friends of the Administration do what they would, they were sure to call down the declamation of their opponents. If they did not call up the bill, they were abused; and if they did call it up they were abused; so that there was do way of escape.

Mr. J. then adverted to the powers conferred on the General Government by the Constitution, and contended that the design of the framers of that Constitution could not be carried into effect unless the Government had the absolute control of its own funds. He then alluded to the conduct of the banks from one end of the country to the other, which, at a recent period, in open violation of their charters, had closed their doors and refused to pay over a single dollar of the public money deposited with them.

After some further remarks, he referred to the admission made by all the Opposition, that some measure of relief was necessary, and asked them how long they could stand excused, when in opposing this bill, they proposed nothing else in its stead.

Mr. J. then drew a glowing picture of the critical situation in which the Government would be placed in case of a war, with all its money in the vaults of the banks, and which, if they pleased, might play over the same game they did in 1837, by suspending specie payments.

It was under the deep conviction that it was absolutely necessary for the welfare of the Government to separate it from the banking institutions of the country, that the committee, of which he was a member, had concluded to report the present bill.

Mr. J. then proceeded to examine the principal features of the bill, and to notice the objections urged against them. After commenting upon the constant availability of the Government money, by placing it in the hands of receivers, he contrasted that plan with the former system of lodging the money with the banks He said it was needless to observe that no sooner was any portion of the public money placed in a bank, than the amount was set down in the books of the bank as a mere debt to the Government, and the money transferred to the vaults of the institution to be used in common with its other capital, for its own private benefit. Then, when the Government called for the money, the bank first consulted its own convenience before it thought proper to comply with the demand. Nay, who did not remember a meeting of bank directors in one of our commercial cities, where with closed doors they deliberated as to the time when it would be quite convenient for them to pay their debts. He appealed to every friend of the country whether such a system should be continued any longer, when the money of the Government was at the disposal of such institutions, which retained or paid it, just as they thought proper.

Mr. J. adverted with much earnestness to the admirable system of checks and safeguards provided by the bill. He reminded the Opposition that one section authorized the employment of agents, whose duty it would be to examine and inspect at short periods, the accounts of all officers entrusted with the Government money. And the very fact, that none of those officers would know the day nor the hour when their accounts would be inspected, was a powerful check upon dishonesty.

He then noticed an objection raised by the Opposion to the title of the bill. They complained that the words "Independent Treasury" implied a separation from the people He was astonished at such an objection. Did not every one acknowledge that the Government was the Government of the people? Were not the people and the Government one and the same?

Then he would ask, who was more entitled to an Independent Treasury than an independent people?

Mr. J. then gave a passing notice to the attack made by Mr. BIDDLE on Saturday, upon the President, for not having performed any military exploit in the last war, and followed the example of Mr. SERGEANT, then Major Sergeant, who shouldered his gun, and marched to the battle field, etc. Mr. J. after some remarks to the effect that Senators were required as well as warriors, begged to state that at the time when the Major Sergeant was shouldering his gun, Mr. Van Buren was rendering essential service to his country, by his exertions in the Legislature of his native State.

He, Mr. J. did not wish to be understood as saying any thing derogatory to the military fame of Major Sergeant. On the contrary, he had no doubt but that, during the war, the Major was both ready and willing to hurl a lance, or measure swords with the stoutest of John Bull's men who might happen to come in his way. But the people were generally allowed to the best judges of military achievements, and seldom failed to be reward them. Yet both the Major and Mr. Van Buren had been placed before the people as candidates for high office, and what was the result? What judgment had the people given on the merits of the two?

One great objection of the opponents of the bill was that the money would not be safe, and reference was made to the case of Swartwout. It was true that Swartwout had put his hand rather deeply into the public crib; but then that was under the operation of the deposite system, and could not occur under the present system. Besides, gentlemen appeared to forget that, in almost every newspaper, there were advertisements offering rewards for the capture of runaway bank officers! Gentlemen would not deny this; and, among other instances, he would refer them to a case of that kind, which had recently occurred in his own State, (Virginia,) when a bank teller had gone off with no less than five huudred and fifty thousand dollars.

Some member of the Opposition here called out, "Yes, a Bank with an Administration president."

Mr. JONES replied: "O, yes, an Administration president, and a Whig teller. (Great laughter.)

In further reply to the objections urged against the safety of the money in the hands of receivers, Mr. J. asked whether the money, when lodged with the banks, was safe from dishonest officers. What was there (he asked) to prevent the chief officer of a bank from going into its vaults, at any time, and lugging off by steamboat, or other conveyance, any sum he pleased? The fact was, the argument against entrusting individual receivers with the money, proved too much; for it would go to prove that no money ought to be entrusted into the hands of any individual whatever.

Mr. J. then showed that the whole expense of the present system would not exceed $31,000, which was a small sum when compared with the great and important objects contemplated.

Mr. J. after replying to many other objections to the bill, and showing that no other measure would restore prosperity to the country, brought his remarks to a close at half past 8 o'clock. They will appear hereafter in full.

Mr. PROFFIT then took the floor in opposition to the bill, which he denounced as neither more nor less than "a serpent sleeping in a bed of flowers," and hated himself because he could not prevent its passage. He concluded at half past eleven.

The CHAIR then gave the floor to

Mr. DROMGOOLE, who remarked, that, on the 20th of May last, the consideration of this bill was commenced in Committee of the Whole. On the first day of this present month, a resolution was adopted, which so far modified our rules as to enable a majority of the House to continue the discustion from day to day. Since that time, with scarcely the loss of a single day, (he believed not more than one,) the debate had proceeded in its progress. He believed that there had been delivered sixty speeches on the pending question, and, if he had not been incorrectly informed, thirty-three had been made by those opposed to the passage of the bill, and twenty-seven by its advocates. The opponents of the measure, he remarked, had consumed a great deal more of the time of the committee than its friends had. It was now, he said, nearly half past 11 o'clock in the night, and he thought, under all the circumstances, that it was proper that the debate should now cease in committee, and that, on to-morrow, we should, in the House, pursue such course as would be required by the resolution recently adopted in relation to our action on this bill.

He therefore moved "that the committee do rise."*

Mr. NAYLOR, who, it appears, had risen simultaneously with Mr. DROMGOOLE, here laid claim to the floor, and was proceeding to make some remarks, when

The CHAIR called him to order, the motion of Mr. DROMGOOLE not being debatable.

Mr. NAYLOR complained that he had been unjustly deprived of the floor; when he was called to order from various parts of the hall.

The question being on the motion that the committee rise, tellers were ordered, and Messrs. HOLMES and RAMSEY appointed to act as such.

Mr. NAYLOR again put in his claim to the floor, but as members had already commenced passing through the tellers, and his claim disregarded, he became much excited, and shouted at the very top of his voice, "Whigs, do not vote! You are slaves!"

The extreme high pitch of voice in which this call was made, had the good effect of awaking all the sleepers, who, from exhaustion, had taken refuge on the sofas.

Notwithstanding the injunction of Mr. NAYLOR, the Whigs then voted, and the reult was—ayes 51, noes 26.

So a majority of those present were in favor of the motion that the committeee rise.

The committee accordingly rose and reported the bill.

The CHAIR, at the request of several members, reported the fact that there was no quorum, but that the motion to rise had been carried by a majority of those present. The House having adopted a resolution discharging the committee from the further consideration of the bill, on to-day, the absence of a quorum was immaterial.

Mr. RAMSEY moved to adjourn.

On that motion the yeas and nays were demanded, and being taken, were—yeas 55, noes 43.

So, a few minutes before twelve,

The House adjourned.

*The debate was opened by Mr. CUSHING, a Whig, who occupied six hours and thirty minutes in the delivery of his speech. The concluding speech was made by Mr. PROFFIT, a Whig, who occupied the time of the committee for two hours and thirty five minutes.

The names of all the intermediate speakers on each side of the question have been noted, and the time occupied by each.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, June 30, 1840.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented the petition of John K. West and others, merchants, ship owners, captains of vessels, and insurers of the State of Louisiana, and the petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New Orleans, severally praying an amendment to the act of March 2, 1837, concerning pilots, which were severally referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAPPAN presented the petition of S. Wildman and others, citizens of the State of Ohio, praying the establishment of a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, it was ordered that the Secretary of the Senate transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury the papers which accompanied the petitition of the executrix of James Cashen, deceased, which were received from that Department.

Mr. TAPPAN, from the Joint Committee on the Library, to which was recommitted the joint resolution for the relief of Langtree and O'Sullivan, reported the same bill with and amendment, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred bills from the House

For the relief of Stephen Appleby;
For the relief of Wm. Glover;
For the relief of Isaac Boyd;
For the relief of Isaac Austin; and For the relief of Elijah Blodget; reported the same without amendment, and with a recommendation that they be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill confirming the claim of Jenette Cadottee, or her legal representatives, to a certain lot or tract of land in Michigan; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Stalker and Hill, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

The bill to expose to sale the public lands lying within the limits of the State of Ohio, was taken up and considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred various memorials on the subject of the official conduct of the Consul of the United States at the Havana, made a report thereon, concluding with a resolution that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. D. also, from the same committee, reported a bill granting extra pay to certain officers of the revenue cutters for services in the navy of the United States; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Commerce, to which had been referred the bill from the House for the relief of Elliott Smith and Nathan Barnewell, reported the same unfavorably, without amendment.

The bill supplemental to an act entitled "an act for the discontinuance of the office of Surveyor General in the several districts, so soon as the surveys therein can be completed, for abolishing land offices under certain circumstances, and for other purposes," was taken up as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill granting a portion of the public lands to the Mississippi and Rock river Canal Company being taken up as in committee of the whole, was discussed at much length by Messrs. YOUNG, ALLEN, BENTON, and CALHOUN, and on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was laid on the table.

The bill to provide for the better execution of laws in the collection of duties on imports was taken up, and the several amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance were explained and advocated by Mr. WRIGHT. A debate occurred in which Messrs. HUNTINGTON, CLAY of Ala. BUCHANAN, HUBBARD, WALKER, PRESTON, CLAY of Ky. and CALHOUN participated; in the course of which the two last named Senators expressed their opinion in favor of carrying out the principles of the compromise act, in the revision of the tariff at the next session.

Before any question was taken,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, June 30, 1840.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked that the House would by general consent agree to take up and dispose of the communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the proceedings of the court martial on the trial of Lieutenant Hooe. If the rules had not been suspended for the purpose of adopting the preamble and resolutions, calling for this document, he would have no objection to let it take its regular course with the business on the SPEAKER's table; but he deemed it his duty to take early action upon it, and hoped the House would consent to dispose of the subject now.

Objection having been made,

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to suspend the rules for the morning hour, and on that motion aked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. TRIPLETT hoped the gentleman from Virginia would consent to have the reading of the document dispensed with, and let it be printed.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIPLETT] would vote with him to suspend the rules, so as to get the subject before the House, he would move to suspend the reading, and have it printed, without delay.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and agreed to by yeas 122 nays 17.

The CHAIR announced that the question pending when the subject was last up, was the motion of Mr. J. THOMPSON of Mississippi, to refer the whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, and to have the documents printed; and on which motion the previous question was moved.

Mr. CHINN moved that the reading of the document be dispensed with, and that it be referred to a select committee.

The CHAIR said it was not in order for the gentleman to submit both motions at the same moment.

Mr. CHINN then moved that the further reading be dispensed with; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOTTS inquired of the CHAIR whether it would be in order to move to refer the subject to a select committee, instead of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The CHAIR replied that it would; but there could be no debate upon that motion, the previous question having been called for.

Mr. BOTTS said, then I make this a question of order. Is it competent for a gentleman to make a motion to refer a document which was not in the possession of the House before it had been read.

The CHAIR was understood to say that it was in the possession of the House.

Mr. BOTTS then made another point of order—whether it was competent for the gentleman from Mississippi to make a motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary, and in the same breath to move the previous question on that motion.

The CHAIR said according to the practice of the House, it was.

Mr. BOTTS. Was it in order for him to make such a motion before the paper was read?

The CHAIR replied that the reading had not been called for; but according to the usual practice, sufficient of the document had been read to enable the House to know what it was; and it was at that stage the motion had been made.

Mr. BOTTS inquired of the CHAIR whether the motion to lay on the table did not take precedence of the motion to refer, and all other motions.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. BOTTS. Then I move to lay the whole subject on the table, and have the documents printed.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered.

Mr. DROMGOOLE called for a division of the question so as to take the vote first on the motion to lay on the table; and the question was accordingly taken by yeas and nays, and resulted—yeas 60, nays 123.

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Edw. Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Rice Garland, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Grinnell, W. S. Hastings, Henry, Hill of Va. Hoffman, Hunt, James, Chas. Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Morgan, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Pope, Randolph, Rariden, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and C. H. Williams—60.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, H. J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, W. O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Connor, M. A. Cooper, W. R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, J. W Davis, Dawson, Dellet, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Gates, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Green, Griffin, Habersham, Hall, Hammond, Hand, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Holleman, Hook, Jackson, Jameson, Jenifer, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, Keim, Kille, King, Leet, Leonard, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Monroe, Montanya, Montgomery, Newhard, Nisbet, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Rayner, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Edward Rogers, J. Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, A. Smith, J. Smith, Thos. Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Worthington—123.

So the House refused to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question then recuring on the motion to print, it was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas —, nays 2.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved to refer the subject to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER said the question would be first taken on the motion to refer the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion for the previous question then received a second, and the main qustion was then ordered?" and the question being, "Shall the whole subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?" it was agreed to without a count.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked the general consent of the House to permit him to enter a motion to have an extra quantity of the documents in relation to Lieutenant Hooe printed for the use of the House.

Mr. GRAVES objected; and the motion was not pressed.

The CHAIR announced that the business specially in order was the Independent Treasury bill.

Mr. VANDERPOEL obtained the floor, and moved the previous question.

Mr. R. GARLAND inquired of the CHAIR whether the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The CHAIR replied that it was not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland said he had given notice of his intention to move a substitute for the bill, but no opportunity had been afforded him for that purpose. He hoped the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] would withdraw the motion to enable him to offer the substitute, and let the House take a vote upon it. He did not wish to present it to embarrass the action or waste the time of the House, but would be willing, if it was admitted, to have the vote taken without debate.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said a sense of duty would not permit him to withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOFFMAN said the bill had not, according to the rules, been reported from the Committee on the state of the Union; and he inquired of the CHAIR whether the resolution discharging the committee could override the rules.

The CHAIR replied that the resolution was adopted by two thirds, and therefore did override the rules; a vote of two thirds would suspend all the rules.

The motion for the previous question was then seconded; and the question then being "shall the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.?"

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 123, nays 100.

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Edmund Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Connor, M. A. Cooper, Wm R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, J. L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—100.

Mr. CHINN said he had voted in the affirmative under the impression that it was the general disposition of his friends to bring the thing to a close as soon as possible; but since he learned that was not the case, he wished to change his vote to the negative; which was accordingly done.

The question now being "shall the bill be read a third time?"

Mr. GRIFFITH of South Carolina called for the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 125, nays 105.

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. So the bill having been ordered to a third reading, it was read the third time, and the question being "shall the bill pass?"

Mr. GRAHAM obtained the floor, and spoke, without concluding, in opposition to its passage, until half past two o'clock, at which time the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina having concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill,

Mr. HAWES of Kentucky obtained the floor, and made an argument against it.

Mr. GREEN made a speech in opposition to the bill, and in favor of a Bank of the United States as the proper regulator of the currency.

Mr. VANDERPOEL next obtained the floor, amidst a host of competitors. He would make a single remark, (cries of the "previous question,") and that remark was that the speech he was about to make would be strictly in order—(laughter,) gentlemen might depend that the speech would be a very brief one, (continued laughter, and crices of the "previous question.") Mr. V. wished to have the friends with whom he acted to escape the imputation of having been unreasonable and tyrannical, by now closing this debate. He would therefore advert to an account kept by his vigilant friend to the right of the number of speeches made on each side since the bill had been first taken up in committee. It appeared that those gentlemen calling themselves Whigs had made thirty-six speeches, while the friends of the Administration had made but twenty seven speeches. The time consumed by the enemies of the bill was ninety-eight hours and twenty-four minutes, while its advocates had consumed but fifty-nine hours and twenty-four minutes. Now he had no fault to find with the Opposition for the time they had consumed, because they having the worst cause, it necessarily required the greater number of words, and if he could be persuaded that they could add any thing to their arguments, he would with pleasure sit and hear them. But it was evident to all, that their arguments were worn out. He had seen them week after week struggle in this business, still the stone of Sisyphus rolled back. He hoped, that in no event would the friends of the bill make any further speeches. The argument on their side was complete, unanswered, and unanswerable. To attempt to add to it would be only "bringing coals to Newcastle." He could not better serve his country or his constituents, than to move the previous question, which motion he now submitted.

Mr. CLIFFORD moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and proceeded in till 221 answered to their names.

The list of absentees having been called for excuses, the following gentlemen were respectively excused, viz. Messrs. ANDERSON of Kentucky, CORWIN, ADAMS, DOIG, and BREWSTER; and

The name of Mr. FISHER having been called,

Mr. MONTGOMERY moved that he be excused on account of absence with his family. Several of his colleages stated that he was unavoidably absent.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to excuse; which were ordered.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to suspend all further proceedings in the call.

Mr. GRAVES demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 141, nays 66. So all further proceedings were suspended.

The motion for the previous question then received a second; and the question now being, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays, which having been ordered, were—yeas 123, nays 99, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. NAYS—Messrs. Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Bynum, Calhoun, John Campbell, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, J. land, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, L. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—99.

So the main question having been ordered to be put, and the question now being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. DROMGOOLE demanded the yeas and nays, which having been ordered, were—yeas 124, nays 107, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Crabb, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Droomgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, J. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—124.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baer, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, John Campbell, Wm. B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chase, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, Wm. S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, John Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Wick, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—107.

So the bill was passed.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the title; which was in the following words: "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursing of the public money."

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania moved the following as a substitute for the above title, viz: "A bill to reduce the value of property, the products of the farmer, and the wages of the laborer, to destroy the indebted portion of the community, and to place the Treasury of the nation in the hands of the President.

Mr. CUSHING then rose and said he proposed to move an amendment to the amendment, and on that motion he had a few words to say. The amendment of Mr. C. was then read as follows:

"An act to enable the public money to be drawn from the Treasury without appropriation made by law."

Mr. C. then resumed, and said he had moved the amendment with a view of making a very limited series of remarks pertinent to the subject. He was then proceeding to show why, in his opinion, the contents of the bill did not agree with its title, when

Mr. PETRIKIN called him to order.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Massachusetts had a right to amend the title of the bill, if it were not a proper title. He had, therefore, a right to examine the contents of the bill, to show that the title was improper.

Mr. PETRIKIN still objected.

The SPEAKER said the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be pleased to reduce his point of order to writing.

Mr. PROFFIT called Mr. PETRIKIN to order; and after some colloquial debate, the objection was withdrawn.

Mr. CUSHING then resumed, and appeared very indignant at the interruption. He wished to know if the measure was to be forced on the country without affording an opportunity to say a single word. He said they were at the last act in the drama, but the end was not yet. Mr. C. then proceeded to give his reasons why he considered the bill as an unconstitutional measure, as he contended that it gave the Secretary power to draw on the public money without appropriations by law. He concluded by observing that he had witnessed the incubation and hatching of this cockatrice, but he hoped the time was not far distant when the people would put their feet on the reptile and crush it to the dust.

Mr. PICKENS then rose, and in a very animated manner said he had wished to make a few remarks upon the bill before its passage, but he was now compelled to confine himself in reply to the very extraordinary language and tone assumed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. What right had he to speak of this bill as being forced on the country by brutal numbers? That gentleman had defined the bill according to his conception of it; but he would tell the gentleman, that the bill would, thank God, deliver this Government from the hands of those who for so many years had lived by swindling the proceeds of honest labor. Yes, said Mr. P. I thank my God that the hour of our deliverance is now so near, from a system which has wrung the hard earnings from productive industry for the benefit of a few irresponsible corporations.

Sir, I knew the contest would be fierce and bitter. The bill, in its principles, draws the line between the great laboring and landed interests of this confederacy, and those who are identified with capitalists in stocks and live upon incorporated credit. The latter class have lived and fattened upon the fiscal action of this Government, from the Funding System down to the present day—and now they feel like wolves who have been driven back from the warm blood they have been lapping for forty years. Well may the gentleman, [Mr. CUSHING,] who represents those interests, cry out and exclaim that it is a bill passed in force by fraud and power—it is the power and the spirit of a free people determined to redeem themselves and their Government.

Here the calls to order were again renewed from nearly every member of the Opposition, and great confusion prevailed.

The SPEAKER with much difficulty succeeded in restoring something like order, and as none of those who had so vociferously called Mr. P. to order, raised any point,

Mr. PICKENS proceeded with his remarks, and alluding to the words of Mr. CUSHING, that "this was the last act of the drama," said this was the first, and not the last act of the drama. There were great questions that lay behind this, connected with the fiscal action of the Government, and which we will be called on to decide in the next few years; they were all connected with one great and complicated system. This was the commencement, and only a branch of the system.

Here the cries of order from the Opposition were renewed, and after the storm had somewhat subsided,

Mr. P. said, rather than produce confusion at that late hour of the day, when this great measure was so near a triumphant consummation; and, in spite of all the exertions of its enemies, was about to become the law of the land, he would not trespass any longer on the attention of the House. But the gentleman had said that because the first section had declared what should constitute the Treasury, and that another section had provided for keeping portions of the treasury in other places than the safes and vaults in the Treasury building of this place; that, therefore, it was to be inferred that those who were to execute it would draw money from the Treasury without appropriations by law, and thus to perpetrate a fraud upon the Constitution. Mr. P. said, let those who are to execute this bill dare to commit this outrage, and use money for purposes not intended in appropriations by law, and they would be visited with the indignation of an outraged and wronged people. It would be too gross and palpable. Such is not the broad meaning and intention of the bill. The construction given by the gentleman was a forced and technical one, and not natural. It was too strained to be seriously entertained by any one for a moment. He raised his protest against it.

Mr. P. regretted the motion admitted of such narrow and confined debate. He would not delay the passage of the bill upon so small a point. He congratulated the country that we had approached the period when the measure was about to be triumphantly passed into a permanent law of the land. It is a great measure. Considering the lateness of the hour, the confusion in the House, and that the gentleman had had the advantage of an opening speech, he now concluded by demanding the previous question.

On this motion the disorder among the Opposition was renewed with tenfold fury, and some members made use of some very hard words, accompanied by violent gesticulation.

It was some minutes before any thing approaching order could be restored.

The SPEAKER having called on the Sergeant-at-Arms to clear the aisles,

The call of the previous question was seconded, and the main question on the amendment to the amendment ordered to be put.

The motion for the previous question having received a second, the main question was ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. CUSHING's amendment to the amendment, and disagreed to without a count.

The question recurring on the substitute of Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania for the original title of the bill,

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays, which having been ordered, were—yeas 87, nays 128, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, J. W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Jas. Cooper, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Davies, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Everett, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hall, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnston, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Ogle, Palen, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, P. J. Wagner, Warren, E. D. White, J. White, T. W. Williams, Lewis Williams, J. L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Brewster, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Colquitt, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Doan, Doig, Droomgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Gerry, Griffin, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonord, Lewis, Lowell, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Naylor, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, D. D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—128.

So the amendment was rejected.

The title of the bill, as passed by the Senate was adopted.

Mr. NAYLOR made a motion to reconsider the vote, but subsequently withdrew it.

On motion, the House adjourn.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, July 1, 1840.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. A. VAN BUREN, his private secretary, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 12th March last, enclosing a communication from the Secretary of War, containing such information as could be obtained by his Department in relation to the military preparations of the British Government on the Northeastern frontier: referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, the copy of the British report of survey, and accompanying map, referred to in his message to the Senate of the 27th inst.

Mr. BUCHANAN would just state to the Senator from Maine, that but one copy of that report and one copy of that map had been communicated to the President of the United States. That was done as an act of courtesy by the British Government, and the copy of the map and report thus received was sent to the Committee of Foreign Relations of the Senate, with a request that it should be communicated to the Committee of Foreign Affairs of the other House, and then returned. The British Government had not adopted that map, but had informed this Government that they intended to lay it before Parliament. In the present state of the case, therefore, Mr. B. thought that it would not be proper to call for these documents and lay them before the world.

The resolution was then, in conformity with the rules, laid on the table until to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. LUMPKIN, in moving the consideration of the resolution submitted and urged by him some months ago, said: Mr. President, several months ago, I not only proposed, but urged upon the consideration of the Senate, the expediency of their fixing on a definite day for the termination of the present session of Congress. A majority of the Senate did not sustain my views, they preferred leaving the question open to their own discretion. The principal objection then urged to my views, were the important subjects then pending before Congress, especially the Independent Treasury bill. That bill has now passed the House of Representatives, and can no longer be urged as an excuse for prolonging this session of Congress. Therefore, I now hope to have the support of a majority of the Senate, in fixing this morning upon the day and hour when this session of Congress shall terminate. I shall propose, sir, this day two weeks, Wednesday, the 15th of July, at 2 o'clock p. m.

The resolution was then taken up, when

Mr. NORVELL said he was informed that the House of Representatives was at this moment acting on a resolution fixing on the day for adjourning the present session of Congress, and he would suggest whether it would not be better to defer acting on the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia, till they heard from the House.

Mr. LUMPKIN said that, upon this subject, there should be but one opinion. We have been here already too long for the interest of the country. If the day had been fixed, when I first proposed it, to adjourn on the 18th of May last, I entertain no doubt but we should have accomplished, and more fully have discharged, all the duties which devolve on the National Legislature, than will have been done by this extravagant extension of the session. My friends around me ask that I will modify my proposition, to meet what is said to be the views of the House—that is, to adjourn on the 21st inst. instead of the 15th. Sir, I cannot aggree to this modification; if it be forced upon me, I must submit to the will of the majority. I shall do so respectfully, but reluctantly. If it be now settled that the session of Congress will certainly terminate at the end of two weeks, we shall accomplish quite as much as we will do in three weeks, if that time be allowed.

If we determine to adjourn on the 15th, we shall then go to work earnestly, satisfied that we have no time to lose. If we say the 21st, it will tend to the belief, with many, that the balance of this week may be spent in arrangements for, and celebrating the memorable 4th of July. I will not attempt to urge arguments to sustain my opinions on this subject, but I shall adhere to the ground which I have taken, and yield only to superior force.

Mr. HUBBARD said that he was informed that the House of Representatives had just this moment adopted a resolution fixing on the 21st of July as the day of adjournment. When that resolution came to the Senate, it would be very proper for the gentleman to propose any amendment, changing the day, he thought proper; but he hoped that the gentleman from Georgia would wait till the resolution came from the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN expressed the wish that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LUMPKIN] would withdraw his proposition. He had stood by him from the first on this subject; but as the House had all the business that was to do, and the Senate but little, and the former having fixed upon a day by which they could get through with it, they had better take the House at its word. He should very reluctantly vote against the proposition of his friend from Georgia; but for a difference of six days only he could not oppose the wishes of the House. He thought that they had better take the House at its word, and that both Houses should go regularly and systematically to work in order to get through with the business before them by the 21st.

Mr. GRUNDY suggested that it would not be altogether courteous to the other branch of the Legislature, nor proper and becoming in this, to prescribe to them the way in which they should do their business. The House having all the business before them, and the Senate but very little, the former was the best judge of the time required to do it in; and he submitted whether it would be proper for the Senate to say that this business must be done by the 15th, when the House said that it would take till the 21st to do it. Without intending any disrespect to his friend from Georgia, [Mr. LUMPKIN,] he would move to lay his proposition on the table, till they could hear from the House of Representatives.

This motion was agreed to—ayes 21, noes 12; and the resolution was accordingly laid on the table.

The bill to authorize the purchase by the United States the stock of the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, was taken up as in committee of the whole, and discussed by Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, SMITH of Connecticut, CRITTENDEN, and BENTON, and was then laid on the table.

The bill to provide for the more faithful execution of the laws in relation to the collection of duties on imports, was taken up, the question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. HUNTINGTON, which declared any witness incompetent who should have any interest whatever in the cause, similar to the interest of the party in whose behalf he might be called to testify, which was further debated by Messrs. HUNTINGTON, PHELPS, GRUNDY, WRIGHT, and DAVIS for the amendment, and by Messrs. STRANGE, CALAOUN, and PRESTON against it; when, without taking a question,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, July 1, 1840.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON of Maryland, inquired of the CHAIR in relation to the order of business. It was known to gentlemen that the charter of the District banks would expire on Friday next; he wished the House to take up the Senate bill for the extension of their charters.

The CHAIR replied that, as this involved a change in the order of business, it could be done only by suspending the rules, or by general consent.

After some desultory conversation, the House came to an understanding that, after the expiration of the morning hour, the SPEAKER's table should first be cleared; in consequence of which, Mr. JOHNSON did not now press his application.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BANKS asked the consent of the House to submit a resolution, which was read for the information of the House, as follows, viz:

Resolved, The Senate concurring herein, that the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, close the present session of Congress, by adjournment of the two Houses of Congress over which they preside respectively, on Monday, the 20th of July next, at 7 o'clock.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to the introduction of the resolution, unless modified so as to adjourn on the 15th of July.

Mr. BANKS moved to suspend the rules, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 140, nays 20.

The rules having been suspended for this purpose—

Mr. BANKS modified his resolution by changing the day to Saturday, the 18th, at 7 o'clock.

Mr. CUSHING objected to Saturday or Monday, as in either case there was a great desecration of the Sabbath day, and proposed Friday the 17th, or Tuesday the 21st. He would move Friday the 17th, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. DROMGOOLE wanted first to inquire of the Chairman of the Committee of Elections how soon it was probable they would report on the New Jersey case.

Mr. GRAVES objected to any colloquies with the chairmen of committees.

Mr. DROMGOOLE did not press his inquiry, but gave notice he should vote for Tuesday, the 21st, as the day of adjournment.

Mr. RIVES (a member of the Committee of Elections) stated that it was probable the committee would be able to report on the New Jersey case on the latter part of the next week. He was apprehensive that it would not be in the power of committee to close that laborious investigation in time to have it acted on this session, if the earliest day proposed was fixed for the adjournment. The committee was extremely anxious that the question should be settled before the termination of the session. It was with that view that he had voted against the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the resolution by inserting Wednesday, the 15th, at 6 o'clock, and demanded the previous question.

Mr. BANKS modified his resolution to Tuesday, the 21st, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CUSHING withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BRIGGS spoke to order.

Mr. CAMPBELL (chairmain of the Committee of Elections,) having entered the House, wished to make a statement; but leave was refused.

The call for the previous question was seconded—ayes 113, noes 22.

The previous question was then put and carried.

And the main question being first put on Mr. PETTRIKIN's amendment, fixing on Wednesday, the 15th, it was carried, by yeas and nays—yeas 105, nays 95.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATTERSON moved to reconsider this vote.

Mr. HENRY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 108, nays 84.

So the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, chairman of the Committee of Elections, was understood to say that it would be impossible for the committee to report this session, if the 15th was fixed for the day of adjournment.

The question again recurring on the proposition for adjourning on Wednesday, the 15th of July,

Mr. BRIGGS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion, which, having been ordered, were—yeas 88, nays 113.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. BANKS's resolution, fixing on Tuesday, the 21st, at 2 o'clock; which was adopted, without a count, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON, the House proceeded to the orders of the day; which orders were first the business on the SPEAKER's table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications from the Executive:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: I transmit a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, suggesting that an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars be made by Congress to meet claims of navy pensioners, payable on the 1st of July next, reimbursable by a transfer of stocks, belonging to the fund, at their nominal value, to the amount so appropriated; and respectfully recommend the measure to the consideration and action of Congress.

M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, June 19, 1840.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit the enclosed report of the Secretary of War, with accompanying documents, furnishing all the information the Department has been able to obtain in relation to any violation of, or desire

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, JULY 7, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 32.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

on the part of Great Britain to annul, the agreement entered into between that Government and the United States, in the month of April, 1817, relative to the naval force to be maintained upon the American lakes, called for by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th of March last. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON CITY, June 29, 1840.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Ohio, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a communication from the Secretary of War, accompanied by a report of the Commanding General of the army, embracing all the information which can be obtained in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of April, 1840, requesting to be furnished with any information in possession of the Executive Department, showing the military preparation of Great Britain, by introducing troops into Canada or New Brunswick, or erecting or repairing fortifications on our Northern and Northeastern boundary, or by preparing naval armaments on any of the great Northern lakes, and what preparations, if any, have been made by this Government to put the United States, and especially those frontiers, in a posture of defence against Great Britain in case of war. M. VAN BUREN.

WASHINGTON, June 29, 1840.

Ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information called for by the House on the 7th of February last, in relation to the trade of the United States with China, from the years 1821 to 1839. On motion of Mr. EVERETT, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting information called for by the House on the 25th of May, upon the subject of chronometers, and the expenses of officers employed in their transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual statements of the commerce and navigation of the United States for the year ending Sept. 30, 1839; which letter and statements were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. CURTIS moved that 5,000 extra copies, and Mr. ADAMS moved that 10,000 extra copies be published.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

Mr. RICE GARLAND preferred 5,000 copies. In the interior of the country few copies were read. It would cost $5,000 a least to print 10,000. The Senate had already ordered 5,000.

Messrs. RAMSEY and CAVE JOHNSON objected to the motion; Messrs. ADAMS, CURTIS, and REED were in favor of printing the largest number.

Mr. CURTIS moved to suspend the rules to consider the motion, and moved the previous question; which was seconded, put, and carried. And the main question being on the motion to print 10,000 extra copies, it was carried.

Sundry Senate bills were twice read and referred.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner on Public Buildings, communicating information called for on the ——— in relation to the superintendents and workmen employed on the public buildings: on motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, was referred to the Committee on the Expenditures on the Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to report from a select committee on a memorial of the American Philosophical Society, requesting the aid of Government in carrying on a series of geological observations.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia objected.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BANKS.

The following bill from the Senate extending the charters of the banks in the District of Columbia, coming up in order, viz:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the charters of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the 4th day of July, 1842, unless Congress shall, in the mean time, otherwise order and direct, upon condition that neither of said banks shall issue and pay out the notes of any other bank, banker, or banking institution or corporation, which is in a state of suspension or non-payment of its liabilities in specie; and upon the further condition that the said banks, nor either of them, shall take a stay of execution on any judgment recovered against them in any case whatever, nor appeal from such judgment, nor take a certiorari thereon, except on an affidavit of merit.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON went into a speech in support of the bill, in which, though he admitted the bill not to be such, in all respects, as he could have desired, he urged the shortness of time now left, as the charters of the banks would expire on Friday next, and the ruin to the people of the District which must ensue if the banks should be suddenly destroyed.

Several questions were then put to him by Messrs. CAVE JOHNSON and VANDERPOEL, when

Mr. ADAMS, supposing Mr. JOHNSON to have concluded, began to speak.

Mr. JOHNSON yielded, and

Mr. ADAMS made a speech in favor of the bill, especially on the ground that it was from one of these banks that members of Congress must get their pay.

Mr. PETRIKIN followed in some remarks in opposition to the passage of the bill. He was opposed to all exclusive privileges. He pointed out the manner in which these banks had set at defiance the laws; and showed that, by the exclusive privileges given to these institutions, and from the manner in which they fleece the laboring community, one of the presidents is enabled to ride in his carriage and four, with liveried servants, etc. He concluded by moving the following amendment to the bill:

Provided, also, That the president and directors of each of said banks shall be jointly and severally, in their individual capacity, liable for all notes issued or debts contracted by said banks respectively, from and after the day this act goes into effect, to be recovered as other debts of like amount may at the time be by law recoverable; And be it further provided, That the said banks shall not make any division of profits, or declare any dividends, during the time said banks shall refuse to pay all their liabilities in specie on demand; and the President and directors of any of said banks who shall make any such division of profits, or declare any such dividend, or consent to or vote for the same, shall be liable to pay double the amount of the sum so divided or declared, to be recovered of them in their individual capacity, by any person suing for the same as debts of like amount are recoverable, one half of said forfeiture to go to the person suing, and the other half to the corporation where said bank is located.

Be it further enacted, etc. That justices of the peace within the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction in all actions of debt against any of the banks whose charters are hereby extended, for sums not exceeding $100 and no appeal, certiorari, or injunction shall be allowed, granted, issued or directed, by any court within said District, unless an affidavit be first made and placed in said court by the president or one or more of the directors of the bank so sued, that such appeal, certiorari, or injunction is not asked for the purpose of delay, but because he or they believe there is a just defence on the merits, and that injustice is likely to be done if said appeal, certiorari, or injunction should not be granted.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said: It was not necessary to the purpose he had in view, in the few remarks he intended to submit, to classify the House by denominating one portion of it bank men, and another party enemies of the banks. Nor was it his purpose to cast imputations upon gentlemen because they happened to be connected with banks. It was his pleasure to know some of the gentlemen who were connected with the institutions in question, and it was but just to them to say, that they were gentlemen for whom he entertained very high respect. Still, he felt it his duty to say, that the bill under consideration, considering the situation in which all the banks of this District now exhibited themselves, was a very extraordinary one. They were in a state of suspension—of open delinquency—of open violation of the law that created them; and while in this condition, they came and asked for an unqualified extension or renewal of their charters. It could not be, that after our doings of yesterday, we were prepared to vote for this bill, without any amendment to drive the banks back to their duty. What a spectacle would we exhibit to the nation by so doing. It was our incumbent duty to set a better example to the States. The facility with which the banks of the several States now-a-days suspended specie payments was, indeed, a reproach to our country. An honorable merchant, during a pecuniary or commercial revulsion, would often times sacrifice hundreds of thousands of dollars to maintain his credit and integrity; but, according to the ethics of banks, they suspended specie payments whenever it became a little inconvenient to maintain them. Indeed, they seemed to suspend some times for pretty much the same reason that Betty assigned for skinning her eels, "because they liked it." It was high time that we at least should set our face against the facility with which the banks assumed this unjust—this demoralizing position. That portion of the House that was now coming out for the recharter of these suspended banks, had always told us that it was the duty of Congress to regulate the currency of the country—that the friends of the Administration were subject to the reproach of permitting an important power, conferred upon us by the Constitution, to lie dormant. And was this a specimen of the manner in which they would put this alleged power into execution? Was this the mode in which they would "regulate the currency"—recharter a batch of banks, that are daily in the open violation of law and duty? They could not pay their debts, or redeem their bills; but what could they do—what had they done under our very eyes? Why, make dividends of profits while in a state of suspension—yes, profits made at a time when the poor market woman, with one of their notes, was liable to be shaved to the tune of from five to ten per cent.! Were we prepared to legalize such doings; by voting for an unqualified renewal of these charters; one that would involve no rebuke for, but would rather sanction, their past and present demerits? If we passed this bill, what a beautiful commentary would it be upon our doings of yesterday—a day signalized by the passage of that great measure of reform. He would never consent to vote for the bill, unless a provision was inserted that the banks should resume specie payment within thirty, or, at farthest, sixty days. As matter of example and principle, this bill extended in its operation beyond the ten miles square. It was commensurate with the Union. By passing it in its present state, we would proclaim to the world, to the institutions of the States, the immoral sentiment that a state of suspension is not a state of palpable and most reprehensible delinquency.

Mr. BRIGGS responded to him in an argumentative speech, urging the example of the surround-

States, in renewing the charters of the banks while under suspension. He spoke with warmth of the abuse which had been heaped upon the gentlemen who conducted these banks.

Mr. M. A. COOPER of Georgia explained some remark he had thrown in while Mr. BRIGGS was speaking, and then opposed the bill on constitutional grounds, but concluded by moving to amend the amendment of Mr. PETRIKIN by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That the said banks shall not issue notes under ten dollars; that from and after the first January next they shall not issue notes of a denomination less than twenty dollars; and after the 1st January, 1842, they shall not issue notes of a less denomination than fifty dollars. Provided, also, That their notes all times shall be redeemable by specie, or, on failure thereof, their charters shall be forfeited.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That in case the said banks, or either of them, shall refuse or fail to pay their notes in specie on demand of any person, such person shall and may have remedy by judgment and execution at law, at a notice of ten days before any justice of the peace of said District.

Mr. W. THOMPSON made a speech of much warmth and animation in defence of the bill, and in reply to the objections which had been advanced.

Mr. VANDERPOEL sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment he wished to offer, and which was read for information, as follows:

Provided, further, That said banks shall resume and continue to pay specie for all their liabilities within 60 days after the passage of this act; and on failure thereof, all the rights and privileges accruing from the foregoing act shall be null and void and of no effect.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the amendment was not then in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland resumed his remarks in favor of the bill; showed the condition of the banks, maintaining that they were prepared to resume whenever the banks in Virginia and Maryland should resume; and if they were compelled to resume before that time, it would be virtually to suspend their charters; which would prove disastrous in the extreme to the District; he concluded by moving the previous question.

On an earnest appeal from Mr. STEENROD, however, he withdrew the demand.

Mr. HOLMES of South Carolina then delivered an animated appeal against the ruinous consequences which must instantly follow to this District, should the bill be rejected. He avowed himself the friend of credit, and said he had voted for the Independent Treasury bill not to destroy, but to give it stability.

Mr. RYALL of New Jersey made a short speech in most decided opposition to the bill; but if it must pass, he was for Mr. PETRIKIN's amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD spoke for the bill, urging the distress which must ensue should it fail.

Mr. U. in the close, moved the previous question.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. UNDERWOOD withdrew the call for the previous question, on condition that Mr. WELLER of Ohio, who obtained the floor, should renew it.

Mr. WELLER spoke for some time with great animation in opposition to the bill, and had not concluded when the House took recess.

EVENING SESSION.

On leave given, Mr. BANKS of Virginia presented the petition of John Baggot, an invalid pensioner; and Messrs. JOHNSTON of New York, CHAPMAN of Iowa, and BOYD, presented memorials; which were appropriately referred.

On leave given, Mr. JONES of Virginia, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with amendments, the Senate bill more effectually to secure the public money in the hands of the officers and agents of the Government, and to punish public defaulters; which said bill, on motion of Mr. J. was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, together with the amendments, was ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate extending the charters of the District banks, under certain restrictions, for the term of two years.

The question being on the amendment to the amendment,

Mr. WELLER continued his remarks in opposition to the bill, (giving way to explanations from Messrs. ANDREWS, J. DAVIS of Pennsylvania, and JOHNSON of Maryland,) and concluded at ten minutes past five, by calling on all those friends of the Administration who were sincere and orthodox in their political sentiments on the subject of the banking system, to rally now and vote against the bill.

And Mr. W. in redemption of his pledge to Mr. UNDERWOOD, renewed the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JENIFER, and a number of other gentlemen appealed to Mr. WELLER and Mr. UNDERWOOD to withdraw the demand. A momentary scene of excitement followed, which resulted in the release of Mr. WELLER from the pledge imposed on him by Mr. UNDERWOOD, and in the withdrawal of the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JENIFER then addressed the House in an energetic appeal to the sense of justice of the House towards the disfranchised people of this District; and deprecating the attempt to make this a question of party, and adverting to the deplorable results which must immediately follow unless this or some similar bill should be passed.

He was followed by Mr. SALTONSTALL in some remarks illustrative of the injustice which would be done to the people of the District by the adoption of the amendment, and by the refusal of Congress, the local Legislature of this District, to pass the bill.

Mr. STEENROD obtained the floor, and amongst other things, went at some length into an examination of the moral and political evils of the banking institutions of the United States, and of the swindling propensities by which (he said) they were characterized.

Mr. HABERSHAM then moved the previous question.

Mr. RICE GARLAND moved a call of the House; which was not ordered.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. BRIGGS asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 87, nays 104, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. H. J. Andreson, Atherton, Banks, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, A. V. Brown, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Clifford, Coles, Connor, M. A. Cooper, W. R. Cooper, Crary, Davee, Doan, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Galbraith, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vroom, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Landaff W. Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Beirne, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, Carter, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davies, John Davis, G. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fisher, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Hawes, Henry, John Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Holmes, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, McCarty, Mallory, Marvin, Mitchell, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Morris, Naylor, Newhard, Ogle, Osborne, Palan, Peck, Pope, Proffit, Rrandall, Randolph, Raridan, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagner, Warren, Watterson, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—104.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The question recurring on the motion for the previous question, it received a second; and the main question was ordered.

The amendments were then read; and the question being first on the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. COOPER,)

Mr. CONNOR called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, called for a division of the question, so as to take the question first on that branch which forbids the issue of notes of a denomination less than ten dollars.

The CHAIR said that the question would be so divided.

The question being on the adoption of this branch of the amendment, viz: "Provided said banks shall not issue notes under ten dollars," it was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Wm. O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Craig, Cross, Dana, Davee, John Davis, J. W. Davis, Doan, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, J. Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—110.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Biddle, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Chas. Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Peck, Pope, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—94.

Mr. WELLER moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered,

Mr. WELLER, at the solicitation of several, withdrew the motion.

Mr. ANDREWS moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. R. GARLAND demanded the yeas and days; which were ordered, and were—yeas 70, nays 113.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the second branch of the amendment, declaring that the banks "shall not, from and after the first of January next, issue notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars," it was taken and determined in the negative, by yeas 83, nays 99, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Dana, Davee, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Hammond, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hook, Hubbard, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lewis, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Ramsey, Reynolds, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Turney, Vroom, Watterson, Weller, Wick, J. W. Williams, and Henry Williams—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Barnard, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Edward Davies, John Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Earl, Edwards, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Holmes, Hoffman, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, W. C. Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Warren, Edward D White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, C. H. Williams, and Worthington—99.

So this branch of the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARRIS moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. RAMSAY demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, July 2, 1840.

The VICE PRESIDENT informed the Senate that after to-day he would be absent during the remainder of the session.

The VICE PRESIDENT also submitted a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a statement of the transfers of appropriations for the naval service, during the past year; which was ordered to be priated.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Ann W. Angus, and the memorial of John Lang, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend an act to regulate the pay of the navy of the United States; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

On motion by Mr. TAPPAN, the joint resolution from the House, fixing Tuesday the 21st inst. at 2 o'clock, p. m. as the time for the adjournment of Congress, was taken up, considered, and agreed to.

ADMISSION OF FLORIDA.

Mr. WALKER, from the Select Committee to which had been referred various memorials on the subject, reported

A bill for the admission of Florida into the Union on certain conditions.

[The bill providest hat the State shall embrace the territories of East and West Florida, as described in the Constitution adopted by the people of Florida, January 11, 1839]

Also, a bill providing for the division of Florida, and the admission of the States of East anp West Florida.

[This bill provides that, after the admission of Florida, the Legislature may pass a law dividing the State into two States to be desgnated East and West Florida—the dividing line to be the Suwannee river, without further proceedings of Congress, but not until it is ascertained that the population east as well as west of the Suwannee shall exceed thirty thousand.]

The bills were respectively read, and ordered to a second reading.

The bill regulating the pay of pursers in the navy was taken up, as in committee of the whole and after being discussed by Messrs. WILLIAMS, SOUTHARD, CALHOUN, HUBBARD, KING, and PIERCE, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to provide for the more faithful execution of the laws in relation to the collection of duties on imports, was taken up, the question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. HUNTINTON, which declared any witness incompetent who should have any interest whatever in the cause, similar to the interest of the party in whose behalf he might be called to testify, and after a debate, in which Messrs. HUNTINGTON, WRIGHT, HUBBARD, CALHOUN, STRANGE, and PHELPS participated, it was laid on the table.

The Senate then went into Executive session,

And then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, July 2, 1840.

On motion of Mr. JOHN DAVIS of Pennsylvania, the journal of Tuesday was so amended as to allow his vote (which had been accidentally omitted in a certain case) to be inserted thereon.

Mr. ADAMS, from the select committee to whom had been referred the memorial of the American Philosophical Society, requesting the aid of Government in carrying on a series of observations, asked leave to make a report.

Mr. A. explained that the reason why he was desirous to make the report at this time was, that the report concluded with a resolution making an appropriation to carry out the object, which it was proposed to make in the shape of an amendment to the army bill.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to any amendment of the kind.

Mr. ADAMS said he must then move a suspension of the rules, and he asked the reading of the resolution with which the report concluded. It was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the sum of twenty thousand dollars ought to be appropriated for the establishment of five several stations, at suitable distances from each other, for making observations of terrestrial magnetism and meteorology, conformably to the invitation from the Royal Society of Great Britain to the American Philosophical Society at Philadelphia, and other learned societies in the United States; and that the said sum should be placed under the direction and at the disposal of the Secretary of the Navy, for the fulfilment of those purposes, he to account for the expenditures thus authorized to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. A. having explained that he did not intend to press the question on the resolution at this time, but wished simply that the report should be laid on the table and printed—

Mr. PETRIKIN withdrew his objection.

And the report and resolution were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was declared by the CHAIR (which was occupied during the whole morning by Mr. BRIGGS, of Massachusetts) to be the following resolution heretofore reported by Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs:

"Resolved, That so much of the resolution of this House of the 7th of March last as declared the expediency of suspending the further execution of the first and second clauses of the fourth article of the treaty made with the Winnebago Indians in 1837, be rescinded."

Mr. CRARY was entitled to the floor, but, not being at the time in his seat,

Mr. BELL said he knew, from the last conversation that he had held with the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CRARY,] that he had now no objection to the resolution.

Mr. PETRIKIN said that if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] did not object to the resolution, he (Mr. P.) did.

Mr. P. then proceeded to oppose the resolution, on the ground that he disapproved this mode of making reports by detachments. The resolution, he said, ought not to be adopted until the committee had made the whole report.

Mr. BELL concurred, he said, in the opinion of the gentleman, as a general proposition, that reports ought to be made in full. The only ground on which a majority of the Committee on Indian Affairs had recommended the passage of this resolution before the whole report was made on account of the suffering of individuals who held these drafts—many of them innocently—and whose credit might be destroyed, and whose property might be injured, if such a resolution were not passed. The committee did certainly expect to make a report in full on the other branches of inquiry submitted to them; but he feared the preparation of that report would take almost to the last hour of the session. The committee were indeed aware that some injustice might be done to individuals by the adoption of the resolution; but they were also of opinion that far greater injustice would be done if a different course were pursued. He trusted that the House would see the propriety of adopting the resolution.

Mr. RAMSEY called for the reading of the resolution, which having been read,

Mr. RAMSEY said the first board of Commissioners closed its sessions, and the drafts which are now asked to be paid, were issued in October, 1838. The proceedings of that board, after being set aside by the Secretary of War, were brought before the House of Representatives by a resolution passed February 19, 1839, as appears by document No. 229. On the first of March, 1839, on the allegation of frauds having been committed by partisans of the Administration, the whole subject was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but it being only two days before the close of the session, it was not acted on. Notwithstanding, the Secretary of War appointed a new commissioner (Mr. Fleming of New York) to examine and adjudicate upon these claims de novo. This commissioner closed his business at Prairie du Chien on the 12th day of last October, but did not report his proceedings, as appears, to the War Department, until the latter part of February. Since that time the Committee on Indian Affairs have had the subject under consideration. There does not appear to have been any disposition heretofore manifested by those having charge of the business to hasten the payment of these drafts. The Opposition party charged fraud and corruption against the first board of commissioners, and have not yet substantiated these charges. I wish to afford the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] and his friends time to make good their allegations if they can. The proceedings of the new board are also asserted to be unjust and oppressive. It is said that there have been favorites in the division of the spoils under the Winnebago treaty; that out of $150,000 provided to pay the debts of this nation, certain preference creditors obtained $130,000! and those who believe themselves entitled to more than one-half of the whole sum, were only awarded $20,000. The preferred or favorite creditors are anxious for immediate payment, and talk about delay, hardship, &c. Those who believe they have suffered wrong, (although they are poor and want their money) claim a new investigation.

Now, as the Opposition have charged fraud and corruption and attempted to fix it on the Administration and its officers, I wish the road to investigation to be kept open, and not to be temporarily closed for the purpose of benefiting some of the opponents of the Administration, connected with the American Fur Company. If fraud has been practised by the officers of the Government, I shall be the last to shield them, and am anxious for a full, free, and uninterrupted examination of the whole affair. I therefore move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. BELL asked the yeas and nays on that motion, which was ordered.

The reading of the two clauses of the treaty referred to in the resolution having been called for, and the same having been read—

Mr. BELL wished, he said, to state a single fact. He was understood to say that this proceeding had been authorized by the War Department, the appropriate constitutional authority for executing the treaty.

And the question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, nays 82.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. BELL inquired of the CHAIR whether a majority or a two-thirds vote would be required, at any time hereafter, to take the resolution up?

The CHAIR was understood to express the opinion that a vote of two-thirds would be requisite.

Mr. PROFFIT asked that the House would (by unanimous consent) take up the Senate bill on the SPEAKER'S table, in relation to a tract of land in the State of Indiana, not located, and which lay in the district of his absent colleague, [Mr. HOWARD.]

Mr. W. THOMPSON said he would not make any objection, but he wished the gentleman would defer the motion for the present, as he (Mr. T.) was desirous to make a number of reports from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PROFFIT said he would let the matter lie over for the present.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, jr. from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill making an appropriation for paying the claims of the militia of Vermont, called out by the Governor of that State, to prevent an unlawful incursion into Canada; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. T. also, from the same committee, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act for the organization of a company of sappers, miners, and pontoniers; which was refer ed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. T. also reported back to the House, from the same committee, with an amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of the corporate authorities of the city of Mobile;" which was committed to the Committee of the Whole House tomorrow.

Mr. T. also reported back to the House, from the same committee, without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act to regulate enlistments into the army and navy;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. GOGGIN, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William Glover, and the petition of the inhabitants of Virginia, in relation to the employment of laborers at Fort Monroe; and that said petitions do lie on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back to the House, with amendments, Senate bill entitled "An act to make new provisions respecting navy Pensions; which was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. A. also, from the same committee, made a report in the case of Lieut. Thos. O. Selfridge; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. A. also reported, from the same committee, a bill fixing the pay of officers of the revenue cutter service while co-operating with the naval service of the United States; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. A. also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the bill for the relief of Robert Ramsay: referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY,

Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the petition of Commodore James Barron upon the subject of a prow ship; also from the petition of naval surgeons; and that the said petitions do lie on the table.

Mr. CUSHING, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 9th of March last, on the subject of tonnage duties on Spanish vessels in the ports of the United States, reported a bill concerning the tonnage duties on Spanish vessels; which was twice read, and committed to the Committee on the state of the Union.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of William D. Jones; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. C. also, from the same committee, made two reports on the memorial of Alphonzo F. A. Blake, representative of Wm. Carmichael, formerly Charge d'Affaires of the United States in Spain; which were committed to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. PICKENS submitted to the House a translation of a note from the Minister of Spain to the Secretary of State, in relation to the affair of the Spanish schooner L'Amistad: laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The morning hour having expired,

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. PICKENS requested Mr. JONES to suspend the motion, to enable him to report back the joint resolution from the Senate, in relation to the disposition of the presents from the Imaum of Muscat to the President of the United States.

Mr. P. accompanied his request with a remark or two, of which the Reporter could hear nothing.

Mr. JONES said, that as the resolution would come up in the morning hour of to-morrow, he must decline to waive his motion.

And the House then passed to the orders of the day.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to extend for the term of two years the charters of the several banks in the District of Columbia.

The question immediately pending was on the third branch of the amendment to the amendment of Mr. M. A. COOPER, which provided that from and after the 1st of June next, no notes should be issued by said banks of a less denomination than 50 dollars

And the question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 83, nays 106, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Bell, Blackwell, Botts, Briggs, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Chinn, Clark, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Dana, Davee, Davies, John Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dennis, Dellet, Earl, Edwards, Everett, James Garland, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hammond, John Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, Jackson, James, Jenifer, Wm. Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, McCarty, McCulloch, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Montanya, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Newhard, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Paynter, Peck, Pope, Randolph, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Stuart, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, John White, Thomas Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—106.

So the third branch of the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on the fourth branch of the amendment to the amendment, namely, the proviso that the notes of the said banks should at all times be redeemable in specie; or that, on failure thereof, the charters should be forfeited.

And the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 76, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Botts, Briggs, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Henry, Hoffman, Holmes, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Truman Smith, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Ed. D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, J. L. Williams, and C. H. Williams—76.

So the fourth branch of the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then on the last portion of Mr. COOPER's amendment to the amendment of PETRIKIN, in the words following, viz:

"And be it further enacted, That in case the said banks, or either of them, shall refuse or fail to pay their notes in specie on demand of any person, such person shall and may have remedy by judgment and execution at law, at a notice of ten days before any justice of the peace of said District."

The question was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Gerry, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of N. C., Holleman, Hook, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, N. Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Ogle, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Barnard, Bell, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Cranston, Crockett, Cross, Edward Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Galbraith, Garland, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Grinnell, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hubbard, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Petrikin, Rayner, Reed, Rhett, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Truman Smith, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wothington—76.

So the last branch of the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER inquired whether it was in order now to offer an amendment.

The CHAIR replied that it was not, the previous question having been called.

Mr. CARTER asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following amendment, which was read for information:

Provided, also, That said banks shall not be required to resume specie payments until the banks of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, shall have resumed.

Objection was made.

The question then recurred on the original amendment, (offered by Mr. PETRIKIN) It provides so to amend the bill as to make the president and directors of each of said banks, jointly and severally, in their individual capacity, liable for all notes issued, or debts contracted by said banks respectively, from and after the day this act goes into effect; that any president and directors making such dividend should, in their individual capacities, be liable for double the amount thereof on being sued, etc., that no dividend should be made during the suspension of specie payments; and, also, that the jurisdiction of justices of the peace be extended to all actions against said banks for any amount not exceeding one hundred dollars.

A division of the question was ordered.

Mr. F. THOMAS hoped the House would indulge him with the permission to say a word of explanation on this amendment.

Objection was made by several voices.

Mr. ADAMS called for a division of the question.

And the question was then taken on the first branch of the amendment, in the following words: Provided, also, That the president and directors of each of said banks shall be jointly and severally, in their individual capacity, liable for all notes issued or debts contracted by said banks respectively, from and after the day this act goes into effect, to be recovered as other debts of like amount may at the time be by law recoverable, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 90, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Beirne, Bell, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, Carroll, Carter, Chinn, Clark, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Cross, Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Gates, Goggin, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Kemble, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, McCulloch, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Morgan, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Randolph, Rayner, Reed, Rhett, Ridgway, Russel, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stuart, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Watterson, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—90.

So this branch of the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the next branch of the amendment, in these words:

"And be it further provided, That said banks shall not make any dividends during the time the said banks shall refuse to pay all their liabilities in specie on demand;" and it was passed in the affirmative—ayes 145, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Jugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Briggs, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, Connor, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, Davies, John Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dellet, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Gates, Gerry, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Griffin, Habersham, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Holleman, Hook, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, Jameson, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kempshall, Kille, Leadbeter, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Marvin, Mason, Miller, Morgan, Naylor, Newhard, Ogle, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw

Simonton, Slade, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumpter, Swearingen, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Watterson, Weller, John White, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and J. T. H. Worthington—145.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnard, Botts, William O. Butler, Carroll, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Edwards, Everett, Holmes, James, Jenifer, McCarty, Mitchell, Nisbet, Pope, Reed, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Waddy Thompson, Toland, Wagner, Edward D. White, and Christopher H. Williams—25.

So the second branch of the amendment was agreed to.

The question was next on the third member of said amendment, being so much as was contained in these words:

"And the president and directors of any of said banks, who shall make any such division of profits, or declare any such dividends, or consent to or vote for the same, shall be liable to pay double the amount of the sum so divided or declared, to be recovered of them in their individual capacity, by any person suing for the same, as debts of like amount are recoverable; one half of said forfeiture to go to the person suing, and the other half to the corporation where the said bank is located.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That justices of the peace within the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction in all actions of debt against any of the banks whose charters are hereby extended, for sums not exceeding one hundred dollars; and no appeal, certiorari, or injunction, shall be allowed, granted, issued, or directed by any court within said District, unless an affidavit be first made and filed in said court by the president or one or more of the directors of the bank so sued, that such an appeal, certiorari, or injunction is not asked for the purpose of delay, but because he or they believe there is a just defence on the merits, and that injustice is likely to be done if said appeal, certiorari, or injunction should not be granted."

The question was taken on the above branch, and it was agreed to by—yeas 94, nays 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Wm. R. Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, J. Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of N. C. Holleman, Hook, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Robinson, E. Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, J. W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and Worthington—94.

NAYS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, J. W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Cranston, Cross, Edw. Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fisher, J. Garland, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Va. Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Wm. C. Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Mallory, Mason, Morgan, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stuart, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, P. J. Wagner, Warren, E. D. White, J. White, Thos. W. Williams, and C. H. Williams—78.

So the last branch of Mr. PETRIKIN's amendment was agreed to.

And the question then recurring on the adoption of the amendment as amended—

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON (on leave) moved to lay the bill on the table. He should regard the vote on this motion, he said, as a test vote; and he had submitted in order that he might, if the motion prevailed, introduce the bill heretofore reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia of this House, to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia to the 4th of March next, and until further legislation provided that the said banks resume specie payments when a majority of the banks of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, should do so.

Mr. TURNEY then gave notice that he should object to the introduction of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON thereupon said, that as it would require a vote of two-thirds to get in the bill, and as he had no hope of success in such an effort, he would withdraw his motion to lay the present bill on the table.

And the question again recurring on the adoption of the amendment as amended—

Mr. McKAY asked such a division of the question as would embrace Mr. M. A. COOPER's proposition to restrict the issue of notes to a denomination of not less than $10, and to cause the charters to be forfeited on refusal or failure to pay specie.

Mr. ANDREWS submitted that the question of the adoption of the amendment, as amended, could not be divided.

The CHAIR decided that it could.

Mr. ANDREWS appealed from the decision.

Mr. GRAVES asked the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The House was here in a great state of confusion.

The CHAIR said he would call gentlemen by their names unless they took their seats, and he was responded to by several voices, "do it, do it."

Something like order having, in a few moments, been restored,

The CHAIR stated the ground of his decision, that a division of an amendment, as amended, could be ordered.

Some conversation took place on a point of order between the CHAIR and Mr. GRAVES.

Mr. ANDREWS wished to be informed what would be the effect if the House were to negative the amendment as amended, after having once agreed to it.

The CHAIR said the effect would be that that part of the amendment as amended would not be agreed to.

And the question, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?" was then taken, and decided (by tellers) in the affirmative—ayes 94, noes 31.

So the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

The CLERK having then again read the division, called for by Mr. KCKAY,

Mr. GRAVES, under the decision recently made, called for a division on every distinct branch of the amendment as amended; and the CHAIR ordered it.

And the CHAIR announced the first branch to be on that part of the amendment, as amended, which was in the following words, viz:

"Provided, That said banks shall not issue notes under ten dollars."

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and it was agreed to—yeas 96, nays 76, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Burke, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, John Hill of North Carolina, Holleman, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leet, Leonard, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Reynolds, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—96.

NAYS—Messrs Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Clark, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, Hawes, Henry, John Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Randolph, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stuart, Swearingen, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Underwood, Wagner, Warren, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—76.

So this branch of the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIR announced the question to be on the fifth branch of the amendment as amended in the following words, viz:

"Provided, also, That their notes at all times shall be redeemable by specie, or on failure thereof their charters shall be forfeited."

The question was taken on the adoption of this branch, and agreed to—yeas 101, nays 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, S. H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Craig, Crary, Cross, Dana, Davee, J. Davis, Doan, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Ogle, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Prentiss, Rayner, Reynolds, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Clark, Wm. R. Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, E. Davies, G. Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, James Garland, Goggin, Graham, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stuart, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—73.

So this branch of the amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the sixth member of the said amendment, being the proviso, that, in case the said banks should refuse to pay specie on demand, persons so concerned should have remedy by judgment and execution at law, on ten days' notice, before any justice of the peace of said District.

Mr. HOLLEMAN hoped the yeas and nays would be dispensed with. They had already been taken on these various propositions.

Mr. MORGAN hoped that the decision which had been made would be carried out.

The CHAIR said that, by general consent, the yeas and nays might be dispensed with.

Mr. OGLE objected.

And the question being taken on the above amendment, the vote stood—yeas 88, nays 70, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Banks, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Carter, Chinn, Clark, Cranston, Crockett, Cross, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Galbraith, James Garland, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hawes, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Kemble, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, Monroe, Morgan, Ogle, Palen, Peck, Petrikin, Pope, Randolph, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Truman Smith, Stuart, Francis Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—70.

So the last branch was agreed to.

And the question next recurring was on ordering the amendments to be engrossed, and the bill to a third reading.

Mr. TILLINGHAST sent the following amendment to the Clerk's table. It was read for information, but declared out of order, the previous question having been ordered:

"Provided, however, That the new provisions, penalties, and forfeitures herein enacted, in relation to the payment of specie on notes and obligations of said banks now outstanding, shall be in force from and after the first day of October next, and not before; but, in the mean time, the said banks shall be, in all respects, subject to the existing laws, and to all the other provisions of their respective charters, providing remedies in case of the non-performance of any contract or obligation."

So the question again recurring on ordering the amendments—

Mr. CUSHING asked to be excused from voting, and proceeded to assign his reasons why he could not vote either on one side or the other.

In doing so, he was interrupted by Messrs. CLIFFORD, VANDERPOEL, and TURNEY, on the ground that he was making an argument, and not assigning brief verbal reasons as prescribed by the rule.

Mr. C. insisted on his privilege. Some little confusion followed on the question of order.

And the CHAIR had just expressed the opinion that Mr. CUSHING was going to the extreme of his privilege—that the CHAIR had not thus far, however, felt constrained to interpose, but hoped tha the gentleman would not extend his remarks,

When several gentlemen having given notice that it was now half past two o'clock,

The House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess the House met, and the pending question being whether Mr. CUSHING was or was not in order in the remarks he had made just before the recess—

Mr. CLIFFORD insisted that the Chair should pronounce its decision.

The CHAIR, (occupied temporarily by Mr. BRIGGS, after some conversation, decided Mr. CUSHING to have been out of order.

Whereupon Mr. CLIFFORD objected to Mr. CUSHING proceeding without leave of the Honse.

Mr. CUSHING took an appeal; but, after a good deal of desultory conversation, consented to withdraw his appeal, and to forego his intention of proceeding further in his remarks.

The question then recurring on the engrossment of the bill and amendments for a third reading—

Mr. CHINN moved a call of the House; but the previous question having been ordered, the CHAIR decided the motion not to be in order.

The amendments having, at the request of Mr. ADAMS, been again read,

Mr. LINN BOYD moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table; but afterwards withdrew the motion.

Mr. LINCOLN took an appeal from the CHAIR'S decision that a call was not in order; but after a discussion on order, the decision of the CHAIR was sustained—yeas 105, nays 34.

The question on the third reading of the bill again recurring, it was decided by yeas and nays—yeas 69, nays 90, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Blackwell, Carter, Chapman, Chinn, Crabb, Craig, Crary, Davies, John Davis, Duncan, Earl, Ely, Everett, Fine, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Griffin, Grinnell, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hoffman, Hook, Hunt, Jackson, James, Charles Johnston, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, McCarty, McCulloch, McKay, Marvin, Montanya, Naylor, Newhard, Parrish, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Thomas Smith, Strong, Swearingen, Francis Thomas, Tillinghast, Triplett, Trumbull, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Wagner, and Thomas W. Williams—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Biddle, Boyd, Briggs, A. G. Brown, Burke, Calhoun, Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Cranston, Crockett, Cross, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Doan, Dromgoole, Eastman, Edwards, Fisher, Floyd, Gates, Gentry, Gerry, Goggin, Green, Hawkins, Henry, Hillen, Holleman, Hopkins, Jameson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kempshall, Kille, King, Lincoln, Lucas, McClellan, Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Miller, Morgan, S. W. Morris, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Peck, Ramsey, Rariden, Reynolds, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Simonton, Starkweather, Steenrod, Stuart, Sumter, Taylor, Waddy Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Weller, John White, Wick, Henry Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and John T. H. Worthington—90.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON asked leave to introduce a bill from the Committee for the District, to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi objected.

Mr. JOHNSON moved for the suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. KEIM moved to lay this motion on the table; but soon after withdrew the motion.

The question then recurring on suspending the rules, it was decided by yeas 94 and nays 86, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Beirne, Bell, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Cross, Cushing, Edward Davies, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Everett, Fisher, James Garland, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Graham, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johkson, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Robinsen, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stuart, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Carr, Casey, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Craig, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Taylor, Jacob Thompson, Turney, David D. Wagener, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—86.

There not being two thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. HOLLEMAN wished to make a statement.

Mr. PROFFIT objected.

Mr. HOLLEMAN moved to suspend the rules to introduce a new bill extending the charter of the banks for two years, for the sole purpose of winding up their affairs, and restricting the banks from doing any thing else.

The question being put, the yeas and nays stood as follows—yeas 155, nays 18.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. HOLLEMAN having slightly modified his bill, it was read the first time, as follows:

A BILL to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia for certain purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the provisions, restrictions, and enactments of the act of Congress of the 25th May, 1838, entitled "an act to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia," be, and the same are hereby extended to the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank of Washington; the Bank of the Potomac and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria; Provided, That whenever in the original act the 1st of July, 1838, occurs, it shall be so construed as to mean the 4th of July 1840; and whenever the 1st of July, 1842, occurs, it shall be construed to mean the 4th of July, 1844.

Mr. ADAMS inquired whether it made no distinction in favor of the Patriotic Bank, which never had susdended specie payments?

Mr. HOLLEMAN replied that it did not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD gave notice of his intention to offer the following amendment in case the bill of Mr. HOLLEMAN should not meet with favor:

"That the several acts of Congress creating and granting charters to the several banks in the District of Columbia which were in force on the 1st day of July, 1840, be, and the same are hereby, continued in full force for the term of two years from and after the 4th day of July, 1840: Provided, however, That no one of the existing banks shall declare or make any dividend of its profits among its stockholders during the time it fails to pay specie for its notes: And provided, further, That all the profits hereafter made by any one of the said banks over and above six per cent. upon its capital, clear of expenses, shall be paid over to the corporate authorities of the city in which such bank is located: And provided, further, That said banks shall severally resume the payment of specie for their notes thrown into circulation, within ninety days from the said 4th of July, 1840."

Mr. McKAY proposed another scheme. Its general outline was to continue the corporate existence of the banks to the 1st of January next, they not to exceed their present amount of discounts previous to that time, and after then to make no new loans, and after the 4th of March to emit no bills.

Mr. THOMAS suggested sundry objections to Mr. HOLLEMAN'S bill, and suggested the adoption of a bill exactly similar to that under which the affairs of the Union Bank of Georgetown were wound up.

Mr. HOLLEMAN, after a brief reply, moved the previous question.

The call was seconded, 80 to 61, put, and carried.

And the question being on the second reading of the bill,

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the substitute quoted above.

Mr. CLIFFORD demanded the previous question.

But the House refused to second the call—ayes 67, noes 68.

Mr. THOMAS then moved to amend the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD, by inserting the bill for winding up the affairs of the Union Bank of Georgetown, the names and dates alone being altered, suggesting that it would be best at once to make a final settlement of the whole question.

Mr. DAWSON protested against the whole proceeding, and contended that it was nothing but an indirect mode of destroying the State banks. He concluded by moving a reference of the whole subject to a select committee.

Mr. VANDERPOEL replied with much warmth and sincerity. His remarks will be given in full hereafter.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON addressed the House at length, giving his reasons why he could not vote for either of the amendments. He concluded by demanding the previous question; but, finding that this would cut off Mr. DAWSON'S motion to commit, withdrew it.

Mr. VANDERPOEL replied to Mr. DAWSON with much warmth.

Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia obtained the floor, but yielded it temporarily at the request of Mr. UNDERWOOD, who slightly modified his amendment.

Mr. HOLLEMAN gave notice that, having examined the substitute proposed by Mr. THOMAS, he entirely approved of it, and would, in consequence, withdraw the amendment he had before proposed.

Mr. ADAMS remonstrated on putting the specie-paying and non-specie paying banks on the same footing.

Mr. DAWSON withdrew his motion to commit to a select committee.

Mr. HOPKINS then made a speech warmly remonstrating against the destruction of the District banks, and thereby oppressing and ruining persons who were unrepresented and without remedy.

Mr. WELLER of Ohio obtained the floor, but yielded to a motion by Mr. PETRIKIN for an adjournment.

Mr. MORGAN demanded the yeas and nays, which, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 83, nays 73.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 3, 1840.

The Senate was called to order by the Secretary, and immediately proceeded to ballot for a President pro tempore.

The ballots having been counted, it appeared that

The whole number of votes given was -	29
Of which Mr. KING received - -	23
Scattering, - - - -	6

Mr. KING, having received a majority of the whole number of votes given, was declared duly elected President of the Senate pro tem.

Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. KNIGHT having conducted Mr. KING to the chair, he addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate: Observation and experience have convinced me that, so long as this body continues to be distinguished, as heretofore, by order and regularity in its proceedings, and by decorum in debate, the presiding officer will have no difficult task to perform. Under these impressions, I enter upon the discharge of the duties you have been kind enough to devolve on me. I shall endeavor as far as possible to discharge these duties faithfully; I know that I will discharge them honestly. My earnest desire is to do justice to all, and preserve order, should it ever be unfortunately departed from; but I shall endeavor to preserve it in a manner least offensive to any individual member. Should I at any time fall into error, these errors will, I trust, meet with the kind indulgence of the Senate, and that I shall constantly receive the aid and assistance of every honorable Senator, in the discharge of the duties to which I am called. Should I receive that, I have no doubt that they will be discharged satisfactorily. I tender you my sincere thanks for the honor you have conferred upon me.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement of the number and designation of passengers arriving in each collection district of the United States, from foreign countries, during the last year.

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, the report of the Committee on Pensions, in the case of Wilfred Knott, was recommitted to said committee.

The resolution submitted by Mr. RUGGLES on Wednesday, requesting the President of the United States to communicate a copy of the British report and survey on the subject of the Northeastern boundary, was taken up for consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN hoped that the Senator who introduced this resolution would permit it to lie over until Monday. In the mean time he would procure the map and document from the committee on Foreign Relations of the House, to which it had been transmitted after examination by the committee of the Senate, when it would be accessible to the Senator from Maine and every other Senator of the body. The delicacy of adopting the resolution consisted in this: whether we should publish in this country, and by the order of this body, a document which had been transmitted to the Executive of this country from a feeling of courtesy by the British Government, before it had been published or even transmitted to Parliament by that Government.

Mr. RUGGLES said he did not ask the adoption of this resolution for his own gratification, but he considered it a matter of vital importance to his State, and one on which they had a right to have all the informa ion in our power to give.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied that it was no secret communication at all; but it was a document which the British Government said that they had not yet laid before Parliament, nor taken any action upon; and it was communicated to us in that way simply as an act of courtesy. He did not know that there would be any great objection to laying it before the Senate; but he spoke with knowledge when he said that many times, and oft, the Government of the United States had been prevented from receiving important information from its agents abroad, because of the knowlede that it would be made public. Now in this case he would communicate this document to the gentleman with the greatest pleasure; it had already been communicated to the committee of the other House, and he should have every opportunity to examine it. Mr. B. hoped that the resolution would be laid on the table until Monday.

Mr. ALLEN said there was a manifest impropriety in adopting this resolution, especially as the action of the Senate, even so far, on this map and report, would give them a sort of sanction which ought not to be given them, while it was known that they had not been accepted by the British Government, and no intimation had been given that they would be adhered to. Mr. A. therefore moved to lay the resolution finally on the table; but, on its being observed that Mr. BUCHANAN had left the Senate, and might wish to say something further on the subject on Monday, Mr. A. withdrew his motion, and,

Mr. RUGGLES assenting, the resolution was accordingly laid on the table until Monday.

The resolution submitted some days since by Mr. WALKER, for the appointment of a select committee to take into consideration the propriety of appointing Reporters for the Senate, was taken up.

Mr. WALKER said that, since offering this Resolution, he had obtained some information as regards reporting in the French Chamber of Deputies, and more especially as regards the British Parliament. He found that the cost of each Reporter varied from five to about eight guineas a week, and consequently the cost would be much less than he had supposed when he last addressed the Senate. He had no doubt that the services of competent reporters could be obtained at a cost not exceeding the per diem of a member of Congress for each, and that four of them would be enough to make full reports of the debates. He thought it would do no harm, at all events, to refer this inquiry to a select committee, and he hoped that no objection would be made to that course.

The resolution was agreed to, and Messrs. WALKER, LUMPKIN, PIERCE, SMITH of Indiana, and HUNTINGTON were appointed the committee.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

The joint resolution submitted by Mr. NORVELL, fixing the day for the meeting of the next session of Congress, being taken up,

Mr. NORVELL said that he had asked leave, some time ago, to introduce this bill. The subject of a general revision of the tariff would come up at the next session of Congress. The session would, he apprehended, be too short to enable us to act upon such an important measure with sufficient maturity of judgment and deliberation to secure the establishment of a system of duties and imposts satisfactory to all parts of the Union, and reconciling the revenue purposes of a tariff with the individual protection which may be afforded by it to manufactures requiring protection. It was under these impressions that he had submitted the bill: but he knew that sectional objections existed to an earlier meeting of Congress than the first Monday of December. Southern gentlemen (cotton planters) were unwilling to leave their homes in the midst of gathering in their crops. He should, therefore, not press the passage of the bill.

Mr. CALHOUN said, as a Southern planter, it would be exceedingly inconvenient for him to come here earlier than December. Every person acquainted with their business knows that the month of October and early part of November are the busiest portion of the year to the cotton planter. From the lateness of the period at which Congress would adjourn, the recess, even under the present arrangement, would be necessarily a brief one. He hoped, therefore, that the Senator from Michigan would consent that this resolution should be laid upon the table; which was accordingly done.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The bill to establish and regulate the navy ration was taken up as in committee of the whole, and after being explained by Mr. WILLIAMS, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Hugh Stewart was taken up as in committee of the whole, and after being explained by Mr. HUBBARD, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill authorizing the inhabitants of fractional township ten south, of range one east, in the State of Arkansas, to enter one half section of land for school purposes, after some explanation by Mr. FULTON, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of Don Carlos Dehault Delassus, late Spanish Lieutenant Governor of the fort and district of Baton Rouge, in West Florida, was, on motion of Mr. NORVELL, indefinitely postponed.

The bill relative to the transportation of the mail in steamboats, was explained by Mr. ROBINSON, and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of James Herron was explained by Mr. STRANGE, and ordered to be engrossed.

The act from the House for the relief of Captain John Downes, after being explained by Mr. HUBBARD, was ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the act from the House for the relief of John Mitchell and B. F. Fox was taken up, and after explanation by Mr. H. was ordered to a third reading.

An act from the House to annex a certain tract of land to the Coosa land district, was ordered to a third reading.

An act from the House allowing further time to the trustees of Centre College to dispose of the land heretofore granted to the deaf and dumb asylum in the State of Kentucky, was taken up, and after being explained by Mr. WALKER, was ordered to a third reading.

An act from the House granting a section of land for the use of schools in St. Clair county, State of Illinois, was considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to a third reading.

An act from the House granting two townships of land for the use of the University in the Territory of Iowa, was taken up, and explained by Messrs. WALKER AND NORVELL, and, after a discussion, in which Messrs. FULTON, STRANGE, DAVIS, CALHOUN, CLAY of Alabama, and HUBBARD, participated, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws in the collection of duties on imports, the question still being on Mr. HUNTINGTON'S amendment, declaring any witness incompetent who should have any interest in the cause similar to that of the party for whom he might testify, which was discussed at length by Messrs. HUNTINGTON, WRIGHT, and HENDERSON.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama asked that a bill now on the SECRETARY'S table to prolong the corporate existence of the banks of the District, should be taken up.

The CHAIR suggested that there was a bill already before the Senate which must be first disposed of.

Mr. WRIGHT said if the object was merely to refer the bill to a committee, he would not object; but if it was to interfere with the bill on the collection of the revenue, he was against it.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said that if the bill was not acted on to-day, there would be no use in passing it, as the charters of the banks would expire by limitation at 12 o'clock to-night. He would therefore move to lay the bill now before the Senate on the table; which was agreed to—ayes 23, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Mouton, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, White, and Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, and Wright—11.

The bill was then taken up, read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said it was very clear to his mind, that it was due to the people of this District that some bill of the kind should be passed. The Senate had already passed one bill that had been rejected in the other House, and this one, more severe in its restrictions on the banks, had been sent in its stead. As this was the day in which the charters of these institutions expired, and the last day on which the legislation of Congress could be of any effectual service to them, he hoped there would be no objection to passing the bill through at once. He therefore moved that it have its second reading now.

Mr. WRIGHT observed that it would require the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN objected. He could not give his consent to the charter of suspended banks. He was unwilling to legalize their violations of the laws.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama asked if the rule could not be suspended.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said there was one way, and that was, to suspend the rule (which he maintained was no more than a rule) which required one day's notice for a resolution to alter the rules; and he would submit it to the Senator from Alabama whether he was not warranted in this case in resorting to that expedient.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the Senator from Kentucky misunderstood him if he supposed that he had any especial charge of this business. He thought it however very extraordinary that any individual member could defeat an important measure, and he would accordingly move to suspend the rule.

Mr. ALLEN was understood to ask if that motion was in order.

The PRESIDENT decided that in his opinion it was not in order. He thought any rule could not be suspended without one day's notice.

Mr. WALKER said that in no case had the rule ever been suspended but by unanimous consent. The Senator from Missouri would recollect a case in the session of 1832 3 in which he (Mr. W.) and that Senator were much interested in getting a bill through the Senate in order that it might be sent to the President that day, and the rule was enforced on them. He recollected that it was objected to by one Senator (a Senator from North Carolina, not now a member of the Senate) and he then attempted to make the same motion that is now pending, but was ruled to be out of order. Finally, upon an appeal made by the Senator from Missouri to the Senator from North Carolina, the objection was withdrawn. It was in that way, and that way only, that the bill was brought before the Senate. Not a member of the Senate hazarded the opinion that the object could be reached by appealing from the decision of the CHAIR.

The PRESIDENT read the rule requiring that each bill should receive three several readings, and on three different days, unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate. It was also, he said, the opinion of the CHAIR that a motion to suspend a rule must lie over, though the contrary, he admitted, was not without precedent.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky maintained that, by the Constitution, each House had power to make its own rules, and that none of these rules could at any time be beyond the power of the body.

The PRESIDENT said that, in the present case, he had decided that it was so.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said, if the CHAIR decided that it was not in the immediate power of the Senate to change any one of its rules, he now, though with great reluctance, appealed to the Senate from that decision.

Mr. C. after some further remarks, subsequently wrote down his appeal, stating, in substance, that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] moved to suspend the rule which was thought to require a day's notice of any alteration in the rules, and also to suspend that further rule which required the three readings of a bill on three different days, unless by unanimous consent; that the CHAIR decided that this motion was not in order; and on this decision the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] took an appeal.

Mr. WRIGHT had no strong feeling on the subject before them. He did not desire to be captious in legislation; but he wished the Senate to look at the situation in which it was placed. A new bill, and one complicated in its provisions, came from the House of Representatives, adopting former legislation as a part of its substance; and what were they told? Why, that that bill was to become one of the laws of the United States this day, or the most serious consequences, which gentlemen feelingly portrayed, must ensue. Now he would ask gentlemen in the spirit of candor, if it was expected or believed that a bill of this kind could take its second reading, pass into committee of the whole, be discussed, amended, ordered to a third reading, (and let it be remembered that when it comes to a third reading the same difficulty will occur as now) and go back to the other House, be enrolled, sent to the President of the United States, and returned by him with his signature, all in one day? Had any Senator believed that all this could be preformed between this time and twelve o'clock to-night, in the face of a fair, intelligent, and determined, though not a captious opposition? He could not believe it, and he begged the Senate not to wipe out its rules with such little promise of utility. He knew that many members of the Senate were anxious, and honestly so, for the passage of the bill. For himself, he differed with them. He did not believe in the abatement of suits when the clock strikes twelve to-night. He appealed to the Senate to say whether it was worth while to try to run these bills through in so hurried a manner. We know and see, continued Mr. W. that it cannot be run through unresisted. There was an opposition, though small, here, to a certain class of these institutions, but there was none to a different class of them. In reference to such a law as would save all the rights of these corporations, and enable them to wind up their affairs, he knew there would be no opposition to it. But in opposition to that legislation which would continue to them the power to discount upon irredeemable paper, there was a small but determined minority. He believed they could not make that bill a law to-night, if they were to wipe out every rule of the Senate; and a failure of one minute to them would be as fatal as the failure of a month. Then, said Mr. W. let us look at this matter coolly. Let us act on it as a legislative body should—act liberally and rightfully, but let us act with due deliberation.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he wished to submit a few remarks in reply to the Senator from New York. In regard to the effect on these corporations, if they are not renewed, every lawyer must be familiar with it. Are these like natural persons? No. They are created to exist for a certain period, and that existence, by limitation, terminates on to-morrow. How then can there be any doubt that all their powers, as a corporate body, will terminate with their corporate existence? There is no law to extend them for the collection of their debts, or any other purpose whatever. He was willing, however, to meet the Senator in that spirit of courtesy, for which he was happy to say he was distinguished. But did not even that Senator's own statement show the necessity for doing something, and he wished to see the sense of the Senate taken, whether they were disposed to continue their charters for any purpose whatever. If restricted to winding up their affairs, be it so; but let the sense of the Senate be taken. He had as little interest personally in this matter as any other Senator. He was not a stockholder in any bank of this District, or elsewhere; nor had he any thing to gain, or lose, personally, by the result, whatever it might be.

Mr. C. said, he was satisfied the prevailing banking system was wrong in principle—it required reformation—and on a proper occasion, he would unite with other gentlemen, as far as might be in his power, to produce the necessary reform. He thought, however, that the present moment—in the midst of unusual pressure and embarrassment—was wholly inauspicious to any radical reform. He said, let the difficulties of the present times pass by, and our accustomed prosperity return, and he would be ready to act.

Mr. C. said the present bill merely proposed to continue the existence of the present banks of the District, temporarily—expressly retaining the power in Congress to terminate their powers and privileges, whenever it might be deemed proper. Let it pass, and take up the subject, even at the next session, if gentlemen thought proper, and Mr. C. would acquiesce. But let us not hazard the consequences of putting an abrupt termination to the existence of all these institutions, at the same moment, without even the power to wind up their affairs.

Mr. TAPPAN observed that the appeal taken by the Senator from Kentucky was attempted to be supported from the urgency of the case. It was said that great injury would be done by adhering to the letter of the rules of former practice; and it was gravely stated here by men who professed to be lawyers, that the suits now pending between these several banks and other parties will be abated, unless this or some similar bill passes. The proposition was here advanced that a suit at law, by or against a corporation, legally and properly in court, and there pending, would be abated by the expiration of the time for which the charter was given. Now this was a new proposition, for which the gentleman could produce no authority. He had produced no instance of such abatement, nor could he produce any. The only instance in which a suit abates while pending, is by the act of the parties; such, for instance, as the marriage of a feme covert, when she abates it voluntarily. But as to corporations, he undertook to say, that suits in which they were concerned did not abate, and that the Senator was not supported by any authority in saying that they did. Then if no such consequence would follow their omission to act upon this bill to-day, why did Senators press it in this very unusual manner, as even to urge upon the body a disregard of its rules? Why might not this bill take the usual course? Was it of so much importance that these charters should be continued, that the rules under which the Senate had been acting for so many years should be sponged out? There was a majority of the Senate in favor of continuing them, and a majority might resuscitate them, if they expired to-night. He thought the minority had a right to require bills to be read three times, on three several days, in order that they might not be passed without sufficient deliberation; and in this case particularly, a law with such complicated provisions should not be hurried through in the manner proposed. There was no necessity for it, and he hoped that it would not be done.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana here called Mr. TAPPAN to order, for digressing from the question immediately before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT said, the question simply was: "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the order of the Senate?" This was the simple question to be discussed; but he had not interrupted the Senator from Ohio, because other gentlemen had taken the same latitude in debate.

Mr. TAPPAN. Then if we are not to go into the why and wherefore we should rescind these rules, the whole debate is out of order. Every man looking at the rules must see that the decision of the CHAIR is correct.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky wished to make a few remarks in reply to the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT.] The Senator, whose course in debate was always characterized by courtesy and decorum, had not confined himself as closely as he usually does to the question before the Senate. What we will do with this bill when it is taken up, is a question behind and beyond the one now before us. What we have to decide is the simple question of an appeal from the decision of the CHAIR; and he begged Senators to notice that that was a question between the rules of the Senate and the Constitution of the United States. The rules of the Senate were simply adopted for the government of the body. He agreed with the CHAIR that they were a barrier for the protection of the rights of the minority; and he was glad to see him and other presiding officers rallying in defence of the rights of the minority. From the circumstances of the case, however, one day's notice could not be given in the present instance: the necessity had arisen within two hours. He had no doubt whatever of the power of the Senate to suspend or alter their rules at pleasure, and thought the present one of the cases which would justify the exercise of it.

Mr. CALHOUN earnestly opposed the suspension of the rule. It was the most important of their rules; and if it was not adhered to, they would be left to the mere discretion of the majority, for the time being.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut would make but a single remark. Much stress has been laid upon the power possessed by us to change our rules. Now he would like to know what a rule was good for if at any moment it could be got rid of by the vote of a majority? What is it worth if at any time it can be wiped out and expunged from our records? We all know that a majority governs in deliberative bodies, and the only protection that a minority has from the impulses of the majority, is the rules that have been adopted for their government; and if these rules are to be subject to the will of the majority they are without any defence whatever.

Mr. LINN recollected the case mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi, and it was one in which he and that gentleman took a deep interest. Mr. Mangum of North Carolina objected to the suspension of the rules, and he believed there was not an individual present who believed that it could be done except by unanimous consent. The deep interest felt in the subject by the people of his State induced him to make an appeal to the Senator from North Carolina, which had the effect of inducing him to withdraw his objections.

Some remarks were here made by the CHAIR and Messrs. WRIGHT, CLAY of Kentucky, and MOUTON, respecting the form in which the motion was put, when Mr. CLAY having modified it,

Mr. WRIGHT said he was willing to test the question on the resolution as now submitted by the Senator, though it varied from that which he first offered. By a rule of the Senate all motions must lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the rule is dispensed with.

Mr. DAVIS said he was as little disposed as any one to needlessly change useful rules, but he considered the present a case of emergency. He thought that the Senator from New York had hit the marrow of the matter in his last remarks. The 26th rule says, that resolutions when submitted, must lie one day before they can be acted on. But was a mere motion to amend the rules a resolution within the meaning of the term, as contended for by the Senator from New York, and as implied by the decision of the CHAIR? He differed in opinion with both the Senators, and considered it no more a resolution than the motion to take up a bill or amend a bill which is before us, which are made and acted on instanter. Holding this opinion, he felt at perfect liberty to vote for suspending the rules.

Mr. STRANGE said he would vote to support the decision of the CHAIR. It had been asserted that there was no rule bearing upon the motion to suspend the rule, requiring any two several readings of a bill to take place on two several days, except by unanimous consent. It was conceded there was a rule requiring resolutions to lie over one day for consideration; but it was insisted this rule did not apply to the present motion, because it is not a resolution. The premises are wrong, (said Mr. STRANGE,) and therefore the conclusion drawn from them is unsupported. Every action of this body is a resolution. Even when you pass a bill, that action, carried out into technical parlance, is, "so it was resolved that the bill do pass." Resolution is, in fact, the only way by which a collective body can act. If, therefore, the Senate determines to suspend a rule, that determination must be expressed by resolution. The rule, therefore, that a resolution must lie over one day for consideration, interposes an insuperable obstacle to its own immediate reversal or suspension. But the high ground is assumed that the Senate derives from the Constitution power to adopt rules for its own government, and that from the same source it derives the power of altering them at pleasure. This is all true. But there are principles even above the Constitution, of which the Constitution can neither command nor authorize the violation. The great principle of fidelity to a compact solemnly made by those who have the right to make it, is one of these. When we met here at the beginning of this session, we adopted the rules lying upon our table, which were, in fact, a compact entered into by us, each with the other, that after that manner business would be conducted; and one part of the compact was that these rules should not be changed, but upon one day's notice. The Constitution, in authorizing us to make rules, gave us the power to form this compact: we have made it, and it should be held sacred.

But it is said a great public necessity exists—a pressing crisis; and that all these formal arrangements must yield to it. Sir, this is a most alarming proposal. What are rules worth? They are made to check the rashness and injustice of those who might be disposed to indulge them, in a moment of power. If they, then, are to judge when a necessity exists for dispensing with rules, this necessity will always be found simultaneously with the consciousness of their restraining influence. State necessity is the plea of tyrants; and it matters little whether tyranny is exercised by one or the many. State necessity justified Bonaparte, in the height of his power, in his own eyes, in dissolving the most sacred compact into which two human beings can enter. His example cannot in this country be followed in the fact, but it can in the principle. I hope the Senate will pause ere it sets so dangerous an example. By doing so, it "will but teach bloody instructions," which, being taught, will certainly "return to plague the inventors." Gentlemen on the other side of the House look forward to the triumph of the advocates of power; let us not leave behind us a precedent which may justify any injustice with which, in their day of power, they may think proper to visit us. I am inclined to favor the bill which came from the House; but I cannot break down a great principle to accomplish even what I think might in itself be useful.

Mr. WALL said that the question which the Senate was called on to decide, was upon the appeal of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] from the decision of the CHAIR. We are not to determine what the rule ought to be, but what it is. If the CHAIR has rightly interpreted the rule, his decision must be sustained. What is the decision appealed from? That the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] does come within the twenty-sixth rule of the Senate, which, after specifying particular resolutions, declares, "and all other resolutions shall lie on the table one day for consideration." It is now said that this is not a resolution, but a motion. The whole question depends on the accuracy of this distinction. What is a motion in parliamentary language? A motion applies to the incidental proceedings of the Senate, under the rules, in its ordinary legislative or Senatorial duties. It relates to the conduct of business, adjournments, and other incidental matters, regulated by the express rules adopted by the Senate or by general parliamentary law. It is the act of a member, and may be or may not be put to the Senate for their action. It may never reach the Senate.

A resolution, however, is the act of the Senate, designed, in its inception, for its action, and is uniform, as well as the mode by which it acts. In page 146 of the rules adopted by the Senate for their government, it is said, "facts, principles, and their own opinions and purposes, are expressed in the form of resolutions." THE SENATE CAN only act by resolution, or order. When it commands, it is called an order. No one can doubt that the object of the honorable Senator is to procure the Senate to resolve to rescind or suspend the twenty-sixth rule. We adopt rules by resolution; we suspend or rescind them in the same way. The Constitution declares that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." The Senate has determined its rules; it has determined that it shall be a rule of its proceedings that no rule shall be changed, no resolution shall be acted on, without lying "on the table one day for consideration," for examination, for deliberation, for action. It is true that we may change the rules, whenever we see proper, but we must change them according to the regulations of the rules which exist. We cannot effect it by disregarding all the rules whenever we see proper to abolish them in any way, and at any time, and the majority have an object to accomplish, that cannot be reached in any other way.

In my opinion, the decision of the CHAIR is correct. I cannot sustain the appeal. I look upon this rule as a conservative rule—conservative of the rights of the minority, and of the rights of the people. It is a barrier against impulsive legislation, always dangerous, and frequently tyrannical. There is no necessity for this precipitate action which rides triumphant over all the rules which the wisdom of the Senate has provided for its decorum and the best security of the rights of all. The banks can take care of themselves, even if their charters expire, by proper conveyances.

Mr. WALKER said: The gentlemen who are opposed to the decision of the CHAIR, perceived the position in which they were placed, and endeavored to escape from it by assuming the ground that the question before them was not a resolution. Now, he desired to know whether a resolution had not been offered by the Senator from Alabama to suspend one of the rules of the Senate. When that resolution should be acted upon, would it not be acted upon as a resolution, and when it should be entered by the Secretary, would it not be recorded as a resolution adopted by the Senate? In what other form could it appear upon the journal than as a resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama and adopted by the Senate? and not only would it appear in that form if adopted, but it could appear in no other without falsifying the journal. What is the work in which we are now engaged? We are told that we are in the exercise of one of the powers given us by the Constitution—that of making rules for the government of our proceedings. Now, can the Senate make rules except by resolution? Where are all the rules contained in the books on our tables? Were they not made by resolution? If the Senate adopts this resolution, can it change it in any other manner than in the form in which it is adopted? If the Senate declares that such and such shall be the form of its proceedings—that a bill shall be read three times on three several days before its final passage—that is a resolution of the Senate in form and manner prescribed by the Constitution, and we cannot change or nullify it except in the same manner. Why, sir, let us look at the consequences that will follow from adopting the opposite course. If you can change any one rule of the body without a resolution, you can change the whole. If you can rescind one by a resolution, you can rescind all. If you can suspend one, you can suspend all. And, sir, you cannot only change, rescind, and suspend the rules, but you can adopt new ones, and declare that it is not done by resolution. For what purpose is your presiding officer placed in his seat? It is not to make or to change rules, but to carry into execution such as he finds on the record. Well, sir, he finds that one of the rules requires that every bill passed by the body shall have been read three times on three several days; and another rule that requires each resolution that is offered to lie one day for consideration, neither of which rules can be dispensed with but by the unanimous consent of the body. Can he change these rules? If an effort is made to disregard them, what must be his decision? He must decide as he has done, for he is placed in the chair for the express purpose of carrying out the rules, and for no other. A resolution has been offered by the Senator from Alabama to change the rule which requires a bill to be read three times on three several days. This the presiding officer finds to be a resolution which, under another rule of the Senate, is required to lie one day for consideration. Is he to carry out that rule, or is he to rescind it? If a resolution, adopted by the Senate for the government of its proceedings, can be changed every day by a majority of the Senate, then we have not the power to adopt the resolution now in force—and gentlemen who contend that the rule must be disregarded, must also contend that the resolution is a violation of the Constitution. The Constitution is intended as a safeguard for the rights of the minority in many cases.

The Constitution cannot be changed but by a vote of three-fourths of the States, and one of its provisions, as to the equal representation of all the States in the Senate, can be changed only by the consent of all the States. Gentlemen say that the rule is despotic and arbitrary, because it takes power from the hands of the majority. Sir, the Constitution was intended to take power from the hands of the majority, in many cases; and the rules of the Senate were intended, in this instance, for the same purpose; and the very absence of this power on the part of the majority, and the very existence of this right on the part of the minority, was intended to preserve the liberty of the country. For what purpose was this resolution that we are now debating intended? It was intended as a safeguard for the liberty or the people—that the acts of Congress, which are to act compulsorily on the people of the whole Union, should not be hurried through without the necessary deliberation. It was intended as a safeguard for the rights and liberties of the minority that this tremendous power of making laws which are to bind the whole Union, should not be exercised in a hurried or impetuous manner. It was intended that the votes of those who are to pass these laws should be given not only with sufficient deliberation of several days, but after a full argument. He was opposed to making this change, and pointed out the dangers that would result from it just at the close of the sessions of Congress, when both Houses were thin and when bills of the most exceptionable character could thus in a few moments be rushed through both Houses of Congress. The rule was a salutary one, and should be enforced. Mr. W. said he recollected a bill in which he felt the deepest interest and on which he made this very motion to suspend the rules. Objection was made by a Senator from North Carolina, not now in his seat, and was sustained by the CHAIR, when he reluctantly withdrew his motion, believing that the bill was lost, The Senator from North Carolina, however, at the solicitation of his friend from Missouri, withdrew his motion, and the bill was suffered to be sent to the President for his signature. Well, sir, said Mr. W. learning wisdom by experience, on the 13th of October, 1837, I gave notice that I would move to suspend the rule, and on the 14th I made the motion as follows:

"Mr. WALKER submitted the following motion, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules be suspended for the remainder of the present called session.

"Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein."

Then, sir, upon that question, there was not one single Senator, as far as my knowledge extends, who believed that, without unanimous consent, the rules could be changed without the one day's notice which had been given in that case. The Senator from Missouri and myself were exceedingly anxious that this rule should be suspended to permit that particular bill to be presented to the President—yet there was not a single Senator that had a doubt of the correctness of the decision of the CHAIR.

Under these circumstances, I shall vote for sustaining the decision of the CHAIR. If there is a bill brought forward to permit these corporations to sue and be sued, (such a one as was presented by the Senator from Ohio,) I will cheerfully support it. If the object is to get up such a bill, I venture to assert that there would be no objection on this side of the chamber.

Mr. WHITE said that the rules of the Senate were adopted every session, and the same power which adopted, could modify or abrogate them at its pleasure. It had been frequently asserted in the discussion that the rules of the body were designed for the protection of the minority. This he denied. The protection thus afforded was only incidental. They were framed for the regulation of our proceedings and the guidance of our presiding officer.

Mr. ALLEN said that the charters of all these banks expired prior to the 4th of July, 1840. On the 31st day of May, 1838, the Congress of the United States extended their then unexpired charters to the 4th of July, 1840, upon three conditions: "Provided [reading from the law] that said banks, each for itself, shall conform to the following conditions." The third condition was, that they should resume specie payments on or before the first day of January, 1839, or sooner, if the principal banks of Maryland and Virginia should resume before that day. This was the condition precedent, which was not fulfilled. The banks had expired under the limitations of their charters. They could derive life from no other circumstance but by compliance with the three conditions imposed on them by Congress. There was not a lawyer in existence who, if asked whether these banks were in legal existence, would not be compelled in his conscience to answer that they were not. These things had passed over, and though the banks were notoriously in a state of suspension, and the Secretary of the Treasury had laid on their tables the statement of that fact, they came before Congress asking for more charters, and to legalize their violations of the law. Now if this bill was only for the purpose of saving and enforcing the obligations of their debtors, no objection would be made on that side of the chamber to the rapidity with which it was proposed to hurry it through both Houses of Congress; but it was proposed to do an act that the annals of no legislative body on earth furnished a parallel for, and in doing so to disregard one of the solemn rules of the Senate. If this were a question of peace or war, to defend the country from threatened invasion, greater hurry could not be made; but it was to charter banks that were existing contrary to law, to legalize their irredeemable paper, and turn them loose on the country to inflict what injuries their avarice and cupidity might devise. It was the banking feature of this bill which induced him to raise his voice to arrest its passage through the House; and he now said to its friends, that if they would present a joint resolution to give these banks any time they pleased to wind up their concerns, to save their suits from abatement, but withholding the power if issuing notes and banking, he would make no objection to it. It was to save the rights of others that he thus acted. If gentlemen were serious in their desire to save the rights of those banks, and they believed that that could only be done by passing a law to-day, let them bring forward a measure of this kind, and he would ensure its adoption.

Mr. HENDERSON said that, upon investigation, he was convinced the decision of the CHAIR was a correct one, and that the resolution must lie over one day, unless unanimous consent was given to its consideration at the present time.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he felt bound to state, that, from a further examination, he was convinced that the motion made by him was untenable, and from a sense of duty to the body he felt constrained to withdraw it. He could not, however, agree in the opinion expressed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WALL] that no injury could result to these institutions, or to the community, by not acting on this bill to-day; but however much he might deprecate the result, his sense of duty compelled him to withdraw the motion he had made.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky: Then I renew it.

Mr. TAPPAN demanded the ayes and noes.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky then modified his motion in the following words:

"A motion was made by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky to suspend the 26th rule of the Senate so far as to let the bill, entitled 'An act to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia,' receive its second and third reading to-day.

"The PRESIDENT pro tempore decided that the motion was out of order, and could not be received and acted on to-day.

"From that decision Mr. CLAY of Kentucky appealed."

Mr. WALKER begged leave to make one suggestion. The object was to continue the charters of these corporations, for the purpose of winding up their concerns, and enable them to maintain suits. Now, so far from objecting to a bill such as this, he was in favor of it. It was precisely such a resolution as was offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. TAPPAN,] and which was voted down by the adoption of a substitute. Though he had no right to speak for others, he thought he could say that if such a resolution as that should be offered, no objection would be made to it on this side of the House. Then if this great injury was to occur, of which gentlemen spoke, why not pass such a resolution now? It could be done in ten minutes. He hoped that if Senators thought that this great injury was to occur from the want of action of the Senate upon this day, they would bring forward such a resolution, and that it would be permitted to pass by unanimous consent.

Mr. NORVELL demanded the yeas and nays on the appeal; which were ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON said, as it was probable in this vote he would act in opposition to that portion of the Senate with whom he generally acted, he would state in a few words the considerations which governed his vote. He was as anxious that this bill should be taken up and acted on as any member of the Senate; but this he felt to be impracticable at the present moment. The Senate can only act by order or resolution, and resolutions are moved and seconded by individual Senators. The act of the individual is a motion, but by the action of the Senate it is a resolution, and is so entered on your journals. It was therefore palpable that the motion of the Senator from Kentucky was a resolution, within the meaning of the term, and that consequently, under the rule, it must lie over. Mr. C. proceeded to show that if the charters of these institutions were not renewed or prolonged to day, they must necessarily be defunct; and with a view of avoiding the inconvenience and distress to which such an event would subject many of the citizens of the District, he hoped the proposition of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN] could be acceded to. There was a strong disposition manifest in various parts of the Senate to carry this bill; but if there was a majority of four-fifths in its favor, it was in the power of the minority, and would certainly be defeated.

Mr. BENTON observed that he had listened with great attention to what had fallen from the several gentlemen who had addressed the Senate in the course of this debate, and especially to the gentleman who spoke last [Mr. CLAYTON] whose remarks he had heard with great satisfaction. He looked upon the present motion as revolutionary and disorganizing in its character, and as going to the dissolution of the Senate. He looked upon it (if it should be adopted) as the mere whim of the moment of the majority for the time being, and to do what was proposed to be done, would be reducing themselves to a mere club to act as it pleased at its own will. He had sat silent and looked upon the progress of the bill with great confidence that it could not succeed; and the longer it continued the farther gentlemen would be from the object they had in view. He looked upon the consequences of chartering these banks as nothing compared with the effect that the violation of their rules and proceedings would have upon their own character and conduct. Should they decide that the majority for the time being should do what it pleased, without regard to their rules of proceedings, wherein would they differ from the French National Convention? Did they not know how this body proceeded? [Here Mr. B. quoted some historical facts showing how it, in repeated instances, violated every principle of law and justice.]

We do not, said Mr. B. propose to come to these bold results, but we propose to rush on with the rapidity of the French National Covention, sponge out the rules, and enable a majority for the time being to do what it pleases. This would be bad enough when the Senate was full; but how would it be at the end of the session, with a bare quorum of twenty-seven members present? Then fourteen would be a majority sufficient, according to the doctrines maintained here to-day, to sponge out all the rules which regulated the proceedings of the body. He was glad to see the stand taken against the motion, and was proud to hear what had fallen from the Senator from Delaware on the subject. Now one word as to the bill before them. The whole idea of forcing it through in this hurried manner was farcical in the extreme. He felt himself to be good for one half of the time that was yet left, and there were Senators enough near him who would not fail in doing their part. If the Senate would act up to its own gravity and take up the proposition that had been made to enable these banks to wind up their concerns without banking or issuing notes, it could be done in ten minutes; but the idea of forcing them through in the manner proposed was laughable in the extreme.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana briefly assigned his reasons why he should vote to sustain the appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, and the question being taken, shall the decision of the CHAIR be sustained as the opinion of the Senate, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 24, noes 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Southard, and White—8.

Mr. WRIGHT, to show that he had no disposition to forfeit the rights of these institutions, would make a proposition that he hoped would be acceptable to the Senate. It was this: if the Senate would agree to strike out all of the bill as it came from the House, after the first proviso, it would be perfectly agreeable to him, and he believed to a majority of the Senate, and he would withdraw all objection to it.

Here the Secretary read the part of the bill proposed by Mr. WRIGHT, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the provisions, restrictions, and enactments of the act of Congress of the 25th May, 1838, entitled "An act to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia," be, and the same are hereby extended to the Farmers' and Mechanics Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of Metropolis, the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank of Washington; the Bank of the Potomac, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria; Provided, That whenever in the original act the 1st of July, 1838, occurs, it shall be so construed as to mean the 4th of July, 1840; and whenever the 1st of July, 1842, occurs, it shall be construed to mean the 4th of July, 1844.

Mr. ALLEN objected to the second reading, unless gentlemen on the other side would give a pledge to strike out that portion of the bill which continued the banking privileges.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he would never consent to surrender his independence as a legislator by any promise or bargain of this kind. He would not consent to any arrangement which would restrict the Senate before the bill was open for discussion and amendment.

Mr. ALLEN said he must persist in his objections. If gentlemen were serious in their desire to save these banks from the consequences which they predicted, they ought to accept his proposition. If they would not, on them would rest the responsibility.

Mr. WALKER suggested to the Senator from Ohio, that as the same question would come up on the third reading of the bill; that is, that it could not be read a third time without unanimous consent, that his friend from Ohio would withdraw his objections now, and let the bill go to a second reading, when he could submit such amendments as he thought proper. If he could not succeed in getting such amendments as would render the bill acceptable to him, he could then raise the same objection to the third reading, and the bill could not be passed to a third reading, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CALHOUN presumed there was no one here opposed to a bill giving to these institutions the power of collecting their debts and winding up their affairs in the easiest possible mode to themselves and their debtors, and he therefore hoped the gentleman from Ohio would consent to let the bill be read a second time. It was just as much in the gentleman's power to arrest the bill at its third reading as now, and he could do so should he fail in getting the amendments he proposed. For himself he never would agree to extend the charters of suspended banks, but he was perfectly willing to give them every reasonable facility for winding up their affairs. Further, he would not extend the charters of banks of circulation. He believed that they [Congress] were the trustees for preserving the currency established by the Constitution, and that the chartering of banks of circulation would be inconsistent with their duty. There was one of these banks, he understood, that paid specie, and he would be willing to recharter it, provided it was to be a bank of discount, deposite, and exchange only, and not of circulation. He believed it would be more profitable to the banking institutions to conduct their business in this manner, and that it would be a great blessing to the people of this country when their banking institutions were confined to the business of discounts, deposites and exchanges, without the power of issuing bank notes.

Mr. STRANGE said, he regretted the position in which the Senate was placed, and the consequent mischiefs with which others were threatened. As matters stood, a single gentleman had it in his power to prevent the further progress of the bill, on which a motion has recently been pending for a second reading, and the whole of one side of the chamber should not be held reponsible for the acts of a few of its members. Whether those few members acted well or wisely in resisting the apparent wishes of a large portion of the body, it was for them to decide; but if they were wrong, he thought those gentlemen on the other side, who violently declined all compromise, were equally so. The business of life can be conducted only by compromise, and he hoped gentlemen would yet listen to the suggestions of prudence. He, for one, as he had before said, was favorable to relieving the District banks; and if relief could not be obtained to the full extent, he was willing, for one, to unite in at least extending to them the poor privilege of breathing, and thus avoid the confusion into which debts due to and from them, and property held by them, might be thrown, and the injustice consequent thereon. He was aware that his vote on the bill in relation to these banks had subjected him to the charge of inconsistency. He had seen it in the papers, he had heard it in this chamber. He cared not for such charges, but wished to explain his real position. It was no friendship for banks or bank paper that prompted his vote. He was as hostile to banks of issue as any member of that body, and he hoped to see the day when no bank of issue would exist. But he wished that result to proceed from the enlightened action of public opinion, and not to be consummated in opposition to that opinion. He believed public opinion was tending that way, and when it reached the point he should be gratified. But in the mean time in legislating for this District, which was the only legislation he could be called upon to make on the subject, a District which has no Representative of its own, inspired with the feelings and opinions of his immediate constituents, he felt that a parental tenderness should be extended towards it; and that legislation upon it should be, as far as possible, in conformity to the sense of its own community; at any rate, that it should not be subjected to inconveniences or privations, real or imaginary, for which public opinion in the surrounding communities was not prepared; that a gentle and not a rough hand should be extended in healing its ills. Public opinion in Virginia and Maryland is not yet prepared for dispensing with bank paper. Abolish banks in this District, and it will be flooded with bank paper from Virginia and Maryland. If it must have bank paper, while it suffers the evil let it have the profit. But again: wind up these banks suddenly, and you will have the whole property of the District brought immediately under execution and monopolized at once by a few moneyed men. By waiting for the steady advance of public opinion, this District will get rid of the evils of banking pari passu with the rest of the Union, and will not be subjected to the distressing convulsions which all sudden changes produce, however beneficial in the end such changes may be.

Mr. HUBBARD said as there seemed to be no probability of being able to agree on any measure relative to the banks, he hoped they would take up the bill to prevent frauds on the revenue.

Mr. WALKER concurred in many of the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] and should vote against taking up the bill named by the Senator from New Hampshire, and against any bill till this was disposed of. He should not vote for the recharter of any bank of issue, and in saying so he had no particular reference to the institutions now before them. His reasons grew out of the evils of the system. But while he would not vote for banks of issue, he would vote for banks of discount, deposite, and exchange, and this he had stated on a previous occasion. But the question was not now whether they should charter banks of issue or not. The question was upon enabling these corporations to collect their debts and wind up their affairs. This was the amount of the proposition of the Senator from New York, and the same proposition had been made by the Senator from Ohio, and voted down. He believed that without the pledges that had been required by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN] this was the course that would be taken by a majority of the Senate.

Mr. NORVELL moved to adjourn. Negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Kentucky, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Linn, Mouton, Porter, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Stange, Sturgeon, Walker—20.

A desultory conversation now took place, chiefly on the question whether all the powers and liabilities of the banks would irretrievably expire at midnight with their charters; when, there appearing to be a general understanding that a bill to extend the charters of the banks merely to enable them to wind up their affairs would not be opposed—

Mr. BENTON, by consent, introduced a joint resolution continuing the charters of the District banks for the sole purpose of winding up their affairs; which resolution having been read twice without dissent—

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend it by substituting for it the former portion of the bill from the House, simply putting the banks on a footing with the Union Bank of Georgetown, as before proposed by Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky moved to add the latter portion of the bill from the House, which provided for the extension of their charters.

Several Senators now insisted on an adjournment, which was moved by Mr. ALLEN and negatived—ayes 13, noes 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Wright—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, Knight, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Walker, White, and Young—21.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky then withdrew his amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HUBBARD was agreed to, and the resolution in this form was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. CLAY remarked, in the way of moral reflection, that the Senate had been in the morning charged with legislating too fast; and they had then spent the day, till six o'clock, in discussing a question of order; and yet a bill had been introduced, read a first, second, and third time, and passed, and all this in the course of fifteen minutes.

Mr. WALL. That shows what can be done by concession and good feeling.

The resolution was then read a third time and passed, and sent to the House for concurrence.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 3, 1840.

Mr. TRIPLETT wished to offer a resolution, which was read for information, about the expenses of the war in Florida, the number of troops employed, &c.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON objected.

Mr. TRIPLETT moved to suspend the rules, but, at the suggestion of the CHAIR, withdrew his motion for the present.

Mr. JENIFER wished to have 5,000 extra copies of a certain document, in relation to the tobacco trade, printed.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected; and

Mr. J. did not move a suspension; so the motion was not agreed to; but, Mr. P. at length consenting to withdraw, the printing was ordered.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill to prolong the charters of the BANKS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

And the pending question being on the adoption of the following amendment offered by Mr. UNDERWOOD of Kentucky, as modified,

Provided further, That if the said banks or any or either of them, shall within ninety days from and after the passage of this act resume specie payments, then the said banks, or such of them as shall have resumed, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges conferred by their present charters, until the 4th day of July, 1842, unless Congress shall at any time otherwise direct; but if such bank or banks so resuming shall at any time after such resumption again suspend specie payments, or refuse to pay any of their notes or obligations in specie, then such suspension or refusal shall operate as a forfeiture of their respective charters, except for the purpose of winding up their affairs under the provisions and restrictions contained in this act; and provided, further, that in all cases where the said banks, or either of them, thereafter refuse payment of any of their notes or obligations, there shall be a summary remedy therefor, before any justice or judge having jurisdiction of the case, on five days' notice, wherein there shall be no supersedeas, stay of execution, injunction, or certiorari allowed, nor any appeal, except upon an affidavit of merits by the president, cashier, or directors.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That if the president and directors of either of said banks shall violate the provisions aforesaid, they and each of them shall be fined in a sum not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars for every offence, to be recovered by presentment or indictment in any court of record having jurisdiction thereof.

Mr. WELLER, being entitled to the floor, made a very powerful and animated speech in opposition to the bill, and in an exposure of the frauds of the banks.

Mr. GRINNELL followed in support of the banks, and, in the course of his remarks, thought proper to put several questions to his colleague, Mr. VANDERPOOL, in relation to his views regarding the issue of small bills.

Mr. VANDERPOOL did not choose to be thus catechized. He would answer his constituents, and them only when they thought proper to ask such questions. He was happy to say that he had no "conscience keeper," and would be ever ready to give a reply when called upon by those who had the right to put such interrogatories.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to one gentleman putting questions to another all the while he was making a speech.

After Mr. GRINNELL had concluded,

Mr. COST JOHNSON demanded the previous question, which was seconded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD'S amendment (see above) was then read, and he demanded the yeas and nays upon it; which were ordered.

The reading of the bill (viz: the bill moved by Mr. THOMAS, and which is a transcript of the bill for winding up the affairs of the Union Bank of Georgetown) was called for; and the bill, together with Mr. UNDERWOOD'S amendment thereto, was read accordingly.

The question being put on agreeing to this amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Biddle, Briggs, Brockway, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis Edwards, Ely, Evans, Fisher, Gates, Gentry, Goggin, Goode, Grahain, Graves, Green, Griffin, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, William Cost Johnson, Kemble, Kempshall, King, Leet, Lincoln, McCarty, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Montanya, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Randall, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Edward Rogers, Russell, Sergeant, Shepard, Simonton, Slade, Stanly, Starkweather, Stuart, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Blackwell, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Wm. O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Casey, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Dana, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Floyd, Galbraith, Gerry, Hammond, Jno. Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Leadbetter, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Samuels, Shaw, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Taylor, Pn. F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, D. D. Wagener, Weller, Wick, J. W. Williams, and H. Williams—70.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on ordering the bill, as amended, to its third reading; on which the yeas and nays, being demanded, were taken, and resulted as follows—Yeas 108, nays 69.

The bill being at its third reading,

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON moved the previous question.

Mr. LINN BOYD moved a call of the House, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows—Yeas 59, nays 86.

So the motion for a call was refused.

The question recurring on ordering the bill to its third reading at this time,

The yeas and nays were demanded, and, being ordered and taken, resulted as follows—Yeas 118, nays 67.

The bill was thereupon read a third time.

The question being on its passage,

Mr. HOPKINS demanded the previous question.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the bill on the table, but on remonstrance withdrew the motion.

Mr. KEIM renewed the motion.

On this question the yeas and nays were demanded, and, being ordered, resulted as follows—Yeas 70, nays 120.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The previous question was seconded, put, and carried, and the main question being on the passage of the bill, it was read, as follows:

A BILL to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia, for certain purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c. That the provisions, restrictions, and enactments of the act of Congress of the 25th May, 1838, entitled "An act to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia," be, and the same are hereby, extended to the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank of Washington, the Bank of the Potomac, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria; Provided, That whenever, in the original act, the 1st of July, 1838, occurs, it shall be so construed as to mean the 4th of July, 1840; and whenever the 1st of July, 1842, occurs, it shall be construed to mean the 4th of July, 1844.

Provided further, That if the said banks, or any or either of them, shall, within ninety days from and after the passage of this act, resume specie payments, then the said banks, or such of them as shall have so resumed, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges conferred by their present charters, until the 4th day of July, 1842, unless Congress shall at any time otherwise direct; but if such bank or banks so resuming shall, at any time after such resumption, again suspend specie payments, or refuse to pay any of their notes or obligations in specie, then such suspension or refusal shall operate as a forfeiture of their respective charters, except for the purpose of winding up their affairs under the provisions and restrictions contained in this act; and provided, further, that in all cases where the said banks, or either of them, thereafter refuse payment of any of their notes or obligations, there shall be a summary remedy therefor, before any justice or judge having jurisdiction of the case, on five days' notice, wherein there shall be no supersedeas, stay of execution, injunction, or certiorari, allowed, nor any appeal, except upon an affidavit of merits by the president, cashier, or directors.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That if the president and directors of either of said banks shall violate the provisions aforesaid, they and each of them shall be fined in a sum not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars for every offence, to be recovered by presentment or indictment in any court of record having jurisdiction thereof.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and, being taken, stood—yeas 115, nays 75, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Biddle, Briggs, Brockway, Samson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Craig, Cranston, Crockett, Cross, Curtis, Dana, Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fisher, Galbraith, Jas. Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Graves, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, John Hastings, Henry, Hill of Virginia, Hoffman, Hopkins, Hunt, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Wm. Cost Johnson, Kempshall, King, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, McCarty, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Peck, Pope, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shepard, Simonton, Slade Stanly, Stuart, Swearingen, Taliaferro, Francis Thomas, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Peter J. Wagner, Warren, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Worthington—115.

NAYS—Messrs. Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Black, Blackwell, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Bynum, Carr, Casey, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Davee, John Davis, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Floyd, Gerry, Hammond, Hand, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Hook, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kille, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Miller, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Samuels, Shaw, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, David D Wagener, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—75.

So the bill was passed.

The question being on agreeing to its title,

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON demanded the previous question.

Mr. KEIM wished to amend the title, and sent his amendment to the CHAIR to be read; but the reading was objected to.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on the previous question; but the House refused to order them.

The previous question was seconded, put, and carried; and the main question being on agreeing to the title of the bill, it was agreed to.

Mr. HAND then moved to reconsider the last motion, to introduce the following amendment:

"A bill to authorize special privileges, promote the circulation of irredeemable paper, and to sacrifice Republican principles to the influence and expediency of unconstitutional corporations."

Mr. H. on this motion asked for the previous question, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Much confusion ensued, when

Mr. HAND withdrew the motion.

THE NEW YORK NAVY YARD.

Mr. HOFFMAN moved the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to this House copies of any correspondence which may be filed, known to, or within the control of the Navy Department, between Commodore Renshaw, the Secretary of the Navy, and other persons, concerning the pump and block maker at the Navy Yard at Brooklyn, in the State of New York; and whether any affidavit has been made by the said block and pump maker in relation to his political opinions, and, if so, to communicate to this House a copy of said affidavit, and of every other paper or correspondence on file in the Department, or within its reach or control, showing that mechanics and laborers at the said Navy Yard have been employed, retained, or dismissed on account of their political opinions.

Objection being made—

Mr. H. moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer his resolution, and demanded the yeas and nays.

They were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 101, nays 68.

There not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended so as to allow Mr. HOFFMAN to offer his resolution.

The House then, on motion of Mr. JONES, of Virginia, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and took up for consideration the

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ADAMS inquired as to the extent of the "improvement and necessary repairs" in the different navy yards, and why there was so great a difference in the amounts to be appropriated for different yards.

Mr. JONES replied, and referred to the report from the Navy Department.

The long enumeration of items in the contingent appropriations being under consideration—

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out the words "and for no other purpose whatever," as in his opinion, they amounted to a burlesque, the enumeration being so extensive as to embrace every object in nature.

Mr. JONES replied, and showed that the words complained of had been inserted in all former appropriation bills, and in the course of his remarks, referred Mr. A. to a bill signed by himself in 1826, while President of the United States, having the very same words.

The hour for taking the usual recess having arrived, the committee rose, when,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to Monday next. But before any decision was had on the motion, the House took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

Mr. HOLMES, on leave, presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce at Charleston, S. C. in relation to certain light-houses in the city of Charleston, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Memorials were also presented (on leave) by Messrs. E. DAVIES, ADAMS, and LINCOLN; which were appropriately referred.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked action on a resolution offered previous to the recess, providing that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

After some conversation, Mr. P. waived the proposition for the present.

Mr. McKAY, on leave, presented certain joint resolutions requiring the Attorney General to examine into the validity of titles to all lands purchased for the purpose of erecting arsenals and public buildings; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN of Massachusetts in the chair,) on the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1840.

The pending question being on the motion of Mr. ADAMS to strike out from the tail end of the general item which appropriates $450,000 to defray the expenses of freight and transportation, stores and materials, wharfage and dockage, and many other things, the restrictive words "and for no other object or purpose whatever,"

Mr. ADAMS resumed his remarks, but instead of confining himself to the bill before the committee, struck off into an invective against the Independent Treasury bill, for which he was called to order by Mr. JONES of New York, and others.

After a few more remarks from Mr. ADAMS,

Mr. JONES replied briefly to Mr. A. He vindicated the correctness of the present item in form, contending that it was strictly in accordance with that of former bills. After the six weeks' debate which had taken place on the Sub-Treasury, he must, he said, decline to follow the gentleman into that subject.

Mr. McKAY contended that it was highly necessary to specify the objects to which appropriations were to be applied. He argued that, if such specifications were not made, then the Secretary of the Navy would have the power to apply the money to any other object connected with the Department. Mr. McK. referred to the bill making appropriations for the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress as a parallel case, and in which specifications were also made.

Mr. EVERETT made some remarks demonstrating that the public money of the country was now at the disposition of the Executive.

Mr. CUSHING said that he concurred entirely with his colleague [Mr. ADAMS] in the remarks he had made. Without entering into the question at present himself, he (Mr. C.) wished to embrace the occasion to ask of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means an explanation, which he prepared, that gentlemen would readily give, in regard to a portion of the debate on the Independent Treasury bill. Mr. C. understood that Mr. JONES had in his speech, assumed that the opponents of the bill had not objected to its provisions or want of constitutionality. Mr. C. said that he himself had argued the very question of the unconstitutional nature and effect of the first section of the bill, which localizes the Treasury of the United States; and he appealed to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] to have the matter stand right before the House and the country.

Mr. JONES of Virginia replied. He said: when the gentleman from Massachusetts delivered his speech in opposition the Sub-Treasury bill, I was confined to my bed from severe indisposition. For two weeks I was incapacitated from attending the House. His arguments I did not hear, and as they have not been published, or at least if they have been published I have not seen them, I have been unable to learn what they were. Since my health would permit, I have been constant in my attendance to the debate, and at no time did I hear any remark made on the constitutionality of the principles of the bill. The constitutionality of the measure proposed was apparently assumed by one side, and left unquestioned by the other. Since, during the four weeks of the debate, to which I attentively listened, the objection of unconstitutionality was not urged, I naturally came to the conclusion that it had not been insisted on. If constitutional objections could be urged with any plausibility at all, I should have supposed that their importance would have led to their reiteration. Arguments based on grounds of far less moment have been repeated again and again. It cannot, therefore, be surprising that the impression should have been created on my mind that no reasoning of such a character had been employed. If the gentleman from Massachusetts, in his speech, took the high ground of the Constitution for the support of his argument, I did not know it; I could not know the fact; I could not even suspect it. But, since the gentleman informs me that he took that ground, I cheerfully make the correction.

Mr. SERGEANT (at a subsequent period of the session) also stated that he had himself made constitutional objection to the bill.

[Mr. J. explained that he had been called out of the House for a short time on two occasions, during Mr. S's argument, and had, therefore, not heard the objections raised. He stood corrected (he said) with great pleasure.]

Mr. ADAMS made some further remarks in reply to Mr. JONES, vindicating his own consistency, which had been called in question by Mr. JONES, on the ground that he (Mr. A.) when President, had signed a bill which contained an item in similar terms.

Mr. MORGAN went into some calculations to show that, since the year 1826, the expenditures for this branch of the public service had doubled, without any adequate increase of ships, &c. in proportion to the amount.

Mr. JONES contended that he had given a complete answer, and, he would say, refutation, to all charges of the kind, when the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill was under consideration.

If the gentleman would refer to the complete refutation in that speech, he was sure he would not repeat thecharge.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRARY moved to strike out the item appropriating "$4,250 for the necessary repairs to the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia," and inserting a provision requiring the Board of Commissioners to prepare and lay before Congress, at the commencement of each session, the state of the votes of each member of the Board on all the proceedings in relation to stores, equipments of vessels, and other matters connected with the naval establishment of the United States, etc.

Mr. C. proceeded to address the committee on the subject of the alleged abuses of the Board of Navy Commissioners, but had not progressed far, when

The SPEAKER resumed the chair to receive a message from the Senate, announcing that the Senate had passed a bill extending the charters of the District banks for certain purposes, as follows:

A BILL to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc. That the provisions, restrictions, and enactments of the act of Congress of the 25th May, 1838, entitled "An act to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, be, and the same are hereby extended to the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank of Washington, the Bank of the Potomac, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria: Provided, That whenever, in the original act, the 1st of July, 1838, occurs, it shall be so construed as to mean the 4th of July, 1840; and whenever the 1st of July, 1842, occurs, it shall be construed to mean the 4th of July, 1844.

On motion of Mr. F. THOMAS, the House, by general consent, took up the bill, and it was read twice.

The question being on its third reading,

Mr. JENIFER spoke for a short time with much warmth against the bill. He complained that the Senate had disregarded the wishes of the House, and had sent back a bill which they were compelled to adopt, since no alternative remained. He also maintained that Congress was about to establish the principle that they might do here what they pleased, and that their next step might be to lay hands on the slaveholding institutions of the District.

Mr. DUNCAN followed, and contended that had the banks conducted their affairs honestly, and resumed specie payments when they ought, no one would have been against them. He would say for one that he dare not vote for a rechartter of the banks in his own State under such circumstances.

As for the picture of desolation drawn by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] which was to follow, by a refusal to rechart·r these banks, it ought to be looked upon by the citizens of the District as a slander upon them. Besides, if the banks were in the bad condition described by the gentleman, that was a strong argument why they should be continued no longer. If they had brought on such a state of things already, what would they do if they were continued twenty years longer? Besides, who was it that asked for the continuance of these banks? A petition had been presented yesterday, signed by 244 names. Now, what proportion was that to the whole population of the District, amounting to between 40 and 50,000. Yes, out of 50,000 inhabitants, 244 of them have applied for a continuance of the charters of these banks. What was the inference? Why, that the remainder were either indifferent to, or against the recharter.

Mr. D. then made a calculation showing the amount of bank capital within the ten miles square, and that, at the same ratio, the whole population of the United States would be entitled to a capital of two thousand two hundred and twenty millions of dollars. And, by allowing the proportion of paper issues, three dollars to one of specie, the banking capital of the United States, at the same ratio of the District banks, would amount to the enormous sum of six thousand six hundred and sixty millions of dollars, giving, in one year, according to the usual profits, a clear income of hundreds of millions.

After showing this disproportion of bank capital between the District and other places, Mr. D. proceeded to repel, with much warmth, the charge that the Democratic party were seeking to oppress the District. The Democratic party were not an enemy to the banks. They were, on the contrary, friends to them, and were willing to recharter them under proper restrictions. The charge that the Democratic party were seeking to destroy the banking institutions was not true. He pronounced it a base slander upon the party.

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS moved the previous question; which was seconded.

And the main question (being on ordering the bill to a third reading) was ordered, and, being taken, was decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

And the question recurring on its final passage—

Mr. FRANCIS THOMAS moved the previous question; there was a second; and the main question was ordered.

Mr. LEET asked the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and, being taken, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Aaron V. Brown, William O. Butler, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cranston, Cross, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Garret Davis, Deberry, Dellet, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Ely, Fine, Galbraith, James Garland, Gates, Gerry, Goggin, Goode, Green, Griffin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hand, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Hill of Virginia, Hillen, Hoffman, Holleman, Holmes, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, John W. Jones, Kemble, Kempshall, Kille, King, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lincoln, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marvin, Miller, Mitchell, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, C. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Palen, Parrish, Parmenter, Paynter, Peck, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Rariden, Reed, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Robinson, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Sergeant, Shepard, Simonton, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Swearingen, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Triplett, Underwood, Vanderpoel, D. D. Wagener, P. J. Wagner, Warren, Weller, Jared W. Williams, Thomas Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and J. L. Williams—124.

NAYS—Messrs. Black, Carr, Casey, Coles, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, Eastman, Edwards, Floyd, Hill of N. C. James, N. Jones, Marchand, Mason, Ramsey, Shaw, Thomas Smith, Taliaferro, and Turney—19.

So the bill was passed and returned to the Senate.

Mr. WAGNER moved that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday morning at ten o'clock.

Mr. LINCOLN, remarking that whilst we were drinking our wine on the day of our National Independence, we should not forget to furnish bread to those Revolutionary soldiers who fought for and achieved it, moved to amend the motion of Mr.

WAGNER by inserting that the House would, at 11 o'clock to-morrow, proceed to hear and decide on the claims for Revolutionary services, and of Revolutionary and invalid pensioners.

The CHAIR (occupied by Mr. SERGEANT pro tem.) declared the amendment to be out of order.

And the question was then taken on Mr. WAGNER's resolution, and decided in the negative—yeas 76, nays 93.

So the House refused to adjourn to Monday.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LINCOLN) of Massachusetts in the Chair) on the navy appropriation bill.

Mr. CRARY continued his remarks for a short time, and had not concluded when, having given way for a motion to that effect, the committee rose, and

The House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SATURDAY, July 4, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. LINCOLN rose and said, that he did not perceive that the amendment which he had last evening proposed to the resolution offered to adjourn over to Monday had been inserted on the journal. He would not move any amendment, but he would now renew (in the form of a resolution) the motion that the House would, at eleven o'clock, proceed to consider and dispose of bills on the private calendar in favor of claims for Revolutionary services and for Revolutionary and invalid pensions.

Mr. STANLY said he would like to amend the resolution by inserting that two days of next week should be set apart for the consideration of these bills. The House would soon be left without a quorum, and if any thing was intended to be done for the Revolutionary soldiers, let the House take two or three days of next week, when a quorum was likly to be present, and not select a day when no good could be done.

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to the reception of Mr. LINCOLN's resolution.

A motion was made that the House adjourn; which motion, by yeas 66, nays 63, prevailing,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,
MONDAY, July 6, 1840.

The CHAIR presented a memorial of the President and Directors of the Patriotic Bank of Washington, praying for a renewal of their charter; which, on motion by Mr. LUMPKIN, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of N. Nye Hall; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. W. also presented a memorial of the Board of Underwriters of the city of New York, remonstrating against the repeal of the law of 1837, respecting pilots; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committeee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Andrew Forrest, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying a revision of the laws regulating the sale and transfer of American vessels abroad for the better prevention of the slave trade, said that a bill on this subject had been reported by the Committee on Commerce, and passed by the Senate.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the House bill for the relief of Boggs and Thompson, Robert and Thomas Hutchinson, and others, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the House for the relief of Robert Milnor, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. D. also, from the same Committee, to which was referred the bill from the House for the relief of Gilbert A. Smith and Nathan Stark, reported the same with amendments.

The resolution submitted on Friday last by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, relative to a change of the rules of the Senate, was, after some remarks by Messrs. WALKER, CALHOUN, BENTON, and CLAY of Alabama, laid upon the table.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill to establish and regulate the navy ration;

The bill for the relief of Hugh Stewart;

The bill authorizing the inhabitants of fractional township ten south, of range one east, in the State of Arkansas, to enter one half section of land for school purposes;

The bill relative to the transportation of the mail in steamboats;

The bill for the relief of James Herron;

House bill for the relief of Capt. John Downes;

House bill for the relief of John Mitchell and B. F. Fox;

House bill to annex a certain tract of land to the Ceosa land district;

House bill allowing further time to the trustees of Centre College to dispose of the land heretofore granted to the deaf and dumb asylum in the State of Kentucky;

An act from the House granting a section of land for the use of schools in St. Clair county, State of Illinois; and were severally read a third time, and passed.

An act from the House granting two townships of land for the use of the University in the Territory of Iowa;

The bill from the House, to extend the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia, which was read a first time on Friday last, was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports. The question being on the amendment of the committee as amended by the substitute of Mr. HUNTINGTON, declaring any witness incompetent who should have any interest whatever in the cause similar to the interest of the party for whom he might be called to testify—

Mr. CALHOUN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

And the amendment as amended (on Friday last) was agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas; Norvell, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, Wright and Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Strange, and Walker—4.

Mr. HUNTINGTON submitted severally and explained a variety of amendments, which went to render the bill more explicit, thorough, and effectual. All of them were agreed to without dissent, except one of them, which made the receiver of imported goods liable, not only if he "knew," but if he had good reason to believe that the goods were illegally imported. To this there was one dissenting voice.

On the occasion of presenting this amendment, Mr. CALHOUN said he should not object to it, but he proceeded to remark that he considered the measure in general as too severe on the mercantile classes. It was the interest of every honest merchant, as much as of the Government, to prevent these frauds; yet none of them had asked for a measure of that kind; and if the measure should prove so severe as to prevent the co-operation of honest merchants, it must and would prove inefectual.

Mr. HUNTINGTON and Mr. HUBBARD replied briefly, and vindicated the measure as calculated to operate hardly on the fraudulent alone.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee, now offered a number of additional amendments, designed to make the bill more explicit and effectual.

Some of these amendments were discussed by Messrs. WRIGHT, CLAY of Kentucky, CALHOUN, DAVIS, and HUBBARD.

One of the amendments provided that no mixed goods should be designated as silk, unless the value of the silk in the fabric should exceed the value of all the other materials. On this amendment Mr. CALHOUN demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and it was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, Huntington, Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Prentiss, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Henderson, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Walker, and Williams—8.

The other amendments from committee were severally agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON moved an additional section to the bill, giving it effect only on and after the first day of January, 1841, and urged that this time would be necessary, in order that merchants might be prepared.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky objected that this extension of time would be giving so much further license to the various frauds which had heretofore been committed.

Mr. WRIGHT moved the 1st of September next.

Mr. CALHOUN moved the 1st of October, and urged the additional and unnecessary difficulty which, making the time shorter than that, it would occasion the merchants.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, Mr. HUBBARD, and Mr. DAVIS replied, urging the increase of fraud that would be occasioned by this specific delay; insisting that little evil was likely to result from the immediate operation of the bill, and even if any case of grievance should arise, it would be better to remedy it by special legislation, than to allow these frauds to continue.

Mr. CALHOUN rejoined in further behalf of the merchants.

Mr. WRIGHT stated that he had received letters from merchants in New York urging some delay before this bill should go into effect. He had consequently fixed on the first of September, and he proceeded to show his reasons, in detail, for that day.

Mr. HENDERSON spoke at some length in favor of his amendment, and Mr. KNIGHT against it.

Mr. WRIGHT's amendment (Sept. 1,) to Mr. HENDERSON's amendment, (Jan. 1,) was agreed to as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Williams and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Henderson, and Walker—4.

The amendment, as amended, (Sept. 1,) was then rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Henderson, King, Lumpkin, Robinson, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, Knight, Linn, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Ruggles, and Smith of Indiana—16.

So (all delay being rejected) the bill was left to go into immediate effect.

Mr. CALHOUN movod a final limit to the operation of the bill on June 30, 1842, when the gradual reduction of duties by the compromise bill will be consummated.

This amendment was debated by Messrs. CALHOUN, CLAY of Kentucky, BUCHANAN, DAVIS, and HUNTINGTON.

The chief points in debate were, whether the declaratory parts of this bill (affecting the amount of duties) ought to continue in force after June, 1842, when inconsistent with the act of 1833; and whether the compromise act would continue the duties at or below twenty per cent. on the value of the goods, after June, 1842, without further legislation by Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN's amendment, providing that this bill should cease to have effect after June 30, 1842, was agreed to as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Roane, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, Knight, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Ruggles, and Smith of Indiana—12.

Mr. BENTON moved to amend the bill by requiring that all drawbacks on articles manufactured in the United States from foreign materials subject to duty should be proportioned to the duties provided for by the compromise act of 1833.

Mr. DAVIS signified that he was not now prepared to vote on this amendment, as the subject of it, he thought, was not sufficiently understood.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, all the other amendments were agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALHOUN introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a copy of all the circulars in relation to the revenue issued since the adoption of the act of 1832, known as the compromise act; which was adopted.

The Senate then went into Executive session, and soon after adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
MONDAY, July 6, 1840.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of Indiana, enclosing the resignation by Mr. HOWARD of his seat as a member of this House.

Mr. ATHERTON moved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TALIAFERRO and others warmly remonstrated, expressing a wish that the committees would be first allowed to report.

Mr. DOWNING got Mr. ATHERTON'S consent to move for the printing of a bill brought in by him on notice, entitled "An act to protect the lives and property of the people of Florida, and to bring the Seminole war to an end;" which, on his motion, was read.

[We have not the means of obtaining a copy of the bill; but it proposed to give the choice of Governor of the Territory to the people—the election to take place in November next; that the service of volunteers should be accepted to fight out the war in Florida; the service to continue one year, or during the war; that all lands in the Territory should be taxed to raise money to defray expenses of the war, except the pay, clothing, emoluments, &c. of the volunteers, and that, to meet all other expenses of the war, all the public lands in the Territory be granted to the Territory, to be disposed of as the Legislature shall direct. The Governor of the Territory to have the chief command of the troops, and to conduct all military operations.*]

Mr. DOWNING moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON opposed the motion, and moved the reference of the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOWNING briefly explained the object of the bill; which was, to place the further prosecution of the war in the hands of the Governor of Florida, with power to accept the services of volunteers. He said the people of Florida were tired of trusting the management of this war any longer to those who were strangers to their interests and feelings, and who knew nothing personally of the horrid cruelties which were carried on in that unhappy Territory. He wished to make it emphatically a Florida war; to be conducted by the people of the Territory, who should be empowered to select those most deeply interested in the result. The present militia of Florida were greatly reduced and exhausted by previous labors and sufferings in this contest. He was for receiving volunteers, and empowering them to choose their own officers. The bill empowered the Governor and Council to distribute lands to those whose property had been dilapidated and destroyed by the savage foe. In reference to this last provision, he observed that Mr. BENTON'S bill, from the Senate, proposed to give 3,200,000 acres of the soil of Florida to those who would settle on it and take military occupation of the country. That was more than would cover all that was proposed to be granted by this bill; and the Senate bill was understood to meet the approbation of the Executive.

Mr. D. traced the ill success of the war in Florida to the want of a commander, and the employment of a force not adapted to the nature of the contest.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said he never would consent to send such a bill to the Committee of the Whole, but was in favor of referring it to the Committee on Military Affairs; to test the question, he moved to lay it on the table; and on this motion he demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken resulted as follows—yeas 78, nays 39. No quorum having voted, the roll was again called, when the yeas and nays resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, J. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Burke, Bynum, Carr, Clifford, Connor, M. A. Cooper, W. R. Cooper, Craig, Cranston, Dana, Davee, Edward Davies, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Evans, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Gates, Gerry, Giddings, Goggin, Griffin, Hand, Henry, J. Hill of Va. J. Hill of N. C. Hoek, Hopkins, Jackson, James, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, N. Jones, Keim, Kempshall, Kille, Lincoln, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Miller, Montanye, Calvary Morris, Newhard, Palen, Parish, Parmenter, Paynter, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Randolph, Rives, Samuels, Shaw, Slade, J. Smith, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Taylor, Tillinghast, Toland, Turney, Underwood, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, H. Williams, and Lewis Williams—93.

NAYS—Messrs. J. W. Allen, Andrews, Bell, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, Wm. B. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Crabb, Crary, Cross, Cushing, Dawson, Dennis, Dellett, Everett, Rice Garland, Grinnell, Habersham, William S. Hastings, Hunt, Jameson, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Marvin, Mitchell, Morgan, Pope, Proffit, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Albert

*Copied from the National Intelligencer.

Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Sumter, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Triplett, Trumbull, Warren, Edward D. White, J. White, T. W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams—54.

So the bill was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GIDDINGS of Ohio asked consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill making such appropriations as they may think necessary to preserve such public harbors on Lake Erie from destruction as are reported by the Secretary of War as having been injured by late storms.

Objection being made—

Mr. G. moved for a suspension of the rule; the yeas and nays were demanded, and, being taken, were—yeas 57, nays 86.

Mr. TRIPLETT, on leave, presented a memorial from certain tobacco planters; which was referred.

Mr. PICKENS wished to report, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a resolution for an appropriation of $25,000 for defraying the expenses of a survey and exploration of the Northeastern boundary; but

The House, on motion of Mr. ATHERTON, resolved to go again into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair,) and resume the consideration of the

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question pending was the amendment to the bill submitted by Mr. CRARY, as follows:

"That the Board of Commissioners for the Navy shall prepare and lay before Congress, at the commencement of each session, a statement of the votes of each member of the board on all proceedings relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, equipment and employment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the naval establishment of the United States."

Mr. CRARY resumed his remarks in favor of the amendment. His object in discussing the amendment was to call the attention of the country to the errors and inefficiency of this board; to the manner in which they expended the money appropriated for the improvement of the navy. Mr. C. then went into a history of the transactions of this board, with a view to show that not only the naval service generally would be promoted by its abolishment, but that the vessels would be much better constructed. He spoke at length of the improvements in the naval service of rival commercial nations, and particularly in the ordnance; and showed that this board, instead of keeping pace with modern improvements, still adhered to their old prejudice, and obstructed much improvement. Mr. B. was in favor of introducing the bureau system, so as to fix the responsibility of the management of this branch of the service somewhere, which by the present system could not be traced any where. He concluded at 12 o'clock.

Mr. REED of Massachusetts obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. ADAMS, who censured the Committee on Naval Affairs for not having considered and reported on the plan submitted by the Secretary of the Navy, for the substitution of Naval Bureaus in place of a Board of Navy Commissioners.

Mr. REED then went into a reply to Mr. CRARY's speech, noticing the most prominent points, denying his charges, demanding proof, and eulogizing the Commissioners and the Navy generally.

He was followed by Mr. HOFFMAN, who, while he admitted that there might be defects in the existing plan of a Navy Board, and professed himself to be prepared to examine the Secretary's plan for naval bureaus, (towards which his preferences leaned,) repelled the charges adduced by Mr. CRARY against the management of the Navy and the construction and arming of our ships of war, and towered into a most eloquent and stirring eulogium on the glories of our naval achievements.

He concluded at half past 2 o'clock, when the question being taken on the motion of Mr. CRARY, it was rejected.

The House then took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. ATHERTON proposed, on behalf of the Committee of Ways and Means, the following amendment, to come in at the end of section two, viz:

And that, for the purpose of replacing the said sum of three hundred and forty thousand dollars, and the sum of three hundred and thirty thousand dollars authorized to be so applied by the act of the third of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, the further sum of six hundred and seventy thousand dollars shall be, and hereby is, appropriated for the gradual improvement of the navy, to be available after the first of January, eighteen hundred and forty-one.

Mr. A. said the object of this amendment was to reimburse to the fund appropriated by the act of 1839 for the gradual improvement of the navy, the sum which had been expended, and which was proposed to be expended, for the same, for the construction of the steam vessels authorized to be built last year. This was recommended by the Department.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS did not think it necessary to reimburse that fund, as those steam vessels should be considered a part of that gradual increase.

Mr. ATHERTON explained that this amendment caused no increase in the appropriations of this year, but merely provided that the money necessary to construct those steam vessels, which had been taken from the fund for the gradual increase of the navy, should be reimbursed to that fund in 1841.

Mr. REED said it was never intended that these vessels should be built out of that fund, but that it was provided by the act authorizing the construction of these vessels, that the funds should be reimbursed.

Mr. ANDERSON of Maine spoke of the necessity of reimbursing the fund to enable the commissioners to make contracts for ordnance for these vessels and other vessels for which ordnance was yet to be provided.

Mr. ATHERTON said it was necessary for the commissioners to be assured that this fund should be reimbursed in 1841 to enable them to enter into contracts in proper time, to carry out the objects for which the fund for the gradual improvement of the navy was sacredly set apart.

Mr. STANLY made some remarks in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MASON of Ohio said so far as this amendment went to supply the deficiency created by the diversion of a former appropriation, he was willing to vote for it, but he maintained that it involved a new and distinct appropriation of more than $300,000 dollars above any thing heretofore appropriated, and was to that extent opposed to it.

Mr. STANLY further opposed the amendment, and read some articles in relation to the condition of the navy, published in 1839 in the Globe, and commented thereon.

Mr. LEADBETTER made some remarks showing the great number of officers always on land, which was owing, in a great measure, to the want of more vessels, which this amendment provided.

After a few remarks from Messrs. PROFFIT and LEADBETTER,

Mr. RHETT was understood to argue that the amendment proposed did not involve any new tax on the people for the present year, but was merely intended to make the fund heretofore appropriated available for the purposes intended, if it should be wanted in 1841.

Messrs. SALTONSTALL, ATHERTON, HOLLEMAN, REED, UNDERWOOD, and VANDERPOEL, made some remarks, showing the necessity of the appropriation, if it was the wish that the provisions of the law of 1839, for the gradual improvement of the navy, should be fulfilled; and showing that the act authorizing the construction of the steam vessels was a special appropriation for the improvement of the navy, and was never intended to be considered as a part of the improvements under the act of 1839. That the money appropriated under that act was not intended to be applied to the building of vessels, but merely to the purchase of materials, and to supply the vessels with ordnance. That if the money to reimburse was withheld it would operate to destroy the navy, and that it was idle for those who oppose the amendment to say that they were friends to the navy.

Messrs. MASON, POPE, R. GARLAND, PETRIKIN, and STANLY, opposed the amendment.

Mr. MONROE said it was a plain proposition, and simple in its character. He had no doubt the funds were properly applied. He hoped there would be no further debate; there was much business to be transacted, and no time for long speeches: he therefore expressed the hope that the committee would take the vote.

Mr. EVANS contended that this was an additional appropriation beyond the estimates. He was in favor of making a direct appropriation out of the Treasury for the constructing of these steam vessels. He was opposed to the manner of the appropriation.

After a few remarks from Mr. STANLY, in opposition to the amendment, and Mr. RHETT, in explanation of it,

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED proposed the following amendment, which, after a few remarks explanatory of its object, was agreed to.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all appropriations, and all remaining balances of appropriations, heretofore made for building, rebuilding, replacing, purchasing, or repairing, vessels of war, or other vessels, for the use of the navy, or for the purchase of timber, ordnance, or any other articles of building, arming, equipping, or repairing vessels of the navy, or for the repairs of vessels in ordinary, and repair, wear and tear of vessels in commission, together with any materials which have been, or may be, collected under any of the said appropriations, be, and the same are hereby, transferred to one head of appropriation, to be called "the appropriation for the increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission;" and the amount of said appropriation, and of such other as may be made hereafter for like purposes, and the materials which have been, or may be hereafter collected for the same, may be expended and used by the Secretary of the Navy, in building, replacing, arming, repairing, equipping, and employing any vessels which Congress may have authorized, or may hereafter authorize to be built, rebuilt, purchased, or replaced, in such manner as the interests or necessities of the service may require.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be laid before Congress, annually, as soon after the beginning of each year as practicable, a statement of the amounts expended during the preceding fiscal year for wages of mechanics and laborers employed in building, repairing, or equipping, vessels of the navy, or in receiving and securing stores and materials for those purposes; and for the purchase of materials and stores for the same purposes; a statement of the cost or estimated value of the stores on hand, under this appropriation, in the navy yards at the commencement of the next preceding fiscal year; the cost, or estimated value, of articles received and expended during the year; and the cost, or estimated value, of the articles belonging to this appropriation which may be on hand in the navy yards at the close of the next preceding fiscal year.

SEC. . And be it further enacted, That, whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy it shall be conducive to the public interest to use any article of provisions, materials, or other stores, for a different appropriation from that under which they may have been purchased for the naval service, it shall be lawful for him to authorize such use, and it shall be his duty to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, the value or cost of the articles thus used; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to cause the proper officers of the Treasury to transfer the amount of such cost or value upon the books of the Treasury, from the appropriation for which the articles may have been used, to the appropriation from which they may have been or may be taken, so that the actual expenditure under each may be accurately shown.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, proposed the following amendment to come in at the close of the bill:

"For distribution as prize money among the officers and crew of the private armed brig General Armstrong, per act of thirtieth June, eighteen hundred and thirty-four, two thousand nine hundred and seventy-five dollars and twenty cents."

Mr. ATHERTON stated that it was merely a reappropriation of part of the $10,000 appropriated to this object which had been carried to the sinking fund, and After a few remarks from Mr. R. GARLAND, the question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNTER moved an amendment appropriating $100,000 for constructing a dry dock at Philadelphia.

Mr. ATHERTON made a point of order based upon the 76th rule, which provides that no amendment shall be in order to an appropriation bill, except to carry out the provisions of existing laws.

The CHAIR [Mr. LINCOLN] decided the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. PAYNTER appealed from that decision; and the question being "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the committee?" It was put, and the decision was affirmed.

Mr. REED submitted the following amendment:

SEC. . And be it further enacted, that the sum of sixty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury, for the preparation and commencement of the third steam vessel of war authorized by an act of March third, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, in addition to any materials which may be on hand suitable for such vessels.

Mr. HABERSHAM moved to amend the above by the addition of the following:

Provided, That the said steam ship shall be so constructed as not to draw more than sixteen feet of water with all her armament, provision, and other lading, necessary to prepare her for sea.

Mr. HABERSHAM explained the object of the amendment. It was to have the vessel so constructed that it would be able to navigate Southern rivers, if necessary, as a means of defence.

Mr. HOLLEMAN opposed the amendment. It was in consequence of legislation of this kind, in all probability, that the construction of vessels was imperfect, and for which the Navy Commissioners had been blamed. A vessel so constructed could not stand the sea.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was disagreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. REED, it was taken, and there being 48 ayes, and 41 noes, and there being no quorum,

The committee rose, and the chairman reported that fact to the House.

On motion of Mr. NAYLOR,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, July 7, 1840.

Mr. ALLEN said that, by the wording of the journal of Friday last, he was placed in a false position, and he wished it to be corrected if it could be done without a violation of the rules of the Senate. The journal states that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] having introduced a bill to continue the existence of the banks of the District for the purpose of winding up their affairs, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] moved to amend by substituting for it a portion of the bill from the House, placing them in a similar position with the Union Bank of Georgetown. I am there said to have made a motion for adjournment, which was negatived, &c. Now it will be recollected by every Senator who was present, that after the Senator from New Hampshire moved his amendment, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] moved to further amend by adding the rest of the bill from the House, which was, in effect, a recharter of banks now in a state of suspension. It was upon the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] that he (Mr. ALLEN) predicated his motion for adjournment, and not on that of the Senator from New Hampshire, as it now appears on the journal. Mr. A. said he was not acquainted with the rule relative to the making out of the journal, and wished not to be understood as intending any censure on the Secretary, but hoped that it might be made so as to conform to the facts.

Mr. WALKER suggested whether an improvement might not be made in the mode of keeping the journals, and said that a similar occurrence took place in his own case under a former Secretary, as that just referred to by the Senator from Ohio. A bill was before the Senate of great interest to many of his constituents, to which he moved an important amendment. In the subsequent political canvass in his State, he asserted that he had made this motion, and referred to the journal for proof of the fact; but the journal being produced, no notice whatever had been taken of it. He immediately wrote to the Secretary, and then for the first time learned that except the yeas and nays were called on a motions to amend, it was not entered on the journal. The Secretary, nowever, had fortunately preserved a copy of his amendment, and sent a certificate attesting the fact of his having offered it. He thought it would be better if, in the progress of a bill, every motion to amend should be entered upon the journal.

The CHAIR stated he had been looking over the rules, and found the following on this subject:

"Rule 32. The proceedings of the Senate, when not acting in committee of the whole, shall be entered on the journal as concisely as possible, care being taken to detail a true and accurate account of the proceedings: but every vote of the Senate shall be entered on the journal, and a brief statement of the contents of each petition, memorial, or paper, presented to the Senate, shall also be inserted on the journal."

It was therefore apparent that the journal was made out as prescribed by the rule, and no censure could attach to the Secretary. To meet the views of the Senators from Ohio and Mississippi, a change of the rule would be necessary.

Mr. ALLEN said he had not the remotest intention of censuring any one, but called attention to the matter, that it might be corrected, if it could be done without a violation of the rules; and if this could not be done, that his having requested it might be noticed by the reporters for the public prints.

The CHAIR presented to the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the 6th instant, calling for copies of all circulars issued since the passage of the compromise act; which was laid on the table.

Mr. WALL presented the memorial of citizens of Jersey city, in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the repeal of the pilot law of 1837.

Also, from citizens of the United States generally, asking that "Raub's double self-acting safety valve" may be of general use in steamboats in the United States.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, made unfavorable reports on House bills for the relief of Wm. Lomax, of Nathan Baldwin, and of Jas. Boylan.

Mr. NORVELL, from the Select Committee to which had been referred the the bill from the House of Representatives regulating the mileage of members of Congress, made a report, accompanied by a resolution that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr CLAY took occasion to ask if the report that had just been read was from the majority of the committee. Mr. C. said that he had not been present at any meeting of the committee, nor had the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS.] He said that he had brought his mind to the full conviction that the bill from the House ought to be acted on. He moved to make the report the special order for Thursday next, by which time it could be printed and laid on their tables.

On motion of Mr. NORVELL, the report was ordered to be printed, and the motion of Mr. CLAY, making it the special order for Thursday, was agreed to.

The resolution relating to an examination, by a board of dragoon officers, of Colt's improved fire arms, was taken up, and, after being amended, was, on motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, laid on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted a joint resolution to remit the duties on iron used by the West Feliciana Railroad, which he asked might be considered at the present time; but objection being made, Mr. H. gave notice that to-morrow he would ask leave to introduce the joint resolution.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, asked the Senate to indulge him in taking up out of its order on the calendar the joint resolution directing the return to the State of Kentucky of 195 stands of arms. Mr. C. having explained the merits of the case, it was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. LINN asked to take up from the table the bill for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Estava, which, after being explained and advocated by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill for the relief of James H. Clark was considered as in committee of the whole, and, after being so amended as to allow said Clark "one hundred and sixty dollars and ninety-four cents," was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to amend an act entitled an act regulating the pay of the navy was taken up, when

Mr. WILLIAMS entered into an explanation of its merits, and a discussion ensued, in which Messrs. NORVELL, CALHOUN, DAVIS, BUCHANAN, and others participated, in opposition to the bill, on the ground that the power proposed to be granted by it to the Secretary of the Navy was more than ought to be entrusted to any individual; Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. TAPPAN advocated it, contending that the power was wholesome, and ought to be incident to the secretary; when

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to lay the bill on the table, which was agreed to.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports. The question being on Mr. BENTON's amendment, providing that drawbacks on articles manufactured in the United States from foreign material, subject to duty, should be proportioned to the duties as reduced by the compromise act.

Mr. DAVIS said he had designed to make some remarks on the subject of this amendment, but having learned that the committee had expressed an opinion unfavorable to any present action upon it, he would, at this time, say nothing about it.

Mr. BENTON's amendment was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Clay of Alabama, Lumpkin, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, and Young—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, White, Williams, and Wright—23.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Grundy, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Prentiss, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, White, Williams, Wright and Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Henderson, Strange and Walker—6.

On motion of Mr. PHELPS, the Senate proceeded to consider House bill for the relief of Sylvester Phelps, and the heirs and legal representatives of Charles Landon, deceased.

Mr. P. went at length into the merits of this bill, advocating it with much zeal, and was replied to by Mr. HUBBARD, with equal zeal, in opposition; when

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, July 7, 1840.

The Journal of yesterday having been read—

Mr. TRIPLETT rose and asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution, which, he said, he had for three or four days past desired to present, and which he asked might be read for information. If any objection was made, he gave notice that he would move a suspension of the rule, and ask the yeas and nays.

The resolution was then read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War report to this House, on the first day of the next session of Congress, the amount of expenditure in suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida, showing distinctly the various items of expenditure; that he report the number of troops employed in that service, and the length of time employed; distinguishing the commissioned officers from the privates and non commissioned officers, and the amount of pay to those officers, and to the non-commissioned officers and privates; the amount paid for subsistence and transportation, and the items of such expenditure separately; the other expenses under their appropriate heads, and the items of such expenditure.

Mr. C. JOHNSON objected. He did not, he said, object to the call for the information generally, but he objected to going into these details, which would swell into a volume as big as a common Bible.

Mr. TRIPLETT (under leave) said that the gentleman from Tennessee would not, he was sure, make any objection if he understood the matter. The items were called for only where they were necessary to show whether the money had been expended according to law.

I have not (continued Mr. T.) moved in this matter without reflection, and such information as convinces me that the detailed information I require from the Secretary of War is necessary to our future correct and informed legislation on future appropriations for carrying on the Florida war, as well as to know how the money we have already appropriated has been expended by the Executive. I have, with some pains and much labor, made abstracts from all the appropriation bills for suppressing Indian hostilities, and carrying on the Florida war for the years 1836, 1837, and 1838, which I hold in my hand, (which do not include the expenses of the regular army,) and they amount to $20,293,117. This House and the people have a right to know how this amount of money has been expended; and to show the House that this is not a motion connected with electioneering, I have required this information to be communicated to the next Congress—after the Presidential election is over—as I did not expect to get it at this. I believe the gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken in supposing it will make a book as big as a Bible. I believe the whole information can be communicated in some 60 or 75 pages, if it is properly and appropriately arranged, but large or small, I believe our duty to our constituents and ourselves requires us to have it. Much speculation and rumor are afloat on this subject, and we are entitled to know the truth, and I have the information in an authentic shape.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said he made no objection to the resolution on the ground that it was an electioneering document, or that it would affect the Presidential election one way or the other. He objected because the items would run out into a volume.

Mr. TRIPLETT then moved a suspension of the rule, and asked the yeas and nays, (the demand for which, however, he subsequently withdrew.)

And the SPEAKER being about to put the question on the motion to suspend,

Mr. C. JOHNSON withdrew his objection.

And the question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. McKAY said that, as he understood the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. TRIPLETT,] he had stated that the aggregate amount of appropriations for the Seminole war was over $20,000,000. He (Mr. McK.) had seen a statement, prepared with great care at the Quartermaster's Department, by which the amount of appropriations, commencing in January, 1836, not only for the Seminole war, but for the suppression of Creek and Cherokee hostilities, amounted to only nineteen millions, or a little upwards. This sum of nineteen millions was confined not to operations in Florida alone, but with the Creeks and Cherokees.

And the question on the adoption of the resolution was then taken and agreed to.

The SPEAKER having announced the next business in order to be reports from committees,

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of taking up from the SPEAKER's table the bill from the Senate known as the bankrupt law.

The SPEAKER indicated to Mr. B. that it was his intention, after the morning hour had expired, to ask that, by general consent, the table should be cleared.

After a momentary conversation between Mr. BRIGGS and Mr. PICKENS, the former withdrew his motion, and

Mr. PICKENS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the expenses of making an exploration and survey of the Northeastern boundary. Read twice, and committed.

Mr. P. from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back the joint resolution of the Senate authorizing the President of the United States to accept certain presents from the Imaum of Muscat, and the Emperor of Morocco, and to dispose of the same, with an amendment.

Mr. P. observed that it was highly important some action should be had on this subject, as he understood the Imaum's vessel was required to return in the last week of June, or the first of the present month. Under those circumstances, he trusted the House would dispose of the resolution without further delay.

Mr. ADAMS, after alluding to his attempt to speak upon this subject on a former day, when he was cut short by the previous question, proceeded to make some remarks on the joint resolution as amended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He was glad to see that the resolution, in its amended form, took away that express authority given to the President, as it was originally worded.

After some further remarks, Mr. A. said he considered this subject one of a very important character, and which required mature deliberation. He then referred to the various instances when application had been made to Congress respecting the disposal of such presents, and expressed a hope that the House would pause before giving its sanction to the resolution. He then went into an examination of the circumstances under which presents had been refused on previous occasions, and contended that the argument that a non-acceptance of the presents would give offence, was mere pretence.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a statement showing the number of passengers arriving in the various ports of the United States from foreign countries during the last year; which was,

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Various bills from the Senate lying on the SPEAKER's table were taken up, and appropriately referred.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," coming up in its order for reference,

Mr. PICKENS said: Considering the late period of the session, and the almost impossibility of a full and thorough discussion on its merits—considering, also, the great interests involved, and that it embraces principles novel in our legislation, and its retrospective action being of doubtful constitutionality, and injurious to sound merchants—considering, also, that it does not propose a sooner action than the first of February next—under these circumstances, I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. STANLY called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in till 180 members answered to their names; when

Mr. WELLER moved that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with; which motion was agreed to—ayes 77, noes 55.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. PICKENS to lay on the table, and the yeas and nays having been ordered on that motion, were—yeas 102, nays 89, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Baker, Bell, Biddle, Briggs, Brockway, Albert G. Brown, Wm. O. Butler, Calhoun, Carter, Chapman, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, James Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dennis, Dellet, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Giddings, Graves, Green, Grinnell, Habersham, William S. Hastings Henry, Hoffman, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, King, Leet, Lincoln, Mallory, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Ogle, Palen, Parris, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Rayner, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Albert Smith, Stanly, Strong, Jacob Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, Wick, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—89.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

Various other Senate bills were read, and appropriately referred.

The bill granting two townships of land to the University of the Territory of Iowa, which had been returned from the Senate, with an amendment, was taken up—

And, on motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (on leave) presented a memorial, which was referred.

On motion of Mr. PETRIKIN, the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LINCOLN of Mass. in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. REED, (submitted last evening, and left undecided for want of a quorum,) to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $60,000 for the preparation and commencement of the third steam vessel, authorized by the act of March 3d, 1839.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to amend the bill by striking out the following words:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the following sum, being the unexpended balance of a former appropriation which has been carried to the credit of the surplus fund, be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated, viz:

"For the purchase of a site and the construction of a dry dock for the naval service in the harbor of New York, as authorized by the act of the 3d March, 1835, $9,563 61."

Mr. P. contended that there were as many dry docks as were necessary to repair vessels. He alluded also to some recent invention of floating docks, which, he said, would supersede the necessity of dry docks, and which could be constructed to the number of twenty floating docks for a single dry dock.

After a few brief remarks from Mr. STANLY and Mr. FISHER in reply, the question was taken by tellers on the amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes 77, noes 67.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON said he would vote for the appropriation for a dry dock at New York, because he believed it necessary. He wished, however, to offer an amendment making an appropriation for the establishment of a dock at Pensacola. Mr. T. then, with much force, described the advantages of Pensacola, and the great importance of our having a naval depot at that place. His proposed amendment was, however, ruled out of order.

Mr. PETRIKIN then, as a point of order, insisted that there was no law authorizing the construction of a dry dock at New York.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said the gentleman was mistaken. There had been three several acts passed; one authorizing the construction of a dry dock at Charlestown, Massachusetts; one at Gosport, Virginia; and one at New York.

Mr. PETRIKIN was understood to argue that the law giving the power in relation to the site and construction of a dry dock at New York had expired.

Mr. JONES said that the law was now in full force in the statute book.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS inquired if this appropriation was included in the estimates?

Mr. JONES of Virginia replied that it was.

Mr. PETRIKIN was understood to inquire whether any estimate had been made of the whole cost of the construction?

To this question, the reply was understood to be in the negative.

Mr. LEADBETTER opposed the appropriation. He considered there were dry docks enough already, and if a vessel at New York wanted repair, why could it not be sent to Charlestown before it was too rotten, and there be repaired?

Mr. RAMSEY did not wish to raise unnecessary objections to the defence of the country or the improvement of the navy. What he wanted was that we should have a strict estimate of what such works would cost. He was opposed to the present system of plunging into extravagant expenditures in the erection of our public works. He wished gentlemen to look at our public works, and the immense difference between the estimates and the actual cost. He was opposed to the erection of a dry dock in New York, because he believed it unnecessary. He had also voted against the construction of a dry dock in his own State upon the same ground. We had already two dry docks, which cost a million and a half of dollars, and these in his opinion were amply sufficient for the number of vessels we had.

Mr. GRINNELL advocated the appropriation, and commented upon the peculiar advantages possessed by New York, which pointed her out as the most eligible spot for the erection of a dock.

Mr. SMITH of Maine called attention to the fact that by the discovery of a new channel by Lieutenant Gedney, the only plausible objection to the selection of New York for the erection of a dock, was removed. After the subject had been in agitation for five years, he hoped there would be no further objection.

Mr. JONES of Virginia, stated that as a further reason for the erection of a dock at New York, he would read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, by which it would be seen that there were two vessels of the line at that place in so bad a condition that they could not be removed without an almost total loss.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, JULY 14, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 33.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

Mr. J. accordingly read the letter of the Secretary, which strongly recommended the immediate commencement of the dock.

Mr. ANDERSON said, that he agreed entirely with his friend from Onio and the honorable member from Pennsylvania, that in the present exhausted condtion of the Treasury, we should make new appropriations with great care, and as sparingly as a proper regard to the paramount interests of the country would permit; and he was free to confess, that if the work for which the item of appropriation now under consideration was intended to provide, was one of those which required but little time to execute, he would prefer to postpone it until the finances of the country were in a condition better able to justify the expenditure. But it would be considered by the committee, that the construction of the work would necessarily require much time, and the appropriation now proposed would enable the Department only to take the preparatory steps towards the prosecution of the improvement contemplated.

With regard to the importance and necessity of a dry dock, not only at the Navy Yard at New York, but ultimately at all our principal naval establishments, Mr. A. entertained a strong conviction that they would be found indispensable to the successful prosecution of our naval operations. We had now but two, located at Charleston and Norfolk, and he believed it would be acknowledged by every one at all acquainted with the naval service, that this number was entirely inadequate to the present, much less the prospective necessities of the service. Were it the pleasure of the committee to provide for the construction of two works of this kind at the present session, he would with great pleasure go for the amendment of his friend from Pennsylvania, and provide for the commencement of a similar work at the navy yard at Philadelphia. But it must be obvious that in the present condition of our finances, it would be hopeless to expect that more than one of these works would be authorized at the present session; and he could not doubt that the navy yard at New York was fairly entitled to the priority, and he believed he could say that in this opinion the Committee on Naval Affairs, who had given the subject some attention, fully concurred. He would suggest, then, to the honorable member from Pennsylvania, whether he would expedite the construction of a dock at Philadelphia, by defeating the proposed appropriation for such a work at New York? If the work was as important as he fully believed it to be, Mr. A. thought it could not be commenced too soon; and he hoped, therefore, that the item of appropriation providing for its commencement would be retained in the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi contended that in the erection of public works, a due regard should be had to the interests of the whole country. If there were funds sufficient for building a dry dock at all, he would advocate its location at Pensacola. He then at some length described the advantages of that section of the country watered by the Mississippi, and the great injury an enemy might do by obtaining possession of it.

Mr. REED made a few remarks (in reply to a statement of Mr. PETRIKIN) in which he scouted the idea of any present discovery embracing any successful substitute for dry docks.

As to dry docks at the South, he would go for them on all proper occasions when they were shown to be necessary. The only object of the present intimation of the fitness of other places seemed to him to be to defeat the appropriation for the construction at New York.

Mr. HOLLEMAN thought that the Treasury of the country was not in a situation to enable us to build additional dry docks, but thought that if another was to be built, it was more important at Pensacola than elsewhere.

Mr. HOFFMAN deprecated the appeal which had been made, in the course of the debate, to sectional feeling—contending that the only question for the consideration of the committee was, whether a dry dock would be useful to the navy. If so, the appropriation should be made, no matter where the particular spot might be—on the East, the West, the North, or the South. He looked upon the whole system as a great measure connected with the naval defence of our country—to endure now and in all future time, to enable our navy again to go forth conquering and to conquer. Mr. H. went into an examination of the policy of constructing these works at the points most convenient, contrasting it with the policy of England, and contending that the dry docks for the navy of the United States ought to be in proportion as 3 or 4 to 1 for the navy of Great Britain, because the force of the latter was always in commission. For his own part, he would stud our coast with dry docks, beginning at the North, and going down to smaller constructions in the waters of the South, according to their depth. He would build them wherever they might be required. But a beginning must be made, and none could be more appropriate than this.

Mr. SERGEANT expressed himself in favor of dry docks, and of the appropriation now proposed for that at New York. But he put it to the gentlemen in favor of such a work at Pensacola, whether they were likely to gain their point by stoppings the appropriation for the work at New York.

Mr. TILLINGHAST also supported the appropriation; and in doing so, submitted some general remarks in relation to the peculiar fitness and advantages of the waters of the Narragansett bay for a naval depot.

And the question was then put on the motion of Mr. PETIKIN to strike out the said section.

A large majority of those present stood up in the negative, but no quorum voted.

It wanted now only about four or five minutes of the usual hour of recess, and an informal proposition was made never to mind so brief a space, but to go home to dinner like gentlemen and good Christians.

The CHAIRMAN said this could be done by general consent. Whereupon, in less than two shakes, the hall was cleared.

And the House took its usual recess until 4 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

The House went again into Committee of the Whole—Mr. LINCOLN in the Chair, on the

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL;

But there being no quorum present,

Mr. CUSHING embraced that opportunity for the purpose of making a few remarks in relation to the employment of a portion of our navy, and the obstructions to our commerce, occasioned by the blockade of the river La Plata; and anticipating the time when his remarks on the question of reporting the bill would be in order, and to save the time of the House, he would move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, so as to make his remarks in order now, while the House was assembling.

Mr. C. after some further preliminary remarks, observed, among other things, that he did not mean to deny that France was sincere in her attempt to obtain redress from the Argentine Republic, for which purpose the blockade had been instituted, which interfered so seriously with our commerce.

Mr C. then proceeded to show that, although there was no actual war between France and the Argentine Republic, nor any adequate cause for war, at least on the part of France; yet the consequence to the commerce of this country and Great Britain, as neutral nations, was precisely the same as if there were actual war. He therefore wished to know if it was proper we should submit to the inconvenience of such a blockade, without an actual war between the parties. The law of nations, as hitherto understood, did not recognise in one nation a right to blockade the ports of another, to the exclusion of neutral powers, unless such blockade were consequent upon a declaration of war. He contended that the course now pursuing by France was an innovation on the law of blockade, and which subjected us to all the inconveniences of an actual war between the two countries, without giving correspondent advantages.

Mr. C. then referred to various authorities to show that he was correct in the view he had taken, and that such a blockade was an unlawful one, as it was not consequent on a declaration of war, and neither of the parties admitted an actual fact of war. The operation of this blockade upon our commerce was unjust. It was, in fact, a war in disguise upon the trade of this country and Great Britain by excluding the commerce of the two powers.

This question was also important in relation to the affairs which had grown up in the East. Mr. C. then referred to the circumstances attending the blockade of Canton by the British; and observed that if Great Britain, after protesting against the conduct of France in blockading, without an actual declaration of war, should pursue the same course herself with regard to China, then an advantage would accrue to this country: for our Government and our merchants might, upon the authority of Great Britain herself, make retaliation for the injury done us by such a blockade. And the time might, and probably would, come, when circumstances might require us to adopt the same system of peaceable blockade. It would be remembered that we were about pursuing a similar course some time ago, in order to enforce our claims on Mexico; and should England and France, the two leading powers of Europe, concur in adopting that system, then, whenever circumstances might require, we should have the right, on her own principle, to exclude Great Britain from any of the countries of Spanish America with which we might happen to have differences.

After some further remarks, in which he urged the necessity of our showing that we were alive to this matter, Mr. C. said that, as a quorum had now arrived, and he had accomplished his object, he would withdraw his motion.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. PETRIKIN to strike out the appropriation for a dry dock at New York, and decided in the negative—ayes 39, noes 90.

Mr. McKAY inquired of the CHAIR whether it would be in order to offer an amendment, which was read for the information of the committee, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That at least one-fourth of it warrants conferring the rank of midshipman, shall, for the future, be granted to such persons qualified according to existing regulations, as shall have been duly enlisted in accordance with the provisions of the act to provide for the enlistment of boys for the naval service, approved March 2d, 1837, as shall by their good conduct and proficieney in their duties entitle themselves to promotion, under direction of the President.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment would not be in order; and Mr. McKAY did not press it.

Mr. GIDDINGS offered an amendment appropriating certain sums for the improvement of Grand, Huron, Black, and other rivers.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. DILLET said he understood that there would be no bill which it would be more appropriate to submit a motion which he intended to make, to amend, than this bill. He moved an amendment proposing to appropriate $55,450 68 to complete the improvements in Mobile harbor.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. DILLET said the work was now in progress; and the probability was that there would be no bill which it would be more appropriately in order to amend than this, and he therefore hoped the committee would consent to admit the amendment.

The CHAIR said the amendment was clearly out of order. He would suggest to the gentleman that the House could, at any time, order a bill to be reported in accordance with his wish.

The amendment was not further pressed.

Mr. HOLLEMAN moved an amendment appropriating $25,000 for constructing barracks at Brooklyn, Charlestown, and Gosport.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. HOLLEMAN contended that the amendment was in order—that it was to continue works upon which $50,000 had been expended on each, without completing them. The sum now paid by way of rent, was more than the interest on the amount that it would require to complete the buildings. Mr. H. dwelt on the importance of making the appropriation; and after a few remarks from Messrs. J. W. JONES and HOLLEMAN, whether the amount proposed to be appropriated had been included in the estimates, the subject was dropped.

Mr. MARK A. COOPER said he wished to have a vote on a proposition similar to one which the Committee of Ways and Means, of which he was a member, refused to entertain, that was, to reduce a certain class appropriations, including those to navy yards, twenty-five per cent. on the amount in the bill. He was induced to make the motion from a consideration of the present depressed state of the finances.

Mr. HOLMES repudiated the idea of such narrow legislation, such small economy as the reduction of twenty-five per cent. on the expenditures for our navy yards. With a country stretching over so many degrees of longitude, and with a commerce extended through the world, was it not paltry to talk about a reduction of twenty-five per cent. in the finances of the country for the repair of navy yards? Mr. H. then adverted to our deplorable condition last year, when we were upon the eve of plunging into a war with one of the greatest European powers, and urged the necessity of being prepared at all times for instant war. It was the duty of Government to be prepared for every emergency, and although the country might appear to sleep, like one of our noble seventy-fours on the bosom of the calm seas, yet should occasion require, we should then be ready to wake up in thunder upon our foes, and flash fire in the face of our enemies.

Mr. COOPER said he would go as far as any man to improve the condition of our navy. He was a friend to the navy; and if the Treasury was in a condition to justify it, he would not hesitate to make larger appropriations than now contained in the bill; but he thought that the reduction in the expenditures should be commensurate with the reduction in the revenues. His rule of action was that the garment should be cut according to his cloth.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said, if there was any one branch of the service which had undergone strict scrutiny, it was this. He was understood to say that it had undergone a reduction of fifty per cent. from former appropriations, or $75,000 less than for the same objects last year.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES, the bill was ordered to be reported to the House.

The bill having been read through, and the question being on concurring with the committee in their amendments, and, on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. WELLER moved the previous question; which received a second—ayes 77, noes 66.

Mr. HABERSHAM wished to introduce the amendment which had been offered by him in Committee of the Whole and rejected, restricting the draft of the third steam ship proposed to be built to sixteen feet water, so as to enable that steamer, if necessary for the defence of the South, to navigate the southern rivers. He demanded the yeas and nays on the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" The yeas and nays were not ordered; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. PARRIS of Maine moved to reconsider the vote seconding the previous question; which question was taken by tellers, Messrs. WELLER and L. WILLIAMS acting as such, who reported that there were—ayes 48, noes 73.

So the House refused to reconsider the second to the previous question.

The question now recurring on the question of concurring with the amendments of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the bill, and

The question being on the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means appropriating $670,000 to reimburse after the year 1841, that amount of the fund for the gradual improvement of the navy, which had been, and is proposed to be, expended for the construction of the steamships authorized to be built last year.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 15, nays 86.

No quorum having voted, the roll was again called, and the vote was—yeas 105, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Briggs, Brockway, Burke, Calhoun, Carroll, Carter, Chapman, Chittenden, Craig, Cranston, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Davies, John Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dennis, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Galbraith, J. Garland, Gates, Goggin, Habersham, Hammond, Hand, William S. Hastings, John Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Holleman, Hopkins, Hunt, Jackson, James, Jenifer, Charles Johnston, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kempshall, Kille, Leet, Lincoln, McKay, Marchand, Marvin, Miller, Monroe, Montanya, Naylor, Newhard, Osborne, Parmenter, Paynter, Pickens, Prentiss, Randolph, Reed, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, James Rogers, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Shaw, Shepard, Simonton, Slade, Albert Smith, John Smith, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, D. D. Wagener, Peter J. Wagner, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, and Henry Williams—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Banks, Blackwell, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Sampson H. Butler, William O. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Casey, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Dellet, Fornance, Gerry, Giddings, Goode, Green, Griffin, Hawkins, Hubbard, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Leadbetter, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, Morgan, Parrish, Parris, Petrikin, Pope, Proffit, Rariden, Reynolds, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Warren, Watterson, Weller, and Lewis Williams—46.

So the House concurred with the committee in their first amendment.

The House then concurred with the committee in the amendment proposed by Mr. REED, transferring and placing under one head of appropriation the appropriation for building, replacing, and repairing vessels, and for ordnance, &c.

The question now being on concurring with the third amendment of the committee, as proposed by Mr. REED, appropriating $60,000 for constructing the third steam vessel ordered to be built last year,

Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the yeas and nays, which having been ordered, were—yeas 78, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, John W. Allen, H. J. Anderson, Andrews, Baker, Beatty, Briggs, Brockway, Bynum, Calhoun, Carroll, Carter, Chittenden, M. A. Cooper, Cranston, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, John Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dennis, Doig, Earl, Everett, Galbraith, Gates, Goggin, Grinnell, Habersham, Hand, Wm. S. Hastings, John

Hastings, Hawes, Hoffman, Holleman, Holmes, Hunt, Jackson, James, Jonifer, Charles Johnston, Kemble, Kempshall, Kille, King, Lincoln, Marchand, Marvin, Miller, Monroe, Morgan, Naylor, Newhard, Osborne, Palen, Parmenter, Paynter, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Russel, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Starkweather, Stuart, Sumter, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, P. J. Wagner, and Tho. W. Williams—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Connor, J. Cooper, Craig, Davee, Dellet, Eastman, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Gerry, Giddings, Goode, Green, Griffin, Hammond, Hawkins, Henry, Howard, Cave Johnson, N. Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Leadbetter, Leet, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Montanya, C. Morris, Parrish, Parris, Petrikin, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Rariden, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, J. Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Strong, Swearingen, Sweney, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Underwood, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Jared W. Williams, and Lewis Williams—52.

So that amendment was concurred in.

The fourth amendment of the committee reappropriating the prize money was agreed to.

The question now being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays; which the House refused to order.

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and it was read the third time; and the question being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. PETRIKIN moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with instructions so to amend it as to strike out the appropriation for a dry dock at New York.

Mr P. advocated his motion to recommit with much warmth. He alluded to the present state of the Treasury, and contended that we were not now prepared to expend so much money in the erection of a dry dock which was not wanted. He called upon gentlemen not to waste the money of the people in that manner. For his part, he was an advocate of equal rights; and when they legislated, it ought to be for the good of the poor as well as the rich speculators. He declared that whatever others might do, he would never vote for any thing which was in direct violation of the professions he made to the world. He called upon the House to be just before it was generous, and, above all things, to be honest. Let those gentlemen who made such professions of economy, now walk up to the chalk. Let them come up to the crack like men, and show the country their votes. If this appropriation for a useless dry dock at New York was to be made, taking $95,000 of the people's money for a beginning, which would actually cost a million, let the country see who it was that voted. He was determined to let it be seen if he could, and he desired the yeas and nays on his motion might be taken. Let gentleman come up to the chalk on the yeas and nays; let there be no skulking in the matter.

Mr. HOFFMAN then sprung upon his feet, and said that on a certain occasion after a thrilling speech in the British House of Commons, an immediate adjournment was moved, lest by other speakers the enraptured hearers should be awoke from the trance into which they had been thrown. So, said Mr. H after hearing so sublime an appeal from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in order that the effect it has produced may not be marred by the humbler speeches of other members, I move the previous question.

Which received a second—ayes 72, noes 39.

So the motion to recommit was cut off.

The main question was ordered to be put, and the question being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 154, nays 10.

Mr. CARR inquired of the CHAIR whether it was not, under the rule, obligatory for every member in his seat to vote.

Mr. STANLY said the gentleman looked towards him; and he defied him to compel him to vote.

Mr. CARR said he did allude to the gentleman from North Carolina and others. The rule should be enforced upon them.

So the bill was passed.

Mr PROFFIT asked the general consent of the House to go into committee for the remainder of the evening, on the bill from the Senate entitled an act to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected by her for that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes. Mr. P. said he was willing that the bill should be passed upon without debate, and he would not debate it unless called upon to explain its provisions.

Mr. JONES of Virginia had no objection, if the bill would not give rise to debate, but he was of opinion that it would; and he did not think that this bill should be taken up in preference to the appropriation bills. They should be acted upon first.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said the best course to get speedy action upon the bill would be to discharge the Committee of the Whole, so as to bring it before the House; he therefore made that motion.

A debate of a conversational character here took place; and before the question was taken,

Mr. STEENROD moved that the House adjourn; which was agreed to on count—ayes 75, noes 57.

The House accordingly adjourned.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, July 8, 1840.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented the memorial of the Anti-Slavery Society of Eastern Pennsylvania, requesting Congress "to take such measures as will be most consistent with sound policy and with equal justice to all the States and all the inhabitants of the Union, for the purpose of amending the Constitution and laws of the United States, so as to abolish all requirement upon the people of this Commonwealth to participate in any manner in holding human beings in slavery."

The question upon the reception of this memorial was laid upon the table, on the motion of Mr. LUMPKIN of Georgia, and in accordance with the practice of the Senate in such cases.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred

The bill for the relief of Gideon Sheldon; and

The bill for the relief of Jared Winslow; reported the same without amendment, and recommended their passage.

Mr. P. also, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports on the bill for the relief of Robert Frazier and the bill for the relief of Helen Miller.

Mr. PRENTISS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bills for the relief of William Neel, George Hommill, and Charles Risley, made unfavorable reports thereon.

Mr. HENDERSON, in pursuance of notice, asked and obtained leave to introdude a joint resolution for the relief of the West Feliciana Railroad Company; which was read, and ordered to a second reading; and after some remarks by Messrs. HENDERSON and WRIGHT, it was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill from the House making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1840, was read twice and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, the bill to establish ports of entry in the States of Arkansas and Missouri, and allow debenture on foreign goods conveyed over land from such ports to Mexico, was taken up, and Mr. D. offered a substitute for the bill, the provisions of which he explained at some length.

Mr. LINN submitted some remarks in favor of the measure, in the course of which he dwelt on the value and importance of the Indian trade, and the propriety of extending the privilege of debenture to goods for the use of that trade. The import of gold dust from the upper provinces of Mexico during the last year into the town of Fulton alone, amounted in value to $420,000, and the products of the Indian trade for the same period, which reached the city of St. Louis, amounted to upwards of $450,000.

After some further remarks by Messrs. DAVIS and LINN, the amendment was agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion by Mr. NORVELL, the bill to extend the privilege of debenture to foreign merchandise in certain cases was taken up, and after some remarks by Messrs. NORVELL, BUCHANAN, HUNTINGTON, and DAVIS, it was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS PASSED.

The bill from the House to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports;

The joint resolution directing the return to the State of Kentucky of 195 stands of arms;

The bill for the relief of the heirs of Miguel Eslava; and were severally read a third time and passed.

The bill for the relief of James H. Clark;

On motion by Mr. ROBINSON, the bill amendatory of several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department was taken up, and, after being discussed, by Messrs. HUNTINGTON, ROBINSON, DAVIS, and HUBBARD, was laid on the table.

Mr. PIERCE gave notice that, on Friday, as soon as the morning business was disposed of, he would ask the Senate to take up the bills reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, a resolution upon that subject introduced by him several days since, and the bills from the House granting relief to invalid and other pensioners.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Sylvester Phelps, and the heirs or legal representatives of Charles Landon, decided; and, after a discussion in which Messrs. PHELPS and KNIGHT advocated, and Mr. HUBBARD opposed the bill, on motion by Mr. H. it was indefinitely postponed—ayes 19, noes 13.

The bill for the benefit of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia Railroad Company was taken up, and after some remarks from Mr. BENTON in opposition, and Mr. CLAY of Alabama in favor, its further consideration was postponed until to-morrow.

The joint resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, so as to limit the term of office of the judges of the supreme and inferior courts, was taken up, and Mr. TAPPAN advocated its passage at length; and after some remarks from Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, also in favor of the resolution,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, its further consideration was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate then went into the consideration of Executive business,

And then adjournd.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, July 8, 1840.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of submitting a resolution setting apart Monday next for the consideration of business relating to the Territories.

After some debate of a conversational character, the question being taken on the motion to suspend, it was discovered that no quorum voted.

Mr CHAPMAN, at the suggestion of Mr. BRIGGS, then modified his resolution so as to set apart the first day after the passage of the appropriation bills, for the consideration of Territorial business, instead of Monday next.

Mr. WM. COST JOHNSON moved to amend by setting apart the following day for the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia.

The rules being suspended, the question was then taken on the first branch of the motion relating to the Territories, and it was agreed to without a count.

The question then recurring on the second branch, relating to the District business, it was rejected.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, presented a memorial from Mr. Trist, our Consul at Havana, in relation to ceriain charges against him, for which he had been arraigned before the country; and

Mr. CURTIS, on leave, presented a memorial from certain officers of the navy, complaining of the conduct of Mr. Trist. Both memorials, with the accompanying papers, were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the joint resolution of the Senate in relation to the presents from the Imaum of Muscat and the Emperor of Morocco. The question being on agreeing with the same, as reported yesterday with an amendment, by Mr. PICKENS, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs,

Mr. ADAMS being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks in opposition to the resolution, and in endeavoring to prove that the acceptance of the presents would be contrary to the former wise practice of our Government. He had not concluded when the morning hour had expired.

Mr. LEADBETTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the naval appropriation bill on yesterday was passed, for the purpose of submitting an amendment recommitting the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report on the probable expense of the erection of a dry dock at New York, the probable length of time, and the propriety of commencing such a work in the present condition of the Treasury.

The question being on the motion to reconsider,

Mr. STANLY demanded the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The main question on the motion to reconsider was then put, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: yeas 58, nays 125.

So the House refused to reconsider.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. EVANS of Maine in the chair.

Mr. PICKENS stated that on yesterday he had reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a bill appropriating $25,000 for the appointment of commissioners to explore and survey the Northeastern boundary. There could be no objection to it, as it was conformable to the appropriation of the resolution of 1837, which had never been put into execution. One reason why the Presesident ought to be empowered to appoint these commissioners, was the fact that an ex parte report and map had been seen (although informally) which had been drawn up by the British commissioners. And although that report had not yet been accepted by that Government, yet it was highly important that our own survey should be made. The bill had been read twice, and he asked a favor that it might be taken up, reported, and passed.

Objection being made, the bill was not taken up.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr JONES, the comittee took up the bill making appropriation for the support of the army for 1840.

Mr. CURTIS offered the following amendment, to come in after the 30th line of the bill, viz: "For the payment of the purchase money for the seven sites for marine hospitals on the Western waters, or so much thereof as may be necessary, which sites have been, or may hereafter be, selected by the President of the United States, in pursuance of the act of the 3d of March, 1837, forty five thousand dollars."

Mr. C. made some remarks, showing the propriety of Congress making an appropriation to carry into effect the law authorizing the President to select seven sites for marine hospitals. Six of the sites, he contended, had been actually contracted for by the board created under the law to make selections. He then went into a history of the causes of the delay, which was owing to conflicting interests between Wheeling and Pittsburgh for the seventh site.

Mr. JONES of Virginia opposed the introduction of the amendment into this bill, on the ground that it would be a departure from the rule which had governed the action of the committee, that no appropriation should be admitted except it was authorized by existing law, or was estimated for. The subject, he said, had not been brought to the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means, but was in fact before the Committee of Commerce, and that that committee had not reported the facts or merits of the question to the House. He thought the subject should go through a regular course of investigation before the committee before an appropriation should be made. If they were to legislate in this way, and to make appropriations to carry such subjects into effect, it would preclude the House from having such an opportunity for investigation of all questions before being called upon to vote, as it should have. If the Committee of Commerce had investigated the subject, the House have not been favored with the light of that investigation, and was not prepared to act upon the question. If the rules should be departed from to admit amendments of this kind, there was no telling at what time they would be enabled to report the bill. He was opposed to having the appropriation bills weighed down by amendments out of order. He hoped the gentleman offering the amendment would consent not to press the amendment, but that he would report it in a bill in regular order, and let it depend on its own merits.

Messrs. CURTIS, GRAVES, EVERETT, and BIDDLE advocated the adoption of the amendment, and contended that it was in order; and that the Government was bound in good faith to pay for the sites purchased.

Mr. STANLY opposed the amendment as being out of order, and thought that they should first provide for hospitals on the Eastern coast, and the coast of North Carolina particularly; and, accordingly, sent to the CHAIR the following amendment to the amendment, viz:

"For building a hospital at Ocracoke or Portsmouth, North Carolina, ten thousand dollars."

The CHAIR (Mr. EVANS) ruled the amendment to be out of order, there being no existing law which authorized the appropriation.

Mr. MARK A. COOPER coincided with the views of the chairman of Ways and Means, that nothing should be placed in this bill except what was strictly in order under the rule. But this was a good opportunity to test the sense of the committee whether the usual course should be departed from. If the rule was to be departed from, he had just claims of Georgia, which he would move to provide for by amending the bill. Economy of time required that the rules should not be departed from.

The amendment was further opposed by Messrs. WISE, JONES of Virginia, DAWSON, and REED, and supported by Messrs. GRAVES, BIDDLE, WADDY THOMPSON, UNDERWOOD, and PROFFIT, till 2½ o'clock, at which time the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess, no quorum being present,

Mr. UNDERWOOD embraced the opportunity to ask leave to make a report from the select committee appointed to examine the subject of the invention for preventing the explosion of steam boilers, by Major Raub.

Mr. U. said he would merely present the report, but did not intend to ask any action upon it, until there should be a quorum. As this was a subject of great importance to the community, he hoped there would be no objection to the reception of the report.

Mr. BIDDLE objected, on which,

Mr. UNDERWOOD said he would not press the report at that time.

The House then went again into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question pending being on the amendment offered by Mr. CURTIS for the erection of marine hospitals in the Western States,

Mr. REYNOLDS of Illinois said, he was not surprised that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] gave the preference so much to hospitals on the Atlantic, than those on the Western waters, where they do not exist at all. He seemed to think, also, that the Constitution did not warrant Congress in establishing hospitals on fresh waters. Every one is regulated more or less by early education, and the peculiar bent of mind during life. He said he would introduce a table from the spelling book, as from spelling books we may sometimes learn wise and excellent morals.

A city was seized, and the mode of defence was the question. The carpenter said that wood was the best material to use. The mason supposed stone was the best, and the tanner that leather was the best.

So with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE.] Mr. R. said, he was informed that the gentleman resides, and was raised on the shores of the Atlantic, and therefore it is very natural he should think the ocean is the most proper and only necessary place for hospitals. The same observation may be applied to himself, (Mr. R. said,) as he was raised, and now resides near the Mississippi. Each person has, very naturally, predilections for his own country.

He said, it was astonishing to him to hear any one oppose the establishment of hospitals on the Western waters, when we take into consideration the necessity for them. A great number of the most hardy and laborious class of our people is employed in navigating the Western waters; and their numbers and their business will increase with such rapidity, that it will astonish even themselves, who witness its daily progress.

Whether we obtain this appropriation for the establishment of hospitals or not, the onward march of population and commerce will not be checked or felt; but the necessity of these institutions will be increased every year. Nature has made the valley of the Mississippi the largest fertile region of country on earth. It extends from the Alleghany to the Rocky mountains, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the Lakes. This is a region of country that cannot be surpassed in fertility of soil, and mineral wealth. People in all parts of the globe know it, and are filling it up. The weight of population, the power and business of the United States, will, before long, be done in this valley. We will respect these old States as our decrepid parents; aged, respectable, and inefficient. This capital will not long contain the noisy bustling Congress. Congress belongs to the people, and will necessarily follow its master, the people, to their empire in the West. All these things are progressing, and the puny arm of man cannot arrest it. But it is doubted by some, if it be proper even to establish a few hospitals in this vast valley of the Mississippi.

On a recent occasion we attempted to have established a dry dock at Pensacola, which is said to be a place nearest to the mouth of the Mississippi, which is suitable for such improvements. This seemed to be an improvement to keep pace with other improvements in the valley; but we failed. New York had the power, and she got it. This may be right. It may be my feelings which make me think it so unjust. Now if we are deprived of the benefit of the hospitals, we may almost conclude that we, in the West, are not in the legislative Union at all.

Mr. R. said he placed this appropriation on an arrangement and express enactment of a law of a former Congress. It was agreed that certain hospitals should be established in the East, and certain others, on the western waters and the lakes. As far as he knew, this arrangement was carried out as to the East and on the lakes, and why not execute it also in the West? These arrangements should be held sacred and binding. We exist as a nation on a compromise and arrangement. How can we expect the people to observe the laws and perform their agreements, if we who enact the laws and make these arrangements do not show them the example. I cannot presume any individual here desires not to carry out an honest arrangement previously entered into by Congress.

Mr. R. said he would place this appropriation on the strict rules of law, and the courts of the country would give judgment that the appropriation should be made.

This whole matter rests on positive and written contract. An act of Congress authorizes the appointment of certain surgeons of the army to make selections of sites for hospitals, and to purchase such sites when selected. In pursuance of this authority, he was informed that the contracts were made, and now Congress is called on to make the appropriation to pay for these sites. It is almost useless to state, as almost all present are lawyers, that when an agent pursues his authority, he binds his principal. In this case, as the agents, as far as he knew, pursued their authority, the Government is bound to make payment according to the strict rules of law. It cannot be possible there is a member in the American Congress that is unwilling to execute a contract. If there is fraud in the transaction, it will vitiate the contract. None is alleged, and none can be presumed. If the agents have not pursued their authority, the Government in that case either would not be bound. I have not heard it proved that this was the case.

Some gentlemen say, we have no money in the Treasury for such appropriations. The Opposition say, we have a bankrupt Treasury; that we are crippled and deranged in the Treasury, &c. A poor Treasury is one of the pillars of the Democratic church. It is the best situation in which our Government can be placed; and he hoped that we might always have a poor Treasury and a substantial people.

That we have no money in the Treasury, and therefore we cannot go on with these necessary improvements, is not wise policy. It is in fact a mistaken notion, that we are not able to make these necessary appropriations. He said he had contended all this session of Congress that the nation is in a more solvent and efficient condition than it was since its existence. The want of money in the Treasury is positive proof of the fact.

The greater portion of our ordinary revenue is raised by the duty on the importation of goods from foreign countries. The importation is not so great as heretofore; and this is the greatest blessing that could be visited on the country. By this course of policy, we are continuing the alarming foreign debt for these goods. We are doing without them, and supplying ourselves with our own fabrics. Our wealth and substance are retained at home, and not drained from us to pay for foreign luxuries. And although money be not in the Treasury, arising from the importation of goods, yet the wealth and substance is with the people, who are the basis of these appropriations, and not the Treasury. This being the fact, although the money may not be in the Treasury, it is with the people, abundantly sufficient to pay these appropriations. If it be not directly available, a loan, or a further issue of Treasury notes, will not only be allowable, but praiseworthy, on such an occasion as the one now before the committee.

Mr. R. remarked that he was sorry to see his friend [the Hon. Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama,] who agreed so well with him in all matters before them on the Committee on the Public Lands, now leaning off from the poor workingmen who navigate the Western waters. There is no man who goes farther for pre-emptions and pre emptors than Mr. H; and, on the same principles, Mr. R. supposed his friend would join in the good cause. He must leave him—he cannot convince him.

Mr. R. could not see how the Constitution could have a fresh water and salt water construction, to be different. Commerce contemplated in the Constitution, had no such distinction; commerce may exist as well on one water as another. It may exist on land; and hospitals may as well be established on a mountain for "hog drovers" (as the gentleman, Mr. WISE called them) as on the margin of a river, or the sea, for watermen. The power is the same in the Constitution for all these cases.

Mr. R. said he may not be able on this occasion to change the vote of a single member of this committee, but he would have the consolation of his own heart that he made the effort. He knew and saw many of these sailors on the western waters; he knew their situation; he was satisfied they needed these hospitals. In a few days, on the western waters, they would change their climate from one extreme to the other, and thereby cause much sickness among them. They were poor, and compelled to resort to the rivers for a support. They would, therefore, by their avocation, be exposed to sickness, and then forced, without money, on the shores amongst strangers. They may, also, frequently be afflicted with contagious diseases, so that private families are not willing to take them into charge. These were facts which he stated, that every one knows who is acquainted with the Western waters. It is for the sake of these people; and to satisfy his own heart in relation to them, that he made these desultory remarks, without any meditation whatever, every one will see. It is the overflowing of his feelings for those men, that makes him trouble the committee on this occasion. They have always come to his rescue in the hour of need, and that time will never exist when he would desert them. He hoped, sincerely, the appropriation may succeed.

It was further advocated by Messrs. UNDERWOOD, ALLEN, TILLINGHAST, CUSHING, and REED, and opposed by Messrs. WISE, and HUBBARD.

At a subsequent period of the debate,

Mr. WISE raised a point of order on two grounds: first, as this subject had been referred to the Committee on Commerce, who had not yet reported, the present committee could not take cognizance of it; and second, that the introduction of the proposition, embracing a subject different to the bill under consideration, was a violation of the fiftieth rule.

The CHAIR decided that the motion to amend the bill was in order.

From this discussion, Mr. WISE took an appeal, but the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed by tellers as follows—ayes 50 noes 42: no quorum.

The Committee then rose, and the fact was reported to the House, when,

On motion of Mr. LEET,

The House then adjourned.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, July 9, 1840.

The CHAIR submitted a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement showing the appropriations to be expended in the District of Columbia since the location of the seat of Government therein; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

[From this statement, the total amount appears to be $9.205,995 85.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from the tobacco planters of Garretsburg, Kentucky, showing the burdens to which that trade had been subjected, and joining in the views taken by the convention at Washington.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported House bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1840, with amendments.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported the House bill to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia, with several amendments; one of which provides "that the said banks shall be entitled to and enjoy all the rights and privileges conferred by their respective original charters until the fourth day of July, eighteen hundred and forty-two, unless Congress shall before that time otherwise direct, on condition that they shall, each for itself, resume specie payments on or before the fifteenth day of January next, or sooner, and simultaneous with the majority of the incorporated banks in the cities of Baltimore and Richmond, if a majority of said banks should sooner resume specie payments."

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petition of the heirs of Thomas Stewart and the petition of William Dickinson, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. W. from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Lyman Bristol, made a favorable report thereon.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, reported unfavorably on the bill for the relief of James Fleming.

LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. WALL, proceeded to the consideration of the bill to publish a stereotype edition of all the laws and treaties of the United States, the Declaration of Independence, Articles of Confederation, Constitution, &c. under the superintendence and direction of the Attorney General.

Mr. LUMPKIN moved to strike out the words in the bill which provides for giving one copy of said laws to each Senator and Representative and Delegate in Congress. He said he was opposed, utterly opposed, to the whole practice and system which had of late years increased to an alarming extent, of Congress voting books to themselves. Mr. L. said, for himself, he never had, or would, vote for the printing of a book for himself, as a member of Congress. He would buy such books as he desired for himself, or do without them. He was not prepared to say that the proposed edition of the laws was not necessary and proper; but he protested against a gratuitous distribution amongst members of Congress. If it be proper, said Mr. L. to give to the present members of Congress a new and complete edition of the laws of the United States, it would be equally proper and just to provide for a copy to be given to every gentleman who ever has or may be a member of either branch of Congress. But, said Mr. L. I will not enlarge upon the arguments which might be offered in support of the proposition which I have submitted, unless it shall become necessary from the remarks of Senators who differ with me in opinion on this subject; but will content myself by asking the yeas and nays on the question which I have submitted.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he would say a few words before the question was taken. He was wholly indifferent whether the motion prevailed to strike out or not. He was quite as willing to purchase his own books as any other Senator, but he considered this a small business. He had heard much and seen much on this question; he had seen the Senate refuse to distribute books useful to members in the discharge of their official duties here, after they had been paid for, and those books are now useless; and yet he had seen large boxes of public documents, bound at the expense of Government, directed by Senators to their homes. He considered these documents, as he did the franking privilege of members, beneficial to the people, as they had the use of the documents as well as the information of the member, at his residence, in the one case, and the benefit of sending their communications to, and receiving public documents from their members, in the other case, free of postage. He considered both as the privilege of the people, and used for their benefit, as well as to enable the member the better to discharge his duty to his constituents. He did not complain of this; but he had said he considered this a small business. The provision moved to be stricken out is contained in every act that had passed, as he understood

Mr. LUMPKIN said he felt himself called upon to make a few words of reply to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. SMITH.] That Senator was so elevated in his views and feelings, that his principal objection to striking out this book provision for members of Congress, seemed to consist in its being a small, a trivial matter—a matter not worth the special attention of an honorable Senator of Congress. Sir, that gentleman and myself differ widely in feelings and opinion upon this subject. The more elevated the station, the broader the trust; in due proportion do I feel myself bound to attend to what are called small matters. Yes, sir, human life, even in those who are most distinguished and elevated, is made up chiefly of small things. It is not the lot of human life, in any condition, to find a perfect or useful character, made up exclusively of great actions.

Mr. President, he who desires to discharge his duty as a Senator on this floor, should be careful how he views with censure the consideration of matters which are, in this hall, considered of small importance. Our daily duty requires of us vigilance and attention to small things. I do not, however, sir, consider this appropriation of thousands of dollars to print and purchase books for members of Congress, a very small matter. I consider it an abuse of privilege on the part of members of Congress, which, if not checked, and put down, will be productive of evils of the greatest magnitude.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. SMITH] seems to rely for justification in voting these books to members of Congress, upon the fact, that under the authority of Congress, members are already burdened with a most enormous amount of printing in the form of documents, which are bound up in the form of books. He has adverted to various items of extravagance in printing, and privileges of franking, and other contingencies, which have of late years become the ordinary expenses of Congress. Mr. President, the picture drawn by the Senator, of these extravagant and useless expenditures, is not too strong; but I must admit my surprise at the use which the Senator upon this occasion seems disposed to make of the facts which he has presented. The Senator's conclusion seems to be this: because Congress have become extravagant in printing and other contingent expenses, therefore we are not to resist any proposition which may be made to enlarge and increase the extravagance complained of. Sir, my object is to check all the extravagances complained of.

For myself, sir, I am heartily tired of the extravagance of Congress, in both talking and printing. As to the books printed for the use of Congress, I consider most of them useless lumber. They may serve to set off libraries, but very few of them will ever be read. I can buy more valuable books for one hundred dollars, than the intrinsic value of five hundred dollars' cost of books printed under the authority of Congress.

Mr. WALL said he did not expect this to be made a test question. The committee, in adopting this part of the bill, had adhered to former usage, leaving it to the Senate to amend as they might think proper. But Mr. W. would vote against striking out this clause, and he should then move and vote to strike out the whole section.

Mr. DAVIS said it was not a test question, and he might, perhaps, vote for the amendment, and then vote against the whole bill.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he should vote for the amendment and against the bill.

The amendment of Mr. LUMPKIN, striking out the distribution to members of Congress, was agreed to—yeas 31, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, and Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Cuthbert, Merrick, Norvell, Smith of Indiana, Wall, and White—6.

On motion of Mr. WALL, the whole section relating to the distribution of the work was now stricken out without dissent.

On motion of Mr. CLAY of Alabama, the private and local laws were required to be published in volumes separate from the public and general laws, and the general index to be published in a separate volume.

On motion of Mr. TAPPAN, the publishers, instead of being limited to the edition of 2,000 copies, were authorized to supply the general demand for the work at such a price as the Attorney General should deem a fair, proper, and reasonable compensation.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to strike out the sum of $3,000, as compensation to the Attorney General, and appropriating that sum for the preparatory expenses [illegible]dant on the work.

This was advocated by Mr. HUBBARD, opposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama, and by Mr. GRUNDY, and rejected as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Davis, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Tappan, and Walker—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Norvell, Phelps, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Wall, White, Wright, and Young—16.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to reduce the compensation and expenses of the Attorney General from $3,000 to $2,000. After a long delate by Mr. R. for, and by Messrs. WALL, GRUNDY, BUCHANAN, and CRITTENDEN against this amendment, it was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Pierce, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tappan, White, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Merrick, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Roane, Strange, Sturgeon, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—18.

Mr. HUNTINGTON inquired if the committee had made any estimate of the whole expense of the work, a point which he deemed important, in the present state of the Treasury.

Mr. WALL said, not with accuracy; but it was judged that the work would cost from $1 12½ to $1 75 per volume, (of seven volumes.)

On the question of engrossing the bill, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the bill was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Pierce, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, White, Williams, Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Tallmadge—23.

SPECIAL ORDERS.

The first special order being the joint resolution introduced by Mr. TAPPAN, so to amend the Constitution of the United States as to limit the tenure of office of the judges of all the courts of the United States, was taken up.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky moved to lay this resolution on the table, with a view to take up the bill from the House to regulate and equalize the mileage of members of Congress.

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the motion of Mr. CLAY was negatived—yeas 21, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Wall and White—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Smith of Conn. Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—22.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, said this day had been expressly assigned for the consideration of the mileage bill, and, under the circumstances, he deemed it improper that any other should take precedence of it. It had been brought to this House three or four weeks ago, and had not been reported on by the committee till within three or four days; and there had never been a formal call of the committee to act upon it. He moved, therefore, to postpone the joint resolution on the Constitution, and make it the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. NORVELL said, that he should not feel himself called upon to notice any thing which had fallen from the honorable Senator, [Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,] but for the imputation, implied at least, cast by that Senator upon him as chairman of the committee on the mileage bill. When the bill was referred to the committee, three or four weeks ago, he had before him one or two subjects of equal importance with the mileage bill. The charter of the city of Washington—a subject referred to another committee, of which he was chairman, one week before the reference of the other measure—had occupied his attention for nearly three weeks: and when the committee had despatched that matter, so far as to report it back to the Senate, he was ready to act upon the mileage bill. The Senator from Kentucky was then absent in Virginia. Upon his return, the Senator called on him to ascertain when he would convene the committee, and added that he could not or should not attend the meeting, but that he wished to be considered as in favor of the bill. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] another member of the committee, was immediately informed of what had been said by the Senator from Kentucky. He, too, had expressed his desire to be set down as in favor of the bill. It then only remained for him to consult the remaining members of the committee. That he had done, and the result was the report which had been made against the bill, with a recommendation that it should be indefinitely postponed. He had deemed it proper to say thus much in explanation, and to repel the unwarrantable imputation attempted to be cast upon him by the Senator from Kentucky.

The motion was then debated at considerable length, in which the merits of the two antagonistical questions were to some extent discussed by Messrs. CLAY of Alabama, WALKER, TAPPAN, CALHOUN, and ALLEN.

Mr. LUMPKIN said: Mr. President, having just voted against laying the resolutions of the Senator from Ohio on the table, and intending now to vote in favor of the postponement of their consideration till Monday next, I consider a word of explanation due to myself and the Senate. My vote against laying on the table was given under the impression, that such a disposition of the subject might be construed into a disapprobation of the proposed amendment of the Constitution, when, sir I feel no such disapprobation. I have long believed, that no man living is entitled to a life estate in any office whatever, under the true spirit of our institutions. But, sir, the importance of the subject well entitles it to the grave and deliberate consideration of the Senate. We should never act precipitately when considering a subject involoing an important alteration in our fundamental law, the Constitution of our country, bequeathed to us by the fathers of our glorious Revolution. I consider the proposition to postpone for a few days only, as varying the question. It gives time for further deliberation, without the slightest indication of opposition to the proposed amendment.

Moreover, sir, I am as anxious as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] to have the direct and speedy action of the Senate upon the subject of fixing the mileage of the members of Congress. The House of Representatives have sent us a bill upon the subject, and it is our duty to pass upon the merits of that bill. I am fully prepared to say, the existing law or the practice which obtains under its provisions, demands speedy and decisive correction. The law upon this subject should have a uniform and well defined construction. Every member of Congress should be placed upon the same footing, and the custom should no longer be countenanced of members from the same neighborhood receiving mileage compensation, greatly varying in amount, which I understand is the case at present. Under these considerations, I shall vote for the postponement of the resolutions until Monday next, when I hope they may be taken up and further discussed.

Mr. CLAY's motion was carried in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, and White—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, and Young—19.

The other special orders were now postponed, by consent, and the mileage bill was taken up for consideration.

Mr. NORVELL moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he had a few remarks to make on that motion, and would proceed now, or wait till to-morrow morning, at the discretion of the Senate.

Mr. FULTON moved an adjournment, which was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Porter, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Walker, White, Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Wright—14.

So the Senate adjourned.

MESSRS. BLAIR AND RIVES: I was necessarily absent when the vote was taken to lay the Bankrupt bill, from the Senate, on the table. Had I been in my seat, I should have voted in the affirmative.
JOHN WHITE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, July 9, 1840.

The unfinished business of the morning hour was the joint resolution of the Senate authorizing the disposal of the presents from the Imaum of Muscat; the question pending being on agreeing to the same as amended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS being entitled to the floor, resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the resolution, and in censuring the conduct of our Consul for receiving the presents. He also argued at some length, showing the unconstitutionality of receiving such presents; and after he had concluded,

Mr. PICKENS said he would detain the House but a very few minutes in his reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

In the first place he would observe, with very great deference to the superior judgment of the gentleman, that more time had already been consumed than the merits of the case required. It also struck him that the venerable and very learned gentleman from Massachusetts had attached more importance to this particular case than it deserved.

In answer to the question of the gentleman as to whether I would sanction this as a general law, I most unhesitatingly and distinctly answer in the negative. So far from sanctioning a general law for the reception of presents from all foreign powers, I would be the very last man on this floor who would agree to it. On the contrary, I would most strenuously inculcate the policy recommended by the circular, directed to our foreign agents by General Jackson, prohibiting the reception of such presents.

But the circumstances of the present case are peculiar. The question is not whether the President, or any other officer, shall be authorized to accept the presents for his own private use, because they have been expressly refused by the officers of Government. The question is, whether, under the circumstances of the case, Congress shall control the presents, and dispose of them in the most convenient and suitable manner.

The President does not come here and ask us to authorize him to receive the presents for his own private benefit; they are tendered to the Government and people of the United States, as a mark of friendship and regard from Barbarian powers.

The gentleman asks what authority Congress has to act in this matter? I refer him to that section of the Constitution he himself has quoted, where officers are forbidden to accept presents unless by the consent of Congress.

But, in this case, we do not even assume the right of authorizing the officers to receive them. Our agents have refused them, and they are tendered to us now as the Representatives of the American people, and becomes us to act in accordance with the single provision of the Constitution, and dispose of this matter in a way most suitable to the public interest, and consistent with the national delicacy under all the circumstances of the case. A portion of these presents have been forced upon our Consul at Tangier, and are, in all probability, on their way to this country, and the other portion have been sent here by the Imaum of Muscat, not knowing our constitutional prohibition on the subject, and are with his agent in New York, tendered to the Government.

I have said that, in my opinion, the gentleman from Massachusetts has attached too much importance to this case. I think also that he has visited this poor Consul at Tangier with as unrelenting vengeance as certain persons of old did when they threw Daniel into the lion's den; the gentleman too, in this case, would have him given up to the mercy of the lions. As the Consul escaped, in the first instance, being torn to pieces by these beasts, the gentleman now thinks it his duty to perform the operation.

But, said Mr. P. I must be allowed to say that in my judgment, the gentleman has in several parts placed a forced construction upon that correspondence.

I join with him most fully, that our Consul ought not to submit, in the slightest degree, to the dictates of a tyrant, or to be intimidated into a deviation from his duty by the threats of any foreign power.

It is the motive that constitutes a just cause of offence. We should examine into the circumstances of the case, and see what intention governed the officer of the Emperor. Was it his intention to show our agent a mark of respect and regard, or was it his intention to treat us with contempt, and to insult our power?

Now the least reflection and examination of the correspondence will show that it was quite the reverse of disrespect; and that so far from our Government being treated with contempt, the greatest respect and kindness were intended. There was no want of respect to our Government manifested in the manner in which the presents were tendered to our Consul.

Who did not know that different nations had their own peculiar modes and forms, by which they addressed each other?

Among the different civilized nations of Europe, it was true, they understand the art of diplomacy, and their expressions of friendship and kindness were presented to each other upon scented rose paper, although the deadliest feelings of hostility might be entertained in fact.

But among barbarous nations, the case was otherwise. They had not learnt such refined hypocrisy. They acted on the old fashioned custom which prevailed at the foundation of society, and offered to foreign nations, towards whom they felt kindness, presents peculiar to their own country and identified with their soil or climate.

Sir, said Mr. P. I submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts whether this was not the leading motive of this officer of the Emperor of Morocco, and whether it was not friendship and respect for us, and fear of his master, which governed him in the course he adopted. It was true he had not the refinement to send a diplomatic note on rose paper, but he presented the articles in a mode peculiar to his own country, rude and barbarian, it is true, but nevertheless from no bad motive, or design to insult our power or Government.

Under these circumstances, I submit whether the Consul was justly liable to the indignation of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

He may have worded his letter improperly, and perhaps incorrectly; but, under all the circumstances of the case, he (Mr. PICKENS) submitted whether the national honor could, in the least, be affected by the reception of the presents.

If the officer of the Emperor had acted from any other motives than kindness and respect, then I would have gone with the gentleman in his censure of the Consul. If the Consul had tarnished our button, that emblem of our national honor, by submitting to dictation or intimidation; if he had suffered our national dignity to be trampled upon in his person, then I would go with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and declare that the Consul should be torn to pieces, rather than suffer his country to be dishonored.

But I think the gentleman has vastly exaggerated this matter. I appeal to him as to whether, in our intercourse with independent Indian tribes, we do not submit to their peculiar customs. For instance, in our intercourse with the independent tribes beyond the Rocky Mountains, would we not comply with their peculiar customs?

Now suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts should be sent as an agent from the United States to one of those independent tribes, on a mission involving the interests of his country, would he refuse to submit to their peculiar modes of proceeding, and offers of friendship? Suppose they were to offer the pipe of peace to the venerable gentleman, as they always do on such occasions, and which is the invariable practice of these rude nations, would the gentleman submit to take it from their mouths, or would he reject the offer with anger, and with his bosom fired with indignation, spurn it, and denounce it as an insult to the honor and power of the country he represented, calculated to degrade us? No: he was sure the gentleman would do no such thing. That gentleman, who had represented us with so much honor in the various courts of Europe, upon momentous questions, had too much sound sense to refuse to comply with the mode and customs of the tribe to whom he was sent. No, the gentleman would comply, and then we should see the venerable diplomatist sitting cross-legged at the council fire, with the pipe of peace in his mouth, however ridiculous it might appear in the refined eyes of civilized people, as to mere attitude.

It is a rude custom, and we submit to these things from the kind motives that attend them. So it was with these beasts the motives with which they were forced upon our Consul were all kind and friendly.

Mr. JONES here called for the orders of the day; but Mr. PICKENS said he would not detain the House five minutes longer, and wished the matter disposed of without any further debate.

Mr. P. then alluded to the cases put by Mr. ADAMS as precedents, when Congress had refused. The first case was the one in 1798, when Mr. Pinckney of South Carolina applied to the House in relation to the acceptance of certain presents. He had been our Minister to Spain and England, and they had tendered him presents.

Now, said Mr. P. I ask the gentleman if that is a parallel case? Is there any similarity between that case and the present? There is a wide difference between the two cases.

Mr. Pinckney was then a member of this House, and when the presents were offered to him, he very properly submitted the matter to the Speaker, and the House decided that he should not receive them. In that case the presents were designed for the private use and benefit of Mr. Pinckney, and not as in this case, when the articles were tendered to the Government and people of the United States. In this instance the presents were not for the private use or benefit of any public officer, but were tendered to us to make such disposition of them as we might deem proper. They had been properly refused by our officers, and were now the offerings of friendship from barbarian powers. In the case of Mr. Pinckney, they were offered from civilized nations, who knew better, and for the private use of Mr Pinckney. In that case the House decided, and decided properly, that he should not receive them, and I hope would so decide again, when the case occurred. As to the other case, when a tract of land was presented to General Jackson and Colonel Hawkins by the Creek Indians in 1814, that had no similarity with this affair. The land was presented to Jackson and Hawkins as individuals, and out of respect and admiration to them as men, and not out of regard or respect to our Government. It was purely a private donation, and nothing public in it, except that it was offered from a nation of Indians. There was a case, however, in the session of 1834–35, when we received and ordered two horses and a lion to be sold by the President, without objection, and the proceeds of the horses were placed in the Treasury, and of the lion divided amongst the Orphan Asylums of this District by General Jackson.

Mr. P. then asked to be allowed to refer to a transaction, honorable to the Imaum of Muscat, and which would do honor to any Christian prince in Europe. It was well known that he was one of the most powerful princes of Africa; his dominions skirted the shores of the Persian Gulf, and he claimed tribute from powerful tribes that extended far along the Southern coast of Africa. In 1835, the Peacock, one of our vessels of war, had on board a treaty signed by the Imaum, very favorable to us, and ran upon one of the coral reefs in the Persian Gulf, where she was left in an exposed situation, without a gun to bear, and subject to the attacks of the powerful Bedouins that infest those coasts. It was 200 miles from the Imaum of Muscat; the captain sent an open boat, through great danger, to apply for his assistance. He promptly despatched men to their aid, and sent the very vessel now lying in the port of New York to relieve them, and gave orders that he would hold the surrounding tribes responsible for any injury done to our vessels.

By this generous assistance the Peacock got afloat with the loss of eleven guns, and sailed to Bombay to be refitted. But the Imaum, not satisfied with what he had done, recovered the guns with great difficulty, and actually sent them to Bombay, a thousand miles off, at great expense and trouble. They arrived just before the Peacock was about to sail, and were presented to her.

This was a gallant and a noble act of generosity, that would have done honor to any Christian prince or State. Mr. P. did not know whether it had ever been publicly returned and acknowledged—it came from an expanded heart, and was worthy of our admiration.

Mr. P. then concluded by saying that the amendment of the committee proposed to give the proceeds of these presents to the institutions for the support of orphans in this District—an object worthy of the sympathy and undivided support of every humane and Christian heart. If this amendment were adopted, we would then exhibit the remarkable spectacle of the descendants of Ishmael bearing presents from the desert, destined to contribute to the support of the helpless and fatherless of their Christian and more civilized brethren.

Mr. P. concluded by hoping the House would so dispose of them, and demanded the previous question.

Mr. EVERETT solicited the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw the amendment, to enable him to introduce a proposition to recommit the bill to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill making an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the repairs of the ship Sultana, belonging to the Imaum of Muscat, and for her supplies while here and on her return home; and for making such other complements to the Imaum of Muscat for the signal relief afforded to the United States sloop of war Peacock, as the President shall deem proper.

Mr. PICKENS persisted in his motion for the previous question, which received a second, and the main question having been ordered; which main question was, Shall the House concur with the Committee of Foreign Affairs in their amendment to the Senate bill?

[This amendment authorizes the President to dispose of the said presents (without in terms authorizing their acceptance) the proceeds thereof to be divided among the charitable institutions for orphans in this district.]

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 69, nays 89.

So the House refused to concur in the amendment of the committee.

The question now being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time—

Mr. ADAMS demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 75, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. W. Allen, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Black, Botts, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, William B. Campbell, Carr, Chapman, Connor, William R. Cooper, Craig, Cross, Dana, John Davis, Doan, Doig, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fisher, Floyd, Galbraith, Gerry, Goggin, Griffin, Hand, John Hastings, Hook, Hopkins, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leadbetter, Leet, Lucas, McCulloh, Mallory, Marchand, Miller, Montanya, Samuel W. Morris, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Pickens, Pope, Prentiss, Rariden, Rayner, Robinson, Samuels, Shaw, Albert Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, and Henry Williams—75

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Beirne, Blackwell, Briggs, Sampson H. Butler, Calhoun, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Clark, Clifford, James Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crary, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Davies, J. W. Davis, Garret Davis, Dawson, Dennis, Dellet, Dromgoole, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Fine, Fletcher, Fornance, James Garland, Gates, Goode, Wm. S. Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Hunt, James, Chas. Johnston, Nathaniel Jones, Kempshall, King, Lincoln, McCarty, McClellan, McKay, Marvin, Mason, Monroe, Calvary Morris, Nisbet, Ogle, Osborne, Palen, Petrikin, Proffit, Randolph, Reynolds, Ridgway, Russell, Shepard, Simonton, Slade, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and Christopher Williams—87.

So the joint resolution was rejected.

Mr. J. W. JONES moved to suspend the the rules, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. EVERETT endeavored to prevail upon the chairman of Ways and Means to waive his motion, for the purpose of admitting his motion to recommit the resolution above rejected, with the instructions indicated.

Mr. JONES would not yield, and the question was put and agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, [Mr. EVANS in the chair,] and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the army.

The CHAIR stated that the question pending when the committee rose on yesterday was the appeal taken by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] from the decision of the CHAIR, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CURTIS,] making an appropriation of $45,000 for the purchase of sites on the Western waters on which to erect marine hospitals, was in order.

Mr. CLIFFORD said the subject of the marine hospitals was pending before the Committee of Commerce, and it was certainly not in order to arrest the action of that committee, by introducing an amendment appropriating for the object, which they had not even reported their views to the House upon. He contended that the amendment and decision of the CHAIR came in conflict with the 50th rule of the House, which says that no proposition should be submitted under color of amendment, different in character and principle, for the bill or subject under discussion. This rule was no doubt adopted to prevent a system of logrolling when the appropriation bills should be up for consideration- it was done so as to let every proposition stand on its own peculiar merits. It is a proposition having no relevancy to the bill before the House--it is totally different in principle--the bill pertains to matters connected with the army, and the amendment is a matter more relevant to the navy bill. If the committee should depart from the rule which had governed it so far, and admit this proposition, proposition after proposition totally irrelevant and out of order, would be proposed; and thus consume all the time of the House, without accomplishing any good purpose. It was out of no feeling of hostility to the proposition itself that caused him to oppose its introduction into this bill; but if it was upon its own merits, he would be in favor of a proper distribution of hospitals. But the subject had not been investigated, and it was yet pending before the committee, and he could not consent, even if the amendment were not in order, to vote for it.

Mr. McKAY then read the rule which required that the Committee of Ways and Means should report the several appropriation bills within thirty days, each bill appropriating to specific and distinct classes of objects authorized by law; from which he argued that it was never intended that amendments entirely different in principle from the bills, and not provided for by existing laws, should be appended as amendments. Notwithstanding the rule requires that the bills should be reported separately, the committee might, with the same propriety, amend the army bill, by attaching to it the whole navy bill, as to admit this amendment, which was more relevant to the navy bill than to the bill under consideration. He hoped the decision of the CHAIR would not be sustained.

The appeal was further debated by Messrs. WISE, STANLY, ATHERTON, and McKAY, in opposition to the decision of the CHAIR, and by Messrs. DAVIS of Indiana and BRIGGS in favor of his decision.

The question "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?" was taken by tellers, and resulted—ayes 57, noes 66.

So the decision of the CHAIR was reversed, and the amendment declared to be out of order.

The item appropriating $50,000 for repairs and improvements at Harper's Ferry having been read—

Mr. RICE GARLAND desired to be informed why the appropriation was so large?

Mr. JONES of Virginia, explained that the appropriation had been rendered necessary for repairs, &c. and referred to the items setting forth the particular objects for which the money was required.

Mr. WISE desired to be informed by the chairman, or some member of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether the Government continued to expend money at the armories for the manufacture of Hall's patent rifles?

After a moment's delay—

Mr. MONROE was understood to say that a few were still manufactured.

Mr WISE went on to say that the rifle was useless, and that he would not allow the one he had had to stay about his house. It was more dangerous to the man who had to use it than it was to an enemy. Mr. W. explained how and why. Improvements, he said, were going on every day. Colt's rifle was said to be better; so was Cochran's; and there were others. He was willing to appropriate money for experiments in arms, but the country ought to be very careful in adopting any. He was told that 10,000 of Hall's rifles had been manufactured for the Government. All this money had been thrown away; and he hoped that proper attention would be given to the subject.

Mr. MONROE was glad, he said, that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had taken up the subject. This rifle was not a favorite with him, [Mr. M.] But the gentleman would best obtain his object by offering a resolution directing that these arms shall not be given out, or adopting some other course by which the object can be effected.

Mr. WISE offered an amendment, in the shape of a proviso, declaring that none of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended in the manufacture of Hall's patent rifle.

Mr. GRAVES raised the question that the amendment was out of order, on the ground that it was not in order, on an appropriation bill, to regulate the sort of arms that shall be used.

The CHAIR had some doubts, he said, on the subject, but finally decided that the amendment was not in order.

Mr. WISE appealed from that decision.

And the question being, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The appeal was debated by Messrs. GRAVES, MONROE, WISE, PROFFIT, LUCAS, and WADDY THOMPSON, when

Some conversation took place between the CHAIR and Mr. WISE, from which it appeared that when the CHAIR had decided the amendment of Mr. W. to be out of order, he had done so on the ground that it was not relevant to any clause of the bill under consideration; but the CHAIR intimated the opinion that it would be in order hereafter.

Mr. WISE thereupon withdrew his appeal, giving notice of his intention to renew it at the end of the bill.

Mr. RICE GARLAND (not being satisfied, he said, with the explanations of Mr. JONES of Virginia, why so large an amount should be appropriated for the armory at Harper's Ferry) moved to reduce the amount from $50,000 to $25,000.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said this appropriation, it was true, was something larger than at previous years; but it would be recollected that the appropriation was withheld entirely last year. The money was to be expended on very important objects; it was to repair the buildings, erect a new forge, and to place this armory in a condition to manufacture arms with more facility. The supply of arms was entirely inadequate to the wants of the country, if, in case of emergency, the arms should be needed. The amount was as low as it ought to be for the purpose to which it was to be applied. If it was reduced, it might be that it could not be so applied as to make it at all useful. He hoped the reduction would not be made.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia said if the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GARLAND] would move to reduce all the items 25 per cent. he would go with him.

Mr. MONROE was opposed to the reduction. It would destroy the effect of the whole appropriation. When he was in the army he had an opportunity of witnessing the bad effect of such a course. Frequently the object of the appropriation was annulled by such an unmeaning reduction. It could not be applied, because it was inadequate to effect the object, and would prove a waste if it were to be applied. There was no economy in such a course. When we get the arms manufactured they are in the hands of the people. He was in favor of large and judicious appropriations to objects of defence. He would go so far as to place in the hands of the militia works on military tactics, to give them all the information which would contribute to make them useful when their services were needed in the field; but he was told that the Treasury would not bear it. Such economy as this was not regarding the great interests of the country. He was for an increase of the arms and munitions of war.

Mr. MARK A. COOPER said, he was not surprised at the views of economy of the gentleman from New York. They were such as might be expected from a gentleman coming from that section of country. He comes from a quarter that holds to the principle that they should go in debt if there was not money to supply what might be conceived to be their want.

Mr. R. GARLAND said, he was disposed to make all proder appropriations to keep up the arsenals. This appropriation was not an ordinary one, and there should be good reasons shown why it should be made. In the present state of affairs he was in favor of small appropriations.

Mr. MONROE could not consent to reduce appropriations of this kind, considering the state of defences of the country. He was for putting the army and navy in a condition that would cope with any power.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON maintained that this was no proper time to make improvements of any kind, considering the exhausted condition of the Treasury. Even if it should reduce the manufacture of arms, he would go for it. But if it was reduced it would not touch such manufacture.

The question was then taken on the motion to reduce, and disagreed to without a count.

Mr. RARIDEN wished to inquire from the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether any estimate from the Cumberland Road had been sent to the committee by the President or Secretary, as he had seen a statement to that effect in some of the Western papers.

Mr. JONES was surprised at such a question. The gentleman, from the commencement of the session, had had the same opportunities of examining all the documents and estimates as himself. He therefore rather doubted the sincerity of the gentleman in asking the question.

Mr. RARIDEN made some complaint at not receiving a reply. He had ransacked all the documents in vain to find such an estimate, and believed that none such had been sent to the House.

Mr. JONES said he had no objection to say that at the commencement of the session no estimate for the Cumberland Road had been submitted, among those which formed the basis of bills reported.

Mr. RARIDEN asked if there had been any estimate since.

Mr. JONES said that no estimate had been submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means by the House, with a view to report a bill to continue the Cumberland road, although he believed the proper bureau having charge of this subject had sent in estimates to Congress.

Mr. RARIDEN said he would, upon his own responsibility, submit an amendment, and let it stand upon its own merits. Mr. R. then proposed an amendment appropriating $225,000 for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—$75,000 to be expended in each of those States, under the supervision of the War Department.

Mr. JONES inquired of the CHAIR whether the amendment was in order.

The CHAIR decided that it was not.

From this decision Mr. DAVIS of Indiana appealed.

The appeal was debated, and the decision of the CHAIR was opposed by Messrs. DAVIS of Indiana, RARIDEN, MASON of Ohio, TILLINGHAST, and PROFFIT.

And, it being now half past 2 o'clock, the House took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess—

The consideration of the

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL

was resumed in Committee of the Whole, Mr. EVANS in the Chair.

The question pending was the appeal from the decision of the CHAIR, that the amendment in relation to an appropriation for the Cumberland road, was not in order.

Mr. RARIDEN observed that as there was no quorum present, he would withdraw the amendment, with a view of renewing it hereafter.

Mr. GIDDINGS then asked leave to offer an amendment making an appropriation for the repair of a certain harbor in Ohio.

Mr. JONES objected to the introduction of such an amendment as out of order.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment as out of order.

Mr. GIDDINGS took an appeal, but the decision of the CHAIR was affirmed.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia moved to amend by reducing the amount appropriated for armories, fortifications, arsenals, etc. 25 per cent. Mr. C. said that, owing to the embarrassed condition of the Treasury, it was highly necessary that some reduction should be made; although he was willing to go for the full amount of all appropriations that were strictly needed.

Mr. DAWSON was in favor of granting the full amount of appropriations asked for, and then afterwards holding the Administration strictly responsible for those appropriations.

Mr. JONES contended that more of the appropriations could be reduced without manifest injury to the public service. He alluded to the vast number of Indians on our Southwestern frontier, which required the vigilance of Government to keep them in subjection, and a suitable provision for fortifications, etc. so as to protect our citizens against them. He also alluded to the deficiency of fire arms, there not being at present more than sufficient to arm two States of the Union. He therefore hoped that no objection would be made to the amounts set down in the bill, as the public interest required that the whole should be appropriated.

Mr. EVERETT said this motion brought up the general question of retrenching expenses for the want of means to meet them. He desired to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, for his estimate of the revenue for this year, exclusive of Treasury notes.

Mr. JONES said he was unable at that moment to state further than that it was expected to fall considerably below the estimates for the residue of the year.

Mr. EVERETT resumed. The statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, laid before the other House on the 19th of June, showed that the whole revenue for the first five months, (from January the 1st to June the 1st,) was about seven and a half millions. For the residue of the year it would most probably exceed that amount, making for the year not over fifteen millions. This, with five millions of Treasury notes, made the whole revenue twenty millions. The appropriation, originally estimated at that sum, would be increased by appropriations not originally here, but recommended by the Departments, to twenty-seven millions—say twenty five millions. Now how was the deficiency to be supplied? He desired to ask the honorable chairman whether a further grant of Treasury notes would be asked during the dresent session.

Mr. JONES replied that there had been no action of the committee that would enable him at that time to answer the question. He could not then determine what might be the amount of the appropriations; but he expressed the hope that no more Treasury notes would be necessary.

Mr. EVERETT said he was glad to hear it, although he could not see how the Government would make the two ends meet. It did seem to be be a case, in which either further means should be provided, or the appropriations reduced. That subject, however, he was obliged to leave to the committee. They must best know where the reductions should be made, and the responsibility rested upon them. He could not, however, but think that the subject of the defence of the Western frontier was ill chosen for a reduction. Considering the extent of that frontier, the number of Indians, and the hostile feelings of some portion of them, he thought every thing should be done necessary for the defence of that quarter. He thought that a recent event had increased the danger. He would not then enter into the subject further than to express that opinion.

Mr. COOPER said he wished it to be understood that he did not wish to reduce the ordinary expenses of the Government. He was willing to vote for that; and if there were not money enough in the Treasury, he would borrow it. He did not agree with his colleague in giving the money to the Administration because they asked for it. By doing so, his colleague would be throwing his own responsibility as a Representative upon the Government, which he had no right to do.

Mr. BRIGGS could not agree with the gentleman who offered the amendment. After we had erected these fortifications and public works, the gentleman wished to cut off one quarter of the money necessary to keep them in operation. Let the gentleman look at the state of our Southwestern frontier, where the danger had been such that we had increased our standing army, and yet here he offered a proposition to cut down one fourth of the sums necessary for keeping up the public works. The gentleman wished to do this, and yet he said he did not wish to interfere with the ordinary and common appropriations of Government.

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON advocated the amendment. The objects to which the sums were to be applied did not come under the ordinary expenses of Government. They were extraordinary; and if the proposition had been to reduce the sums fifty per cent. instead of twenty-five, he would vote for it.

Mr. CROSS objected to any reduction in the appropriations for fortifications, &c. He alluded to the defenceless state of the immense Southwestern frontier, and contended that Government was bound to make provision for the defence of our citizens in that quarter, and which required every cent of the money set down in the bill.

Mr. TILLINGHAST thought the best way would be to grant the appropriation asked for, as, otherwise, the Administration could not justly be held responsible. It was not the fact of making the appropriation that created the responsibility, but the manner in which that money was used after it had been appropriated. Besides, the general reduction of 25 per cent. would not be compatible with all the items specified.

Mr. MONROE opposed the amendment with much warmth. He did not consider it just or honorable for gentlemen, after they had got rid of the Indians from their own State, to object to the protection of other states from their incursions. Was it not just and proper for the gentleman from Georgia to vote for fortifications for the protection of the frontier States against those Indians whom he had sent there?

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. JONES then moved to amend by inserting $19,764 for the repair of arsenals injured by fire and storms. Mr. J. explained that these arsenals had been damaged since the estimates had been first sent in, and at the request of Mr. RICE GARLAND had read by the Clerk a statement from the Secretary in relation to the matter.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. JONES then offered an amendment appropriating $300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida, to be expended under the superintendence of the Secretary of War.

In reply to a question from Mr. STANLY,

Mr JONES explained that the reason this item was not included in the original estimates was, that it was anticipated, the war would shortly be brought to a close, in which case no further appropriation would have been necessary. But as the anticipations of the Department had not been realized, the Secretary of War thought it advisable before the adjournment of Congress, to ask an additional appropriation of $300,000, which added to the unexpended balance of former appropriation, would it was thought to be amply sufficient.

Mr. STANLY opposed the amemendment, and in the course of his remarks, contended that the Administration had been guilty of increasing the standing army; also, that it was their design to increase it still farther. He had not concluded, when a motion was made that the committee rise, which motion prevailed,

And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, July 10, 1840.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted a report in relation to the House bill for the relief of Gilbert A. Smith and Nathan Stark; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Thomas Latham, reported it without amendment.

Mr. H. said that some time since the Senate adopted a resolution reported by the Committee on Claims, adverse to the claim of the heirs of Fulton. Subsequently a motion was made to reconsider this vote, which he now moved to take up.

The motion to reconsider was then taken up, and on motion by Mr. H. indefinitely postponed.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill from the House to establish a uniform rule of computing the mileage of members of Congress. The question being on Mr. NORVELL'S motion to postpone the bill indefinitely—

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky spoke at large in favor of the bill. It was passed, he said, by the nearly unanimous vote of the other House, and ten years ago a similar bill was passed by the other House, and defeated by the Senate.

He alluded to the unpleasantness of touching any abuses of this kind, from the great number of individuals interested in them, from whom it was difficult to escape animadversion But, as always, Mr. C. would now proceed to perform his duty, regardless of himself, but sincerely desirous not to injure unnecessarily the feelings of any member; and he trusted his remarks would be listened to in the same spirt of courtesy with which he designed to make them. The time of his retreat from public life was not very distant, and before retiring, he wished to point out three or four abuses, which he would, in part, do at this time. One related to the franking privilege, of which there were abuses in every way, which Mr. C. specified, and pointed to certain remedies. Another great one was that now under consideration. Mr C. proceeded to show that the law respecting mileage had been rendered very greatly uncertain and unequal, particularly by railroads and steamoats.

He closed by alluding to the extraordinary increase in the expenditures of the Government. During the administration of Washington, Adams, and the first term of Jefferson, the whole civil list did not exceed $600,000 yearly. Now, the Treasury Department alone nearly reached that sum; and the expenses of Congress, including stationery, printing, fuel, &c. even went beyond it. And reforms by Congress, he insisted, ought to begin with themselves.

After some remarks by Mr. CALHOUN,

Mr. WRIGHT having remarked that the Senator from South Carolina had almost wholly anticipated what he had designed to say, proceeded to enlarge somewhat on the same views, and said he should vote for the postponement.

Mr. DAVIS urged that this subject had been very thoroughly considered in the other House, and the result of it was a full conviction that the air line was, on the whole, the best and most equal standard of distance; and it was one which admitted of no change and no uncertainty.

He also insisted that it was usual, if reforms, when proposed, were delayed for any reason, they were not again taken up; and he stated various cases in point; and the present rule for mileage, he maintained, was unequal and unjust, and ought to be corrected.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said, as he should vote against the indefinite postponement of the bill, he desired to place his vote on its true ground. In the vote he should give, he did not wish to be understood as committing himself to vote for the bill as it passed the House. That bill fixes the mileage of members upon a direct air line; this, he thought, would be found unequal and unjust, as it was a line never travelled, and impossible to be travelled. Again, it would be unjust to members who had to travel on a circuitous route to their places of residence. He, therefore, would vote against the indefinite postponement, in the hope that the bill would be so amended as to make it acceptable. He held that the true rule was to pay the member for the distance he would be compelled to travel so as to conveniently arrive at the seat of Government, and not the route his pleasure or convenience might dictate. He thought the law should be to make the allowance upon the nearest mail or post route. This would make the law definite enough. He admitted that the law, as it stood was liable to be, and was, misconstrued, operating unequally and unjustly between different members. He concurred with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] that the object of the law giving mileage was not altogether to pay members for their expenses in travelling; it was, in part, a compensation to distant members for the inconvenience and sacrifice they were compelled to make in being so far removed from their homes; while those nearer to the seat of Government could frequently visit their families during the session.

Mr. LUMPKIN said: Mr. President, it has rarely fallen to my lot to attend to a discussion in this Senate with more pleasure and interest, than I have done this morning. This discussion has convinced me of the power and force of truth. Some months ago, in urging upon this Senate the consideration of the value of time, and the duty of shortening the sessions of Congress, I took occasion to say, that after all that had been said and written, in and out of Congress, on the subject of Government abuses, the most alarming abuses of the Federal Government might be traced directly or indirectly to Congress. My remarks at that time, sir, seemed to have but limited influence upon the Senate. To-day, sir, I have the high gratification to hear almost every honorable Senator who has spoken upon the subject, frankly admit the abuses which have crept into Congress, and express a willingness to enter earnestly upon the work of reform, by appropriate legislation I heard the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] with great satisfaction and general approbation That Senator has advocated the bill from the House of Representatives with a clearness and perspicuity which cannot be surpassed. His remarks, accompanied by the facts which he has submitted, afford incontestable evidence of the inequality and injustice of the present practice of settling the mileage of members of Congress, and satisfies my mind, that the mode proposed in this bill is the nearest approach to justice which has yet been presented to the consideration of Congress, and I am therefore prepared to give the bill my hearty support. But for the able manner in which this bill has been supported by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] I should have felt it my duty to have made some remarks in detail in its support, but I now feel relieved from that necessity.

Mr. President, I trust the passage of this bill will be but the first step in correcting abuses connected with the expenses of Congress. From the spirit manifested by Senators in their remarks this morning, I indulge the hope that various other abuses will be speedily reformed by legislation. The use and abuse of stationery, as well as the franking privilege, calls aloud for reform.

And what is still of much greater importance than any which has yet been adverted to, is the want of a faithful and punctual attendance of the members of Congress to their legislative duties. What have we seen during the present session of Congress? How often has the business of legislation been retarded for the want of a quorum, in one branch of Congress at least? How many members of Congress, during the present session, have been absent from their seats for days, weeks, and months together, engaged in pursuits of business, pleasure, or pastime? Is it not the common custom of these absentees to receive full compensation for the whole session, whether present or absent? Is this just—is it right? Who pays the laborer wages for days, weeks, and months, when he is absent from his work? This is not the custom of our country in the ordinary business of life. Men are paid in proportion to their labor and attention to business, and why should members of Congress be an exception? I will forbear making further remarks at present, and give my vote in favor of the bill from the House.

The question was then taken on the indefinite postponement of the bill, and was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs Anderson, Benton. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Linn. Mouton, Norvell, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Walker, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Phelps. Pierce, Porter, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, White, Williams, and Young—26.

Mr. LINN moved instead of the straight line, to make the nearest mail route the standard of distance.

Mr. WALKER proposed the most usual mail route, to be determined by a joint committee of Congress, and the mileage of members, as allowed, to be published.

This amendment Mr. LINN accepted for his own.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky argued that this rule would be subject to great uncertainty, and adduced some cases in which it would be very difficult to determine which was the most usual mail route.

Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. ALLEN made some remarks in favor of publishing the mileage of each member, thus making him responsible for this, as for other things, to his constituents.

Mr. DAVIS moved to strike out the most usual mail route from Mr. LINN'S amendment, and insert the nearest mail route. He argued in support of this that in many cases there were several routes, which were regular and constant, and none of them could be said to be more usual than another.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested that it ought to be the principal mail route, which could be better determined.

After some further remarks by Mr. WALKER for, and Mr. PRESTON against, Mr. WALKER'S amendment,

The amendment of Mr. DAVIS, making the shortest mail route the standard of distance, was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Ky. Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Preston. Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, Tappan, White, and Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Calhoun. Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Lumpkin. Mouton, Phelps, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Walker, Wall, and Wright—14.

The amendment of Mr. WALKER, as thus amended by Mr. DAVIS, was agreed to, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Ala. Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Phelps. Pierce, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, Wright, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Ky. Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Lumpkin, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Conn. and White—13.

Mr WALKER moved to amend the bill by inserting at the end thereof, "and hereafter there shall be no stationery allowed to any members of Congress."

After some remarks by Messrs. GRUNDY, CLAY of Kentucky, CALHOUN, ALLEN, WALKER, BUCHANAN, TALLMADGE, and CLAY of Alabama,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved the following as a substitute:

"Be it further enacted, That instead of the allowance of stationery to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives during the session of Congress, as now allowed, there shall be allowed and paid to each member, the sum of twenty dollars and no more."

After some remarks from Mr. WALKER in opposition, the amendment was agreed to; and after some further remarks by Mr. KNIGHT, the amendment of Mr. WALKER, as modified, was agreed to—ayes 29, noes 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen. Anderson, Brown, Buchanan. Calhoun. Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Porter, Preston. Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wright, Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs Benton. Clayton, Dixon, Linn, Merrick, Norvell. Roane, Tallmadge, Wall, White, Williams—11.

Mr. LINN moved to amend the bill by inserting the following:

"SECTION 3. And be it further enacted, That any member of the Senate or House of Representatives neglecting to answer to the roll of the yeas and nays on any question, shall be deemed to be absent for that day, unless absent from sickness, or by attendance upon a committee, and his per diem for that day shall be deducted."

This amendment, after some remarks by Messrs. CALHOUN, CLAYTON, PRESTON, ALLEN. GRUNDY, KNIGHT, HUBBARD. LUMPKIN, PIERCE, BUCHANAN, and CRITTENDEN, was agreed to—ayes 32, noes 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen. Anderson, Benton, Brown. Buchanan. Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy. Henderson, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Smith of Connecticut. Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wright, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton. Crittenden, Cuthbert. Davis Dixon, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick. Porter, Preston, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and White—17.

Mr. YOUNG moved to add the following to the end of the second section:

"And provided that no member of either House shall hereafter frank any letter, paper, or document, but such as may, in good faith, appertain to his own business or correspondence, or frank any blank envelope of any kind or description, for the use of any other person or persons under any pretence whatever."

After being discussed by Messrs. TAPPAN, CLAY of Alabama, and CLAY of Kentucky,

Mr. WRIGHT moved to amend the amendment by adding the following:

"And further, shall frank no package of any description other than letters, and no letter of a greater weight than one ounce."

Which, after some remarks by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky, was disagreed to, and the amendment was also disagreed to.

Mr. NORVELL then moved to amend the bill by inserting the following:

"SEC 4. And be it further enacted, That the franking privilege shall not be enjoyed by any member or delegate in Congress except during the session and for thirty days before its commencement, and thirty days after its termination."

After some remarks by Messrs BUCHANAN and NORVELL, the amendment was lost—ayes 8, noes 25.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following as an additional section:

"SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That hereafter when Congress is not in session, no member shall have the privilege of franking any printed matter except public documents."

After some remarks by Messrs. TAPPAN, SMITH of Connecticut, and WALKER, the amendment was disagreed to—ayes 17, noes 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wright, and Young—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Porter, Preston, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and White—20.

The bill as amended was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments concurred in, and the question coming up on its engrossment,

After some remarks by Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, CLAY, of Kentucky, CALHOUN, WHITE, CLAY of Alabama, TALLMADGE, and DAVIS,

Mr. LUMPKIN said: Mr. President, with all my earnest desire for the reform of abuses which have crept into Congress, and the gratification which I felt and expressed this forenoon to see that spirit of reform gaining ground and respect in this Senate, yet, sir, I admit I was not prepared to expect, or look for, that rapid advance, which I have witnessed in the course of a few hours. I desire to see reform, to the full extent of all the propositions which have been submitted as amendments to this bill. Reform is demanded, in regard to stationery; the franking privilege; punctual attendance of members of Congress, as well as the present practice of charging for mileage. But, sir, while I vote in favor of the various propositions submitted to correct the abuses complained of, which have been proposed as amendments to the mileage bill, I must be allowed to express my apprehension, that these amendments are calculated, if not intended, to defeat the mileage bill.

I would have preferred, sir, that the Senate should have passed the bill sent to us by the House, without amendment or change, and let it become the law of the land. This would have been correcting one admitted abuse at least. In voting for the various proposed amendments which I have done, relating to stationery, franking, and attendance of members, I have done so from the conviction of the correctness of these propositions in themselves considered. Yet, sir, I am not free from apprehension, that these amendments, as well as the original bill, may be defeated by their introduction here, when sent to the other branch of Congress. Sir, I have deliberately considered this subject in all its parts and bearings. I am convinced that abuses do exist in the franking privilege, stationery, and want of faithful attendance of members of Congress. I therefore vote for propositions calculated to correct and reform abuses, although they are not presented in the shape which I would desire. Sir, while I desire to see whatever errors may attach to Congress corrected, I would feel much reluctance at seeing any thing done, which might unjustly disparage the standing of the American Congress. I would not like to see Congress regulated by the old field muster roll, militia discipline. I do not admire the mode now proposed to ensure the attendance of members of Congress, or that which is intended to economize in regard to the stationery. I vote for these propositions, as the only alternatives within my present grasp.

I will, Mr. President, take a few minutes to suggest the outline of my plan of reform, in these several matters. In regard to mileage, I am in favor of the House bill as sent to us. Upon the subject of the attendance of members of Congress, I would only desire to make it the lawful duty of each member of Congress, at or near the close of each session, to file in the Secretary or Clerk's office a certified statement of the number of days he had actually served, and been in attendance as a member, &c. I would have this statement recorded in a book. In regard to stationery, I would allow members to draw stationery as they now do, and make it the duty of the Secretary and Clerk to charge and record in a book every article furnished to each member during each session.

These accounts and charges should be duly examined by committees of the two Houses appointed for that purpose. This, sir, would be the extent of the correction I would desire at this time, and I believe all that would even be necessary. I have no idea that any laws, rules, or regulations of Congress, can exact duties from members which they are indisposed to perform.

The faithful discharge of our representative duties is a question to be decided by our constituents. It belongs to them and not to us. But I consider it an imperative duty which devolves on Congress, to see that its journals, records, and proceedings, shall be given to the people in a form which may enable them to judge of the actings and doings of their representatives. I consider this, sir, a proud day for the country, whatever may be the success of the measure now under consideration. The proceedings of this day in the Senate, establishes the fact, that the spirit of reform has found its way into this hall; and, sir, it will not slumber or sleep until its proper work shall have been accomplished.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved the following amendment:

"And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, and of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the end of each session of Congress, to publish in the public papers in Washington city the number of calls of the yeas and nays to which each member neglected to answer during the session, except when such neglect to answer has been excused in consequence of sickness or absence on committees.

After some remarks by Messrs. SMITH of Connecticut, ALLEN, HUNTINGTON, CRITTENDEN, WALKER, and CLAY of Alabama, the amendment was lost.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana moved to reconsider the vote for the forfeiture of the per diem pay of a member, in case of absence from any one call, during the day, of the yeas and nays.

After debate by Messrs. SMITH of Indiana, HUNTINGTON, WALKER, TALLMADGE, and ALLEN,

The motion to reconsider was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Preston, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and White—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, Wright, and Young—24.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Pierce, Porter, Preston, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—31.

NAYS—Mearrs Clayton, Henderson, Knight, Norvell, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Wall, and White—9.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, July 10, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. CLIFFORD moved a reconsideration of the vote by which on yesterday the House had refused to order to a third reading, the joint resolution of the Senate, in relation to the disposal of the presents from the Imaum of Muscat.

Mr. C. observed that his object in moving the reconsideration was to enable him to submit an amendment, to which he thought there would be no objection. He then moved the previous question.

After some debate of a conversational character, as to the propriety of taking the question when so few members were present, a call of the House was moved.

On the motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 42, nays 94.

So the call was not ordered.

A quorum being now arrived, the call for the previous question was seconded.

[At this stage of the proceedings, Mr. ADAMS inquired of the CHAIR, whether the resolution (which had been rejected on yesterday) had been returned to the Senate. The CHAIR replied that it had not. Mr. ADAMS then made a privileged question upon which he introduced a resolution implying a censure on the Clerk for neglect of duty growing out of the fact that he had not returned the resolution to the Senate on yesterday. The proceedings on this resolution occupied two hours of the precious time of the House; and the mover apprehending from incidental votes that the resolution could not receive the sanction of a majority of either party in the House, withdrew it. Inasmuch as the resolution was withdrawn, the proceedings are not deemed of sufficient importance to insert formally and at length. There can be no impropriety in stating, in justice to the Clerk, that he had not violated either the rules or the practice of the House, by retaining the resolution in the House within the time allowed by the rules for a member to move to reconsider the vote rejecting it.]

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider, and resulted as follows—yeas 108, nays 54.

So the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. EVERETT then moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the amendment of which he had given notice on yesterday.

The CHAIR decided this motion to be out of order.

Mr. CLIFFORD then offered the following amendment: to strike out all after the word authorized, and to dispose in such time and such manner as he shall deem fit, of all such of the presents to the Government of the United States as have been sent from the Imaum of Muscat or the Emperor of Morocco, and cannot be conveniently deposited or kept in the Department of State, and cause the proceeds thereof to be placed in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. NAYLOR moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the House had, on yesterday, rejected the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to give the proceeds of the sales of these presents to the charitable institutions in the District of Columbia; and on that motion demanded the previous question, which was seconded.

Mr. HUNT moved to lay the whole subject on the table; but the motion was rejected.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. NAYLOR,

Mr. STANLY demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and were—Yeas 70, nays 75.

So the House refused to reconsider.

The question then being on the amendment of Mr. CLIFFORD, it was decided by yeas and nays as follows—yeas 82, nays 76.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MONROE moved a reconsideration of the vote, but the motion was almost unanimously rejected.

The question then being on ordering the joint resolution as amended to a third reading, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 84, nays 60.

The resolution having received its third reading,

Mr. DROMGOOLE said it was evident there had been some misapprehension on the part of several gentlemen who had voted against the motion of Mr. NAYLOR to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee had been rejected on yesterday. That amendment authorized the distribution of the proceeds to the charitable institutions of the District, and entirely coincided with his views. With a view, therefore, of giving those gentlemen, who had voted under a misapprehension, an opportunity of putting themselves right, and which would change the result of the vote on the reconsideration, he moved that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report again the same amendment which had been rejected on yesterday.

After some brief remarks from Mr. BANKS, who hoped his colleague would not persist in his motion,

Mr. PETRIKIN moved the previous question.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS moved to lay the whole subject on the table; but the motion was negatived.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, cutting off, of course, the motion to recommit.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

And the main question being on the passage of the joint resolution, was, then put and decided by yeas and nays as follows—yeas 82, nays 72:

So the joint resolution as amended was agreed to.

The question being on the adoption of the title,

Mr. PROFFIT moved to amend it by adding the following:

"A joint resolution to replenish the exhausted Treasury of the United States by the sale of certain horses, lions, otto of roses, rose water, cashmere shawls, &c. being a donation made to the United States by the Imaum of Muscat and the Emperor of Morocco."

Messrs. PROFFIT and MONROE made some remarks in favor of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Maine moved the previous question on the bill and amendment; which did not receive a second.

Mr. CLIFFORD then moved to amend the amendment of Mr. PROFFIT by substituting the following as the title, viz:

"An act to authorize the President of the United States to dispose of certain presents from the Imaum of Muscat and the Emperor of Morocco."

Mr. CLIFFORD moved the previous question on its adoption; which received a second, and the main question being ordered, which was on the amendment of Mr. CLIFFORD, the question was taken and the amendment was adopted as the title.

The joint resolution of the Senate in relation to the interchange of books and documents on the plan of Mr. Vattemare, was, on motion of Mr. JONES, taken up, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. J. W. JONES moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of the House resolving itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union; and pending the question,

The hour of 2½ o'clock having now arrived, the House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. LINCOLN, on leave, moved that another member be appointed on the Committee on Accounts, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the absence (from indisposition) of his colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] ordered accordingly.

Mr. STANLY asked leave to offer a resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to this House, as early as possible, a copy of the correspondence between the Treasurer of the United States and the chief clerk of any other officer of his Department, in relation to the practical operation of the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. STEENROD objected.

Mr. STANLY proposed to move a suspension of the rule.

The SPEAKER stated that, when the hour of recess expired, a motion to suspend was pending, submitted by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JONES,] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ANDREWS inquired of the CHAIR whether there had been any morning hour to day?

The SPEAKER said there had not.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, on leave, reported a bill entitled "An act to amend an act approved May 13, 1800, entitled 'An act to amend an act to establish the judical courts of the United States.'"

The bill having been twice read by its title, Mr. S. moved that it be read a third time.

Mr. CRABB asked for the reading of the bill.

The bill having been read, Mr. C. moved its commitment to the Committee of the Whole, expressing his desire to move an amendment, providing than the compensation received by the jurors of the United States courts should conform to the compensation of jurors of the State courts.

After some conversation between Messrs. CRABB, THOMPSON, LIAGHAST, J. W. JONES, SERGEANT, and BANKS, Mr. C. withdrew his motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole; and proposed now to amend the bill by adding a clause declaring that the jurors of said courts should be paid for their services the same sum as is paid to jurors of the State courts, in such cases as the jurors may choose.

Some further conversation followed; when

Mr. C. modified his amendment by adding thereto the words "And that in States where no compensation is made by law, the said jurors in said State shall receive the compensation now fixed by the law of the United States."

And the question being taken, the amendment, as modified was rejected.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and, having been read a third time, was passed.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. RUSSELL appealed to Mr. JONES to withdraw his motion, in order that the committees might be called for reports.

Mr. JONES declining, the question was then taken on his motion, and the voted stood—ayes 49, nays 42; no quorum voting.

Mr. RUSSELL again appealed to Mr. JONES to withdraw his motion.

The SPEAKER said that, as there was no quorum present, no motion could be entertained but a motion for a call of the House or to adjourn.

Mr. LINCOLN moved a call of the House.

Mr. EVANS appealed to gentlemen either to go into committee or to let reports be made.

Mr. LINCOLN withdrew his motion that there be a call of the House.

And the question on the motion of Mr. JONES that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, being again put, the vote stood—ayes 58, noes 52; still no quorum voting.

Mr. STEENROD moved a call of the House.

Mr. CRAIG asked the yeas and nays; which were refused.

Mr. EVANS asked if the motion that there be a call of the House was debatable?

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. EVANS protested against the time which would be uselessly consumed in a call of the House, and which might be satisfactorily spent in the advance of the public business by calling the committees for reports.

After some conversation, the motion for a call of the House and the motion to go into committee were withdrawn, and, by general consent, the SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act in addition to the several acts relating to the shipment and discharge of seamen, and the duties of consuls."

Mr. C. said this was a bill which it was not necessary to commit. It was one which afforded protection to seamen, and hoped that it would be passed without delay.

No objection being made, the bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. REYNOLDS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Warner, of Indiana; which was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported

A bill for the relief of John Morgan; and which were read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

A bill for the relief of Esther Parrot;

Mr. T. from the same committee, made an unfavorable report in the cases of Abel Harruck, Benjamin Cox, Catharine Cobb, Lucy Whitmore, Martha Conly, and Esther Honeywell; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. T. also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the cases of Solomon Jarors, Thomas Fulton, Elizabeth Nutter, Francis Chandler, Margaret Penn, Lydia Rogers, Margaret M'Caw, Mary Harrison, Sally Sanders, Rhody Polk, Jane Johnson, Martha Lemon, Janetta McClure, Mary Biggs, Elizabeth Christler, Margaret Smith, Lucy Catlett, and John Carey; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. T. from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the cases of Patrick Corn, Phineas Allen, Catharine Snider, William Keller, Tirzah Hunt, Robert Brownfield, Mellon Potter, Catharine Hayward, John Phillips, Wm. Steele, Polly Wigginton, Phineas Bell, Elizabeth Pratt, Samuel Phillips, Lydia Wentworth, Jeremiah Cady, Benjamin Cox, John P. Becker, Areneth Chapman, Lettis Pond, Nancy G. Van Rensselaer, Wm. Tevis, Hannah Leighton, Christiana Hawkins, Simon Early, Mary Kilbourn, Clayton and Mitchell, representatives of William Kemplin, Charles Tuttier, David Tucker, the children of Mary Addons, Philip Sutton, Jeremiah Needham, Aaron Bennet, William Slick, Hannah Strong, Daniel Story, children of Joseph Plumb, Penelope Plunkett, Daniel Ingalls, Elizabeth Pierce, widow of Stephen Pierce, Lors Smith, Sarah T. Field, Nathaniel Bradley, William Gillilan, Ethan A. Allen, John Fisher, Jonathan Rogers, Peter Houck, and Joseph Wilkinson; which report was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion of Mr. TALIAFERRO, it was ordered that the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, on the petition of Reuben Roberts, be recommitted to the committee, with the additional testitimony now presented.

Mr. ANDREWS, from the Committee on Revoluttonary Pensions, reported

A bill for the relief of Joseph Parker;

A bill for the relief of Leah Mundy; and

A bill for the relief of Benjamin Chapman; which bills were severally read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. RAYNER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John Hagie; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIES, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an adverse report on the petitions of Betty Warner and George Swingle; and the said cases were laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, ordered, that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the case of David McMullen; and that it do lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIES also, from the same committee, reported

A bill for relief of David Sherer; and

A bill for the relief of Desire Merriam, widow of Ichibod Merriam.

A bill for the relief of David Stervins; which bills were severally read twice and committed to the Committee of the Whole House.

On motion of Mr. DAVIES, ordered, that the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the case of Samuel Potter; and that it lie on the table; his case having been settled at the Pension office.

Mr. CHITTENDEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John Godfrey; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. C. also reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled, "An act to authorize the payment of invalid pensions in certain cases;" which was appropriately committed.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported

A bill granting a pension to Seth Willey; and which bills were severally read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A bill granting a pension to William H. Wilson;

Mr. R. also, from the same committee, made unfavorable reports in the cases of Henry Overly, Aaron Adams, Theophilus Sumerly, Samuel Spalding, William A. Houston, and Linza Thomas; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. S. W. MORRIS, from the same committee, reported back to the House, Senate bill entitled, "An act for the relief of John McCloud, with a recommendation that it be rejected.

Also, reported back to the House, Senate bill entitled, "An act for the relief of John S. Billings;" with a recommendation that it be rejected; both which bills were committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. S. W. MORRIS reported, from the same committee, a bill for the relief of John Flood; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. S. W. M. from the same committee, also made unfavorable reports in the cases of Amanda A. Dade, Pugh Cannon, Daniel W. Church, B. H. Manlief, Jesse Oldham, John Johnson, William Perry, Leonard Wardwell, Madison Collins, Sylvester Nash; which reports were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. S. W. MORRISS, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the petitions of Aaron Mellon, and Titus Everhart, and leave was given them to withdraw their petitions. And discharged from the cases of Achael Whitcomb, Timothy Cavan, and Jared Buckingham; and that they lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. PALEN, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the cases of John Russell, Joseph Ellery, Henry Eberly, Seth Morton, Patrick Kennon, John C. Farrell, and they were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RAYNER, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to provide for the construction of a direct communication between the waters of Albemarle sound and the Atlantic ocean, on the coast of North Carolina, accompanied by a detailed report in writing; which bill was read twice and committed, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. said this was a subject of some interest, and wished the House would indulge him in a motion to have 2,000 extra copies printed.

Mr. TURNEY objected, and the motion was not pressed.

Mr. BEATTY, from the Committee on Patents, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to make certain appropriations for the patent office; and the bill was committed to the same Committee of the Whole House to which was committed the bill for the further promotion of the arts.

Mr. PETRIKIN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill authorizing the erection of an additional building for the accommodation of the War Department; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANLY, from the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, made a report in relation to the expenditures on the public buildings in the year 1839; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Select Committee on the memorial of the heirs of James Rumsey, deceased, reported a bill for the relief of the said heirs; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. U. from the same Select Committee appointed on the memorial of Samuel Raub, jr. praying the passage of such an act as will insure the application of his recently invented "Double self-acting safety valve" to all steam vessels in the employ of the Government," made a detailed report on the subject of explosion of boilers of steamboats, accompanied by three bills, viz:

A bill to proovide for purchasing the patent for Raub's Self-acting Safety Valve;

A bill to authorize the President of the United States to employ persons to construct apparatus, with a view to extinguish fires on board steamboats, and to test its utility; and

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam;"

which bills were severally read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said, it was now too late to act on these bills at the present session. He hoped that the House would consent to have 5,000 extra copies of the report and bills printed, so as to let the matter go before the country to awaken public atention; and that, at the next meeting of Congress, they will feel better prepared to act upon the subject.

Mr. BIDDLE objected, and the motion was not pressed.

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was discharged from further pursuing the inquiry into the propriety of enclosing the public grounds west of the Capitol, and the removal of the naval monument from the Capitol yard.

Mr. BROCKWAY, from the select committee on the subject, repoted a joint resolution authorizing the erection of a monument to the memory of Captain Nathan Hall, of Connnecticut; which resolution was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee of Claims, reported back to the House, Senate bill entitled, "An act for the relief of John L. Scott," accompanied by a report, recommending that the said bill be rejected;

And reported back Senate bill entitled, "An act for the relief of John Mitchell and B. F. Fox," with an amendment:

both of which bills were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on to-morrow.

Mr. R. also reported back, with an amendment, Senate bill entitled, "An act for the relief of James H. Relfe;" which was committed to the Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Also, reported back Senate bill entitled, "An act for the relief of William P. Rathbone," with an amendment and report in writing; which bill was referred to the same Committee of the Whole House to which was referred the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Barnes.

Mr. BOND, from the Select Committee to which had been referred the memorial of William Wright, in relation to the affairs between the United States and the Commonwealth Bank of Boston, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Select Committee of five appointed on the memorial of William Wright, have power to inquire into and report upon all matters relating to the collection and settlement of the claims of the United States against the late Commonwealth Bank; that the Committee have power to send for persons and papers, to appoint a clerk, to proceed to Boston for the purpose of prosecuting its inquiries; and that the members thereof be excused from attendance in the House until it shall have made its report.

Mr. BOND said that, at so late a period of the session, he did not know what better could be done with the resolution than that it should lie on the table.

Mr. TURNEY accordingly made that motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to revive and continue in force an act authorizing the payment of certain certificates, approved May 7, 1822; which was read the first time, and by order the second time, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. EVANS,

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the consideration of the subject of guard fences on the Cumberland road; from the petitions of citizens of the State of New York for the improvement of Oak Orchard harbor; against the further improvement of Black Creek harbor; and the memorial of the Legislature of Iowa for the improvement of Des Moines Rapids, and that the same do lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR,

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the bill making an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Hudson river; and that the said bill do lie on the table.

Mr. MARK A. COOPER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made unfavorable reports on the cases of John G. Ford, D. W. Haley, and others, sureties of Alfred W. McDaniel and David Watkinson and company; which reports were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported

A bill for the relief of George Randall, and others; and which bills were severally read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A bill for the relief of Presley Scott;

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the case of Shropshire and Ross; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of James S. Calhoun, accompanied by a report.

Also, a bill to provide for the settlement of the claim of the State of Georgia for the services of her militia in the years 1835 and '36; which bills were read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. GALBRAITH, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the case of Robert McGuire; which was laid on the table.

Mr. G. also made adverse reports on the cases of George A. Winslow, John G. Bibb, John Wilson, Spartan Allen, Thomas J. Stone, Samuel Carter, Allen H. Powell, Rufus K. Love, Samuel U. Varian, administrator of David D. Varian, W. C. Ewing and U. C. Ewing, Isaac Carmack, John Brown, Adam Hall, Arthur R. Owens, Turner Chamblin, Joseph M. Shephard, Joseph Croskey and others, Allord Sandy, John P. Baldwin, Samuel D. Enoch, J. and M. Hamblin, William G. Sanders, William Cooley, Alexander Watson, Thomas W. Coker, the representatives of Elbert Anderson and Co., Vincent J. Strickland, William Fleming, Isaac S. Middleton, and William McKnaught; which reports were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee of Claims, reported back to the House Senate bill entitled An act for the relief of John Richey; with a recommendation that it be rejected. The bill was then committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee of Claims, reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Mackay," and made a report recommending that the bill be rejected. The bill was then committed to the Committee of the Whole House on to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. DOWNING, leave was granted Alexander Watson to withdraw the papers accompanying his petition.

Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John M. Brodhead; which was appropriately committed.

Mr. J. W. WILLIAMS also made an unfavorable report on the case of Ephraim L. Gilbert; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALBRAITH, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the case of Alexander W. Sanders; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to procure steam vessels for the revenue service;" which was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. C. from the same committee, also reported back to the House without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act making further provision to prevent the abuse of the flag of the United States, and the use of unauthorized papers in the forcign slave trade.

Mr. BURKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled an act for the relief of the legal representatives of Aaron Vail, deceased, late Consul at L'Orient, made a report recommending that the bill do not pass. The bill was then ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. REYNOLDS from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill supplemental to the act entitled an act to grant pre emption rights to settlers on the public lands, approved June 22, 1838; which was read the first and second time, and committed to the Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. GIDDINGS, Dr. John Gray had leave granted to withdraw his papers.

One hour having elapsed, and the committees not having been yet called through—

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MONROE hoped that the call of the committees would be completed

And the question being taken on the motion to suspend, the vote stood—ayes 49, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Mr. EVANS urgently requested Mr. JONES not to press his motion.

Mr. STANLY also hoped the gentleman would withdraw it. He (Mr S.) was in no hurry to proceed with his speech. He was very patient.

Mr. JONES said that, as there was no quorum present, he would move a call of the House.

Mr. PETRIKIN asked the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 63, nays 64.

So the call was refused. And a quorum being now present—

The question again recurred on the motion to go into committee.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 78, nays 54.

So the motion was agreed to.

And (at six o'clock) the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. EVANS of Maine in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, to amend the bill by adding an appropriation of $300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Mr. STANLY addressed the committee in continuation of his remarks commenced yesterday, which he concluded at about 8 o'clock.

Mr. LINCOLN wished to ascertain from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether this appropriation was intended to apply to the additional forces it was contemplated to send into Florida, for instance the 1,500 men proposed by the bill of the Military Committee, or merely for the expenses of the present force.

Mr. JONES was understood to say that he had held no correspondence with the Department on the subject, nor had he deemed it necessary to make the inquiry.

Mr. LINCOLN said that in that state of uncertainty he should not consider himself justified in voting for the amendment, as he was opposed to any increase of the standing army.

The committee, on motion of Mr. W. THOMPSON then rose,

And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, July 11, 1840.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana presented two several petitions, numerously signed by citizens of that State, praying for a reduction of the salaries of the officers of the Federal Government.

Mr. S. said he scarcely knew what disposition to make of the petitions at this late period of the session, however worthy of consideration the subject of the reduction of salaries might be, and he could not hope for any action upon them at this session; he would therefore lay them upon the table, to taken up hereafter and appropriately referred; which was ordered accordingly.

Mr. GRUNDY, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for the allowance of invalid pensions to certain Cherokee warriors, under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1835; which was read the first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Norris, and Frederick Sangrain of Arkansas, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama, on leave, introduced a bill making an appropriation of $55,450 for the improvement of the harbor of Mobile.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a joint resolution directing the transfer to the State of Maryland of the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, standing in the name of the United States.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to take up the bill from the House making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1840.

Mr. MERRICK said he hoped the Senator would not press that motion. It would be understood that when the Senate was disposed to adjourn over to Monday, he had urged on its consideration the necessity there existed for immediate action on the bill to recharter the banks of this District. The case was one of great urgency, and he hoped the Senate would indulge him in taking it up.

Mr. TAPPAN said he could see no great urgency in the matter, at least none that would warrant the Senate in taking it up to the prejudice of other bills of more importance. Besides, this was a bill from the House, and might be acted on at any time within the last three days of the session.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he should consider that there was some little urgency in a case where the entire business of the whole District was at a stand, persons driven out of employ, and industry paralyzed; and yet gentlemen "could see no urgency."

Mr. WRIGHT said that the naval bill was one of high importance to the country, and it was necessary that it should be acted on with the least possible delay, that it might be sent to the other body.

Mr. CLAY would inquire if the bill was likely to lead to much discussion. If there would be time enough left to dispose of the other bill, he would advise his friend from Maryland [Mr. MERRICK] to acquiesce.

Mr WRIGHT said that he thought it would take up very little time; the amendments were not very complicated. He would say to the Senator from Kentucky, that after the bill was disposed of, he for one would pledge himself to sit there until the District bill was disposed of.

Mr. MERRICK then yielded assent; when, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the bill making appropriations for the naval service of 1840 was taken up.

The following amendments reported hy the committee to the appropriation for a dry dock at New York being under consideration, "Provided that no other part of this appropriation shall be expended prior to the fourth day of March next, than may be required to cause the proper examinations, surveys, and soundings to determine whether or not the said dry dock can be properly and usefully located within the bounds of the property now owned by the United States in connection with the navy yard at Brooklyn, unless such location shall prove satisfactory, and the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the means of the Treasury will be sufficient to meet all appropriations for the current service for that period over and above the money to be drawn for the construction of the said dry dock."

Mr. WILLIAMS proposed to amend the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, so that $270,000, part of the $670,000 diverted from former appropriations, for the gradual improvement of the navy, should now be reappropriated for that object, and said: The bill, as passed by the House of Representatives, reappropriates $670,000 for the gradual improvement of the navy, to make good to that branch of the service the $330,000 appropriated last year, and $340,000 appropriated by this bill for building two steam vessels, which sums are directed to be taken from the amount heretofore appropriated for the gradual improvement of the navy. The Committee on Finance recommend the striking out the whole of this reappropriation, and assign their reasons for so doing to be the low state of the Treasury, and the probability that this money may not be required for use by the Navy Department until another year.

The object of the amendment proposed by me is to reduce the sum proposed by the House to be now reappropriated, and yet to retain such a portion of the reappropriation as seems to me to be essential to the purposes for which this money was originally granted. In 1827, Congress appropriated half a million of dollars annually for six years, to be expended in purchasing and preserving timber for the gradual improvement of the navy, and in 1833 continued the appropriation for six years more, and enlarged the objects of expenditure so as to include other materials for the same object; and in 1837, it was provided that a portion of the money might be applied for procuring ordnance. In 1833, it was found that $1,500,000 of these appropriations had not been expended, and would revert to the Treasury. Whereupon Congress reappropriated that amount for the purchase of timber and other materials for the navy, payable half in 1839 and half in 1840. By reference to the annual report and documents of the Secretary of the Navy at the commencement of the present session, it will be seen that in December last, there was unexpended of these appropriations, about - - - $870,000

To which is to be added the amount receivable in 1840, - - - 750,000

$1,620,000

And that contracts are now made, upon which there will be to be paid, when the contracts shall have been performed, about - - - - 1,200,000

Leaving about - - $420,000

at the disposal of the Navy Department, except that of the 330,000 directed by the act of 1839 to be applied to the building of steamers, only about $30,000 had then been drawn from the Treasury: and after the balance, say $300,000, shall be taken for that object, there will then remain about 120,000 beyond satisfying subsisting contracts, and the appropriation for steam vessels last year. The bill now under consideration directs a further sum of 340,000, to be diverted from the fund provided for procuring and preserving materials for the gradual improvement of the navy, to complete the steam vessels. This can only be done by using at this time money on hand belonging to the fund for the gradual improvement of the navy, which is pledged to the payment of subsisting contracts; but inasmuch as those payments are not to be made until the materials contracted for shall be delivered such a diversion might be made without injury to the service, provided the $670,000 so diverted, or part of it, could now be reappropriated, payable at a future day, as provided in the bill. Without some reappropriation, it will be seen that there is not a dollar at the disposal of the Navy Department beyond what will ultimately be required to satisfy subsisting contracts, and the appropriations of the last and present year for the steam vessels. It is understood that no provision has, as yet, been made for obtaining the necessary armament of any vessels to be constructed of the materials on hand, and that more time would be required to procure the proper armament, than would be necessary to build the vessels. There are but few places in the United States at which ordnance proper for ships of war can be procured, and it is desirable and important that the Department should have the power now to make arrangements for such ordnance, in order that it may be obtained at reasonable prices and in proper time. Without appropriation, the Department has no power to make any such arrangements, and who can tell how much the nation may suffer from our neglecting now to concur with the House in reappropriating at least a part of the sum which this and a former bill diverted from the fund so wisely set apart by our predecessors for the gradual improvement of the navy. The condition of the Treasury is the principal reason assigned by the Committee on Finance for amending the House bill, and while I would regret to make appropriations beyond the means of the Treasury to meet, am willing to modify the House bill so as to reduce the appropriation to the lowest possible point consistent with retaining any power in the Navy Department to provide for the armament of vessels when built, I cannot agree to strike out the whole reappropriation; but am ready to reduce it as far as may be consistent with what I regard the necessities of the service. It must be seen by every Senator that at the last and present sessions of Congress we take $670,000 from the fund appropriated for the gradual improvement of the navy, and apply it to building and completing two steam vessels, and this, in addition to the materials which had been provided for other vessels, and now used in these. At this I do not complain; but it seems to me that justice, as well as public duty, should constrain us to provide for the reimbursement, at some future day, of a part at least of this sum to enable the department to carry out the intention of those who provided a fund for the purchase of materials for the gradual improvement of the navy. All agree that the navy is the right arm of our defence, and how can it be justified that we shall divert money heretofore appropriated for procuring materials for the improvement of the navy and apply it to the building of steam vessels, without providing, at the same time, for the reappropriation of so much of it as will enable the department to procure ordnance and armament for the ships to be constructed from materials already on hand?

After some remarks from Mr. WRIGHT, the question was taken on Mr. WILLIAMS's motion, and it was lost.

The question then recurring on the amendment of the committee, some discussion ensued, in the course of which,

Mr. CALHOUN suggested that a similar appropriation to that made for a dry dock at New York, should be made for one at Pensacola. Mr. C. spoke of the long maritime frontier requiring stations in case of war, not only for our ships to repair to for security, but for defence also. He believed it all-important for the protection of Southern interests, and expressed the hope that while they were drying up the sources of so many surplus expenditures, the most liberal support should be extended to the navy.

After some remarks from Messrs. WILLIAMS, TAPPAN, and WRIGHT,

Mr. CUTHBERT said that he did not rise to enter into any argument to show the expediency of constructing dry docks either at New York or Pensacola, but to express his strong convictions that those who had the interests of this country at heart, and particularly the interests of the Southern portion of it, should adopt every means of keeping an important portion of the navy in the South. It was there, in the event of a war, a naval force would be more peculiarly necessary, and in that portion of the country was our commerce most vulnerable. It was, therefore, to be expected that the Southern States would receive from the justice of the other States such incidental protection as would be afforded by the employment of a sufficient part of our naval force on their coasts. Without intending to array any sectional interests on this question, he made these observations under the belief that their justice would strike the mind of every Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS urged the importance of speedy action on the subject, and showed the great want of a dry dock at New York. There were two ships of the line, he said, now lying there which were not in a state to be removed to Charlestown or Portsmouth, and which could not be repaired till a dry dock was constructed.

Mr. CALHOUN again spoke of the importance of Pensacola as a naval station, for the protection of the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, and called the attention of Western and Southwestern gentlemen to the subject, whose constituents were more immediately interested in it.

Mr. HENDERSON referred to the magnitude of the interests of the South and West that were involved in the protection of the Gulf. He did not believe, however, that a naval station at Pensacola would be a sufficient protection to New Orleans or Mobile, and he was not sure that there were not other sites on the Gulf more suitable than Pensacola. He was, however, in favor of the appropriation, as the dry dock would not be constructed, if upon a survey the site should be found to be unfavorable.

Mr. GRUNDY said he could not vote for the appropriation for Pensacola, until it was ascertained that the title of the United States to the public grounds there was a good one. He had been informed that an individual there laid claim to these grounds; and he wished this matter settled before the appropriation was made. He had no idea of having another Pea Patch affair on their hands, and would, therefore, vote against the appropriation.

Mr. CUTHBERT observed that the very objection urged by the Senator from Tennessee, showed the importance of pursuing this matter. It appeared that there were preliminary steps to be taken before the work could commence, and yet these preliminary steps had not been taken. Ample surveys, he said, ought to have been made before now, and if the title of the United States to the grounds they held there was doubtful, it should ere this have been inquired into. He made charges against no one, and reproached no one, but he must say that this important matter had been overlooked. He understood that surveys had been made, and were before the Executive; but these surveys ought not to be confined to the harbors of Pensacola; other sites should be examined, and the most suitable one selected and improved, until it was fit to receive such ships of the line as this great nation ought to possess. Conversing with a gentleman who was well informed on the subject, he learned that there were situations on the gulf where ships of the line of the largest class might ride in safety.

Mr. WALKER thought that this subject had been too long neglected. Eighteen months ago an appropriation was made by the Legislature of Mississippi for surveying the coast of the State at their own expense: and a report was made by the agents appointed for that purpose, stating that a particular site in the Gulf, and within the State of Mississippi, was the most suitable one on the coast for a naval station, both for depth of water, safe harborage, and other advantages. This report was communicated to Congress at this session. It was accompanied by a chart showing the depth of the channel, and yet they were now told that there were no surveys. We are now told, said Mr. W. that we are to wait till the surveying squadron employed in the coast survey shall reach this part of the Gulf. He had inquired of these officers at what period of time they expected to reach the coast of Mississippi; and he learned that, with the progress they are now making, it will be a quarter of a century before they reach any of the Southern waters. He regretted that he was constrained to speak in this manner; but he thought that the coast of the Gulf had been grossly and improperly neglected—that the surveys ought to have been made under the act of 1836, and that they ought not to be obliged to wait the progress of the surveying squadron. He was prepared to vote for a dry dock at Pensacola, though he believed that it was not the deepest harbor, and that there was a port in the neighborhood of it which had a much greater depth of water. He was in favor also of a dry dock at New York, as he was of increasing the navy.

Mr. WILLIAMS did not believe that the Navy Department had neglected the duties assigned them, and that the want of surveys on the Gulf coast was to be attributed to them.

Mr. CALHOUN said that, in order to try the sense of the Senate, he would offer an amendment appropriating the same amount for a dry dock at Pensacola as was appropriated for New York.

The CHAIR said the amendment was not now in order, the question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama suggested to the Senator from South Carolina to offer his amendment as an amendment to the amendments of the committee. This course he understood would be in order. He thought the course of the discussion had sufficiently satisfied every gentleman of the importance of having a naval station of the first class with dry docks for the repair of the largest vessels, on the Gulf of Mexico, and that that sea was so separated as to demand a separate naval force for the defence of the valuable commerce borne through it. He should have no objection if any other harbor than Pensacola should be selected, on proving to be more suitable, though he did not believe that any other place possessed so many advantages. He would suggest to the Senator from South Carolina to offer his amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CALHOUN here then moved to amend the amendment, by adding an appropriation of $95,000 for a dry dock at Pensacola, on the same terms as for that at New York.

Mr. TAPPAN made a few remarks in opposition to the amendment. He had no doubt but there were forty places on our coast very well suited for dry docks, and where they would be very useful if we had a navy as large as that of Great Britain. But with our present navy, he thought that the two we now had, one at Norfolk, and the other at Charlestown, were sufficient. If there were ships of the line at New York that wanted repair, and could not be taken to Charlestown, it had been the result, in his opinion, of bad management. He believed that a dry dock at New York, was not necessary, and he should, at a proper time, move to strike out the appropriation.

Mr. CALHOUN repeated his arguments, showing the importance of a dry dock at Pensacola, and the great advantages of that place for a naval station. He should not be content with a simply dry dock there. There was a large maritime frontier from the Chesapeake to Cape Florida, and another dry dock would be required for this immense coast. The position which a navy would occupy there, in the event of a war with the greatest maritime power of Europe, would be invaluable. It was the most exposed and vulnerable point in the Union, and the commerce was the most valuable. He hoped, while they were drying up the sluices of expenditure, which had been pouring out hundreds of thousands for nothing, they would turn their attention to this most important part of national defence.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he rose to ask the yeas and nays on the question. He said he had now heard from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] the very doctrine he (Mr. S.) had long since been satisfied would ultimately, unless arrested, appropriate every dollar of the revenues on the seaboard, in total and entire exclusion of the whole West. The Senator has said that, as the Government has now dried up the enormous expenditures which have been heretofore made, it was the proper time to make a survey of the port of Pensacola, with the object of making that a naval station, and erecting a dry dock and other buildings there. The proposition now is, after having refused appropriations to the Cumberland road and the harbors on the lakes, to seek another point on the salt waters to use the money that should be appropriated in completing the works already begun. It was a doctrine that he (Mr. S.) protested against. The West paid into the National Treasury its full share of the revenue, and he would never consent to a doctrine that would deprive her of her equal portion. This salt water doctrine was the rock on which all the future hopes of the West would be ultimately wrecked. He did not deny but that the West might contingently and remotely be benefited by a navy yard at Pensacola, but he was unwilling to abandon those works and harbors in which his State was directly interested upon the prospect of such a remote or possible contingency; and if he voted to expend the whole of the money that can be spared from time to time on the seaboard, he could not hope for a dollar to aid either the Cumberland road or the protection of Western commerce on the lakes. He desired to see how Senators would vote who had denied to the West a participation in the benefits of the public Treasury, and suffered her works to go to destruction for the want of small appropriations.

Mr. CUTHBERT would suppose that the peculiar object of the gentleman from Indiana as a Western man would be to give ample protection to the Gulf of Mexico, which was the great outlet for the products of the West. He said this in perfect good temper, and it appeared to him that all who lived in the Western country were interested in our having points on the Gulf where a navy could lie in safety. The gentleman, as a Western man, was peculiarly interested in this measure, and he could not but indulge the hope that upon reconsideration he would give it his support.

Mr. CALHOUN was glad that the Senator from Indiana had treated this matter in reference to Western interests, for it was susceptible of demonstration that it was peculiarly a Western measure, and that the Western people were more deeply interested in it than any other. The Senator had called for the yeas and nays in hostility to the amendment, because an appropriation was not made for the Cumberland road. Why, the Cumberland road was not worth the hundredth part of this measure to the Western people. Besides, in the supplies of the navy, the West was to be greatly looked to for supplies of beef, pork, corn, and iron. He was glad the Senator had called for the yeas and nays, as he was hostile to the measure, that his name on the yeas and nays might go to the West, and show the people how he supported their interests.

Mr. BENTON was glad that the Senator from South Carolina had moved this amendment. The interest involved in it was one of the largest to the West. The immense valley of the Mississippi had but one outlet. Its most valuable products were disembogued in the Gulf of Mexico, and when they got there, they wanted adequate protection. He looked upon the whole Gulf as nothing but an estuary of the Mississippi. That we must have a naval station there, and that Pensacola was the point, could not be doubted.

That we must also have a strong naval post either at Key Westor the Dry Tortugas, was equally clear. The time would come when our people would speak of the Gulf of Mexico as the Romans did of the Mediterranean. "Mare nostrum"—"our sea"—they would say; and upon it our most valuable property is to be assailed. He thanked the Senator from South Caroliua for his motion, and hoped it would prevail.

Mr. HENDERSON spoke of what he conceived the almost criminal ignorance of the Government in relation to the defence of the Southern maritime frontier. It knew nothing of any surverys in relation to the defence of a coast that passes off two-thirds of all the exports of the country.

[Mr. H. here read an extract of a letter which he had received from the Department.]

Here thousands, nay, millions, of the property of the South and West disembogues itself at points where there was not the slightest move yet made for its protection. He felt glad that the Senator from South Carolina had called the attention of the Southern and Western Senators to the subject and he hoped to see others moving in a point of so much magnitude. Mr. H. said, a large portion of our naval officers and the navy commissioners were all Northern men, with Northern feelings and associations, [Mr. CLAY, in an under tone: "Surely we have a Northern man with Southern feelings,"] and consequently not likely to look to Southern interests. Mr. H. said he was not prepared, however, to say that Pensacola was the best spot for a naval depot, or that the ports of Mobile and New Orleans would be properly protected. He thought, however, it might go far towards it.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] seemed to think that he (Mr. S.) had mistaken his position. And the Senator had attempted to show that Western interests would be benefited by the appropriation, and from this the Senator had argued that he (Mr. S.) was opposing the interest of his State. This conclusion of the Senator (said Mr. S.) is not warranted by the premises he has assumed. Mr. S. had admitted that the West might be contingently benefited by the proposed works, but he placed the question on other grounds. He was opposed to the doctrine by which this measure was to be carried. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] had spoken of having dried up the appropriations by which the West had heretofore received a portion of the money that section had paid into the National Treasury.

[Mr. CALHOUN here said he spoke of wasteful appropriations.]

Mr. SMITH said he presumed the Senator from South Carolina would admit that whether an appropriation was wasteful or not, was a matter of opinion. What the Senator from South Carolina might think wasteful, he (Mr. S.) might possibly think otherwise. He could assure the Senator that it would be difficult to make the people of his State believe that an appropriation to complete the Cumberland road would be a wasteful appropriation. Nor could the Senator easily satisfy that portion of the citizens of the West connected with the commerce of the lakes that the improvement of their harbors would be a wasteful appropriation, however the votes of Senators might be upon those subjects of Western interest.

It was intimated (said Mr. S.) that he should go for this appropriation because the citizens of his State might be interested in the work. He had taken his stand on this subject. He wished to be set down as opposed to this whole salt-water doctrine; not that he denied the constitutional powers of the Government to construct works in aid of the commerce on the seaboard; far from it; but he had for years seen the tendency of the administration of the Government to draw the whole appropriations to the salt water. The doctrine was, that the constitutional powers of the Government commenced upon the ocean, and terminated at the extreme of the flow of its waters upon the land. Some were willing to extend it to the lakes when there was money in the Treasury to spare, which had not been the case of late, at least for that purpose. He did not deny that the people of his State might be remotely and contingently benefited by this appropriation; but he would give no sanction by his vote to a doctrine that would draw from them every dollar of their specie through the public land offices, and through the imposts, and exclusively appropriate it on the seaboard, for the immediate benefit of those who deny the power of the Government to appropriate a dollar to objects of immediate interest to the West. Not a dollar could be had for the Cumberland road or the harbors on the lakes; and they are to be left to go to destruction, while the money which should have been appropriated to them is to be thrown upon the seaboard. He called the people of the West to this view of the case.

Mr. HUBBARD spoke at some length against the adoption of such a proposition at such a time, and that, too, when some of the very friends of the measure were doubtful whether Pensacola was the proper place or not. He hoped the motion would not prevail.

The question was then taken on Mr. CALHOUN'S amendment, and it was agreed to by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, Wall, and White—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Grundy, Hubbard, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Tappan, Williams, Wright, and Young—14.

Mr. TAPPAN then moved to strike out that part of the bill making appropriation for dry docks at New York and Pensacola.

Mr. BUCHANAN supported the motion.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama and Mr. WRIGHT opposed it.

Mr. BUCHANAN would say a few words in reply to the Senators from Alabama and New York, [Messrs. CLAY and WRIGHT.] The Senator from Alabama contended that this was the mere appropriation of a sum necessary to make surveys at New York and Pensacola, for the purpose of ascertaining the utility and practicability of constructing dry docks at those places. Was that the fact? Certainly not, according to the language of the bill. There were $95,000 appropriated at each place absolutely, and a portion of it was to be expended before the first of March next in making surveys. The appropriation was absolute; and the Congress of the United States would never hear of this subject again till the sites were fixed and a portion of the money expended. Now would it not be right, before making this important appropriation, that they should make the surveys? Shall we now said Mr. B in a blinde confidence in the Navy Department, or any other Department of the Government, declare that we should be bound by their decision; and that as soon as they are satisfied of the practicability of establishing dry docks at New York and Pensacola, that they should go on and construct them without further direction from Congress? That was the question, and the only question. Where was the necessity for this haste? No doubt a dry dock was necessary at New York, and also at Pensacola; but let such necessity be demonstrated, and at the next session of Congress, with all the information before them, it would be time enough to appropriate the amount sufficient to construct them. What was the state of the Treasury now? Why, they had to borrow money to defray the ordinary expenditures of the Government, but, in the course of the next session of Congress, things might grow better or worse. By that time the surveys would have been made and laid before them, and Congress could then be guided wisely by the state of the Treasury. But here was an appropriation to be expended before the end of the next session of Congress, except the sum necessary for preliminary surveys. Was that wise legislation? He considered New York and Pensacola in the same situation. Nothing could be done before the next session of Congress but fixing the sites. Beyond that he was not willing to go. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HUBBARD] was willing to make an ample appropriation for that purpose, and for that he should vote; but he could not conceive any case in which he would be willing to place in the hands of the Executive the power of determining whether such works should be constructed, and so large an amount of money to be appropriated without the further action of Congress. He objected to the principle involved, and if there was but one Senator to join him, he would oppose it.

The question was then taken on Mr. TAPPAN'S motion, and decided in the affirmative--yeas 21, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Grundy, Hubbard, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Roane, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, Williams, and Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Henderson, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Preston, Rugales, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, and Wright—19.

The amendments from the committee (except as above) were all agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON moved an appropriation ($30,000) for a survey of the coast between Monile and the mouth of the Mississippi.

This amendment, advocated by Mr. HENDERSON and opposed by Mr. WRIGHT, was agreed to, by yeas 21, nays 10.

It was afterwards modified in Senate, so as to make it a survey of the coast of the Gulf of Mexico.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the above $30,000 was required to be taken from the general appropriation for a survey of the coast of the United States.

The bill at half past 3 o'clock was ordered, as amended, to be engrossed.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

The bill for establishing a uniform rule of computing the mileage of members of Congress having been read a third time—

Mr. GRUNDY, after a few remarks on the forfeiture by the bill of the daily pay of a member of Congress, in case of his absence at any one call of the yeas and nays, moved to recommit the bill to the Judiciary Committee, (as the select committee was defunct,) with instructions to report a substitute, providing for the appointment, at an early day of each session, of a joint committee to determine and report the mileage of every member, according to the laws now in force.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky hoped the motion would not succeed. Two great objects would be attained by this bill, one the regulation of the mileage, and the other a correction of the great abuses (in hearing of which Mr. C. would not say how much he was shocked,) in regard to the stationery of members of Congress. He hoped the good work done yesterday would not be undone.

The motion was further opposed by Messrs. TAPPAN, HUBBARD, and CLAY of Kentucky, and advocated by Messrs. TALLMADGE and GRUNDY; when the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows: yeas 9, nays 23.

Mr. TALLMADGE then moved to postpone the bill until the first Monday in December next, and on that motion he demanded the yeas and nays.

The motion was lost—yeas 8, nays 24.

Mr. WHITE delivered his views at some length against the bill, calling it impracticable, and said he had too much respect for his constituents to vote for it.

The question was taken on its passage, and carried—yeas 22, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Nicholas, Preston, Roane, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clayton, Dixon, Henderson, Norvell, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, and White—8.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. MERRICK moved to take up the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia, when some objections were made as to the lateness of the hour, and indications made for an adjournment.

Mr. WALKER said he could not agree to adjourn, though he might as well state at once his objections to rechartering any bank in a state of suspension.

Mr. MERRICK still pressed the necessity there existed for taking up this bill. He thought the Senate was sufficiently informed on the subject, and he did not think it would occupy much of their time. The sooner it was begun the sooner it would be ended. At all events, it could be taken up and progressed with as far as the patience of the Senate would admit, after so long and exhausting a sitting; and he hoped a majority of the Senate would sustain his motion.

Mr. ALLEN said, if the Senator from Maryland supposed that such a bill was to make its way through the body at such a time, he was mistaken. It could not be done. He had amendments to offer and some remarks to make which would take up some time.

Mr. BROWN moved an adjournment; but the motion was lost by a vote of 17 to 12.

And the bill was then taken up and read, when

Mr. ALLEN offered several amendments, which were read, changing the entire character of the bill as reported from the committee. The amendments were all ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUBBARD presented one, which was also ordered to be printed, to the effect that the banks should not pay out the notes of any other bank when said banks are in a state of suspension.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 11, 1840.

Mr. RAYNER asked leave to submit a motion for the printing of 1,000 extra copies of a certain report made by him yesterday from the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. TURNEY objected.

Mr. CURTIS asked that the bill, heretofore reported by Mr. HILLEN from the Committee on Commerce, repealing the New York pilot law, be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CRARY objected.

The SPEAKER then called the committees for reports, commencing (where the call was suspended yesterday, with the Committee on the Public Lands,

On motion of Mr. LINCOLN, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, in relation to preemption rights to lands; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LINCOLN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House without amendment Senate bill entitled an act for the relief of Daniel B. Bush; and

An act authorizing the inhabitants of Fractional township ten south of range one east, in the State of Arkansas, to enter one half section of land for school purposes; which were severally committed to a committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back to the House, without amendment, Senate bill entitled an act to grant other lands to the inhabitants of townships deprived of the sixth section by Indian reservations; which was ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. M. from the same committee, reported a bill to continue in force the first section of the act entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office," approved July 7, 1838.

Mr. M. asked that the bill would be read the third time, and put upon its passage.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected. It contained a donation of land, and should be committed. He made a motion that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. MASON made some remarks, showing that it did not contain an appropriation. It was not originating new legislation, but simply extending an existing act.

The question was taken on the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole, and disagreed to.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MASON,

The Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill for the relief of bounty land warrants granted for military services in the army of the United States, in the late war between United States and Great Britain.

Messrs. CASEY and UNDERWOOD made some remarks showing the necessity and propriety of passing the bill, and it was read the third according to order, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MASON,

The Committee of the Whole was discharged from the consideration of the bill to extend the time of issuing military land warrants to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army. The bill having been ordered to be engrossed, was engrossed, and the question being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. BOND opposed its passage.

Mr. J. GARLAND obtained the floor and moved the previous question; which received a second.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved that the bill be recommitted.

Mr. WISE contended that to adopt such a motion was to kill the bill, as it could not be reached during the present session.

Mr. REYNOLDS insisted on the justice of Congress performing its contracts to its soldiers; and he hoped that the motion to recommit would not be agreed to, but that the bill would be passed.

Mr. BOND spoke in favor of a recommitment, with a view to an examination of the merits of the bill, and when members might be heard upon it.

Mr. WHITE of Kentucky replied to some of the objections of Mr. BOND, and was in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. CRAIG was opposed to recommitment. There was no necessity for it. Let gentlemen come directly up to the question, and vote for or against the bill, as they might deem it just or otherwise.

Pending the question, (the morning hour having expired,) Mr. BRIGGS called for the orders of the day.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the rules were suspended, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. EVANS of Maine in the chair,) on the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1840.

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. JONES to amend the bill by adding thereto an appropriation of $300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said, at the very commencement of this session, he had made a direct issue with the President, who said, in his message to us, that the resources of the Government for the next year would meet all the demands of the Treasury. He (Mr. T.) had then said that they would not, and that, if the President was ignorant of this, he was the only intelligent man in the United States who did not know better. He had then said that the resources were greatly exaggerated, and the expenditures as greatly diminished. Will any one now stand up here and say that the revenues will amount to the Secretary's estimate, or that the expenditures called for by the Administration will not exceed their estimates? Did the Executive know better? He ought to have know better: he had all the means of information before him; and I will prove it, that calls are now made through the committees for appropriations which it was then known were necessary.

In my remarks made upon the reading of the annual message, I asked, "why is there no estimate for the prosecution of the Florida war? Is that war to be abandoned, and the country surrendered to the Indians. If not, why have we no estimates for that war?" We are told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the Secretary of War then confidently anticipated that the war would be ended by the middle of the summer. Now, sir, I say, on my own responsibility, that the Secretary anticipated no such thing, and I will prove it. In the report of the Secretary in which this estimate should have been, and where we are told it would have been, but for this expectation of the Secretary, he enumerates the means by which he hopes to terminate this war. First, the armed occupation bill. Will any one have the boldness to say that he expected any practical results from this measure (neither then or now passed into a law) by the middle of summer? The second, the raising of an additional regiment for that particular service. Such a force could not have been raised and drilled as the Secretary proposes, by the time stated. But there is another fact, which places the matter beyond dispute. At one of the very first meetings of the Military Committee, the Secretary sent a proposition to raise this regiment, that it might be recruited and drilled in the summer, and take the field early in the fall. Now, sir, I ask, if this war was so confidently expected to end by the middle of the summer, why was the raising of this regiment proposed? If the war was to end, there was no earthly pretext for this increase of the army. If the war was not closed, there was no excuse for not including it in the estimates. No, sir, it was then as well known as it is now, that such an appropriation would be necessary; but as these annual documents are read with the utmost avidity, this false and fraudulent showing is made for popular effect, that the people may read the statement that the revenues will meet the wants of the Government; and now, at the close of the session, they come sneaking in and asking appropriations which they always knew would be wanting, and now have not the candor to ask half as much as will be required, if that war is to be prosecuted at all. For the last two years it has not been a war; just enough force to goad and irritate the Indians, but to do no earthly good. Mr. T. would not be understood as passing any censure upon the brave and distinguished men, many of them who had served in those most arduous campaigns, and passed a high eulogium upon them. The difficulties which they had to encounter at first, from the nature of an unknown and comparatively unexplored country, were insurmountable; most of these difficulties had now been removed. The fault was with the Administration, which for near three years, has allowed that war to languish without providing any adequate means of prosecuting it. We have bitterly realized the truth of the remark, that the greatest of calamities is a little war. It should be terminated at all hazards and costs. It is due to the South—to the honor of the country—to the people of Florida—to the cause of humanity. Let us no longer falter with this the most important matter now before us. My objection to the proposition is, that not half enough is asked. Why did the Secretary heretofore ask six hundred thousand dollars, and now only three hundred thousand dollars? Did he then ask twice as much as was necessary, or does he now only ask for half as much as is necessary? One or the other—he may choose between them. But it is said that it is because there is three hundred thousand dollars unexpended of former appropriations. This was the case at the period of the application for the larger sum. Did not the Secretary know it? He ought to have known it. But this appropriation is as well to prosecute the war as to pay arrearages. Why are there any arrearages, when there is a surplus on hand? It is another instance of blundering ignorance, of intentional deception? When we consider that the seat of war is a territory almost as large as Virginia, with a population not larger than a single county of Maryland, with swamps, hammocks, and everglades of interminable extent, abounding with game and fish of all sorts, supplying them with a commissariat, always at hand, and absolutely inexhaustible, with an immense and unguarded seacoast through which they are supplied with ammunition, and every thing else they may need—the very best country on the face of the earth for the successful practice of the tactics of Indian warfare, and at least a thousand of the most dangerous troops for such war—I know they have been estimated at less, but there are about that many—if we look to all these things, we will have some adequate perception of the means necessary to end that war, and of the folly and imbecility that has been paltering with it by such means as have been used for the last three years.

The whole of the regular army that can by any possibility be thrown there, should be immediately sent. At least ten thousand volunteers should be called out, and rewards, large rewards, offered to those not engaged in the military service, for captive women and children, and for warriors, alive or dead. Do this, and blockade the whole coast efficiently, and by vigorous concerted and concentrated movements, the war will be ended in three months. If you do not take some such efficient course, abandon the war; say to the people of Florida that their Government cannot, will not protect them, and let them go elsewhere. If there were twenty thousand instead of one thousand warriors, the difficulties would be less; the difficulty is in finding, not in whipping them, and the smaller their number, of course the greater their power of concealment.

Mr. T. had a very few words to say, on the bill proposing to raise an additional corps of 1,500 men for this particular service. Mr. T. had conversed with many of the most distinguished officers who had served in Florida, and without an exception they all approved the measure. This was high authority with him. He would not lightly reject a measure which was backed by such authority. It is contemplated to raise three battalions of 500 men each, to serve during the war; to be drilled during the summer, not in the regular tactics, but in a system suited to that service. This is precisely what was done by General Wayne previous to his Northwestern campaign, which ended with the successful battle of the Miama. It is proposed to induce suitable men to enlist in this service by an additional bounty of 160 acres of land or one hundred dollars in money. The troops will be recruited, trained, and armed with a view to this particular service, and I believe with the energy and rivalry of the respective battalions, it will do much good as an auxiliary—a sort of guerilla force. Of itself, I should not expect that it could terminate the war. The bounty will be the only additional expense, for the corps is to be officered from the officers of the regular army now in commission, so that there are to be no additional officers, and our army is not full as to privates by about 4,000, and I shall offer an amendment to the bill that the army is in no case to exceed its present complement, so that in point of fact it is no addition in numbers or expense to the present organization.

Mr. BIODLE said he was willing to go as far as any man in making appropriations necessary to maintain the honor of the country; but he had been so often deceived and cheated in yielding to importunities, and to threats, too, that he would not go blindly into any further appropriations. He must first see his way clear—he must have some guarantee that the confusion and absurdity, and want of intellect which had characterized the management of this war up to the present time were about to disappear. As yet, he regretted to say, the House had no reason to believe that such would be the case.

Mr. B then addressed the committee for nearly two hours on the general policy of this war, and the abuses which had marked its management, and concluded by adverting briefly to the "gross and brutal" attacks which had been made upon himself in the "Globe" newspaper, simply because, as a member of the House, he had asked for light and information.

Mr. HUNT followed in a review of the extravagant and wasteful expenditures which had attended the Florida war, and was still on the floor, when the CHAIR having announced the hour of half past two o'clock—

The House took a recess until 4 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. HUNT of New York resumed and concluded the speech he had begun in the morning on the subject of the Florida war, the manner in which it had been conducted, and the waste of public money which had attended every stage of its progress.

Mr. W. O. BUTLER of Kentucky then took the floor, and in a strain of eloquence seldom equalled in a legislative body, and which rivetted the attention of all parties, proceeded to vindicate the course of the Administration, and to repel the aspersions attempted to be cast upon it by the two preceding speakers.

Mr. B. alluded at some length to the course pursued by the late President Jackson in relation to the Indians, and denied with much warmth that the object of that great man, in removing them beyond the Mississippi, was for their ultimate destruction. He asked what man there was in the least conversant with the Indian character, who did not know that removing them into the wilderness, where they could roam amidst the wild beauty and grandeur of nature was the only means of preserving them? The nature and habits of the Indian and white man were so totally different, that nothing could assimilate them together. The course pursued, then, by President Jackson, was the only course that could have been pursued. The Indian lived by his gun and his bow, and his delight was in the chase. Said Mr B. give him the high mountain, the deep, dark glen, the rushing billow, and the still calm lake, and you leave untouched all that is noble in his nature. But take his arms from his hands, deprive him of his bow and his gun, shut him out from the solemn grandeur of his primeval forests, and the deep thrilling wild music of nature, and you reduce him to drudgery and make a slave of him at once. This would not do. Then, continued Mr. B. was it not right for President Jackson to remove them to the wild land, where they could enjoy their own customs, and live in a state congenial to their nature? There was no candid mind, he was sure, who would not admit that no better course could have been pursued. He had also abundant testimony to prove that the condition of the Indians had been greatly benefited since their removal beyond the Mississippi.

Mr. B. then proceeded to throw some light on the motives of many of the Opposition in opposing that war. He contended that, to the Abolitionists, the Territory of Florida was a very important spot. It was of vast importance to them, and the only theatre in the South where they could carry out their nefarious schemes. He showed the peculiar adaptability of the geographical position of Florida for the operations of the fanatics. One portion of the Territory, for instance, stretched almost to Cuba, a place substantially in possession of a rival power engaged in the abolition scheme. Yes, Cuba was the favorite and convenient spot where all these gentry met to concoct their schemes.

Mr. B. also made some allusion to the common interest that was attempting to be created by the Abolitionists between the negro and the Indians in Florida, and that consequently the Abolition party in the House might well show so much solicitude about the war.

In order to show that he was not mistaken in the views he had taken, Mr. B. caused to be read several extracts from the Abolition Almanac and other papers, all tending to show the true point at which the Abolitionists were aiming in their censure of the Administration in relation to this war; and that by their own confession, they were prepared to dissolve the Union if necessary, to carry out their nefarious schemes.

Mr. B. then adverted to the charge made that morning by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, viz: that the Administration had disgraced themselves by carrying on this war.

Now, it appeared that it was the plan of the Opposition to select every year some officer of the Government for their especial vengeance. Last year the Secretary of the Treasury was singled out as the victim, and the "Investigating Committee" was appointed, who went to New York, and produced, as the fruit of their labors, the famous Swartwout report, the great text book of the party, which was sent through the Union and quoted from every stump and horse block in the country. But what had become of that wonderful document that was to effect so much—that was to annihilate the Secretary of the Treasury, and bring infamy on the Administration? What had become of that great text book? Had the character, integrity, and high standing of the Secretary been affected by it? No; that officer had come out unscathed from the searching investigation, and his enemies had been unable to gratify their vindictive feelings. The great document had, for a moment, made a ripple, a bubble in the great political cauldron of the Opposition, but it had sunk, and was heard of no more.

Having failed in their attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury, the next object for their vengeance was the Secretary of War. Mr. B. then adverted at some length to the course pursued by the Secretary of War in relation to the Florida campaign, and defied the Opposition to show where that officer had been remiss in his duty. Why did they not make specific charges against him, so that they could be answered, and not make general and sweeping denunciations, to which they knew no answer could be made?

Mr. B. then took a review of the whole subject of our affairs in Florida, from the commencement of the war to the present time. He warmly vindicated the conduct of the Government in furnishing men and means, and the valor and conduct of our generals and troops, attributing the failure of the campaign to the nature of the country and the peculiar character of Indian warfare, to which no troops were adapted but such as had wrested Kentucky from the savage foe that warred upon the early settlers of the West. In the course of his remarks, he gave a beautiful and glowing sketch of the hardships encountered by the early settlers of the West, as they took their way through the flowery wilderness, and maintained their ground with the implement of husbandry in one hand, and the weapon of war in the other. He referred to the many dangers they encountered, and the constant trials they underwent, when the prowling Indian would seek them as they slept amidst the still hour of midnight, with no eye to watch them but the eye of Omnipotence. Such men, he contended, who knew the Indian character, were the only soldiers proper for conducting the Florida war.

Mr. B. concluded at about half past seven.

Mr. GRAVES then took the floor, when the committee rose, And the House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, July 13, 1840.

Mr. NORVELL presented a memorial from the citizens of Detroit, asking that an appropriation may be made by Congress for the purpose of constructing a railroad from that city to the Northern boundary of Ohio.

Mr. CRITTENDEN presented a memorial from citizens of the District of Columbia, asking a recharter of the banks. The memorial was ordered to be printed, without the names.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Ezra Chapman, deceased.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill in addition to an act "concerning pilotage," approved March 2d 1837.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the Committee on Claims, made unfavorable reports upon the claims of Hiram H. and W. J. Lewis.

Also, on the petition of citizens of Jackson county, Alabama for the payment of claims of Alabama volunteers.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported a bill authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims of the State of Alabama.

The following bills, received from the House, were read and ordered to a second reading:

An act to continue in force the 1st section of an act entitled, "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office," approved July 7, 1838.

An act for the relief of the owners of bounty land warrants granted for military services in the army of the United States in the late war between the United States and Great Britain.

The joint resolution for the exchange of books and public documents for foreign publications.

INDIAN PENSIONS.

Mr. LINN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the House bill referred to them granting pensions to Cherokee warriors engaged the late war with Great Britain, to the same amount respectively as if they were citizens of the United States. This bill, the Senate, by consent, proceeded at once to consider.

Mr. PIERCE remarked that this bill provided for the pay of these pensions from the time of the disability; whereas it was a rule of the Senate, most fully established, to allow pensions only from the time when the proof of disability was presented to the Government.

Mr. GRUNDY argued that there was an essential difference between this case and that of our own citizens, inasmuch as laws had long been in existence in favor of the latter, whereas there had heretofore been no law providing pensions for these Indians, so that their not adducing proof of their disability was not their fault, but the fault of the Government in not giving them an opportunity to do so.

Mr. PIERCE said he should, notwithstanding, move to amend the bill, by requiring the pensions to commence from the time of the treaty, (1835,) and if the Senate should negative that proposition, he should regard it as an instruction, in effect, to vary from the rule hereafter in other cases. There were many examples of very great hardship, under this rule, in case of our own citizens, one of which Mr. P. stated was that of a Captain, who performed important services at Baltimore, and was twice shot down. Particular circumstances had prevented him from making out his proof till 1837. He was now poor and disabled, and the committee by the rule in question were compelled to allow him a pension only subsequent to 1837. Mr. P. therefore moved that the pension to these Cherokees be paid only after the time of the treaty, (1835.)

Mr. LINN insisted on the argument used by Mr. GRUNDY in favor of the bill, and added that he thought the case of the Cherokees a most meritorious one, inasmuch as, though they were aliens to our people, and with the recollection of supposed injuries, they had fought the battles of our people, they fought for us, notwithstanding their prejudices against us as a people.

Mr. BUCHANAN signified his concurrence in the views of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PIERCE.] He thought it right that the pensions should go back to the time of the treaty, but not beyond, unless the Senate meant to abandon the rule on this point, to which they had heretofore adhered. And would not these Indians have as much as they could squander if they received at one time a five years' pension?

Mr. LUMPKIN asked the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield the floor for a moment; and Mr. B. having done so, Mr. L. read from the treaty a provision that the pensions should commence "from the time of the disability."

Mr. BUCHANAN said it would require a very strong argument to go against the explicit language of the treaty.

The bill, as it was, was ordered to a third reading.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill to charter certain banks in the District of Columbia was taken up, and the amendments proposed by Mr. ALLEN to the amendments of the committee were discussed at length, and adopted.

The question then coming up to agree to the amendment as amended, it was lost.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then offered some amendments to the bill as it came from the House; pending which,

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 13, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the case of Lieutenant Hooe, be required to report forthwith to this House who are legal witnesses under the existing laws, before courts martial in the navy of the United States; and further to report who shall hereafter be examined as witnesses in trials before such courts.

Mr. MITCHELL objected; whereon

Mr. CHAPMAN moved a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays. He was determined to press the matter home now it was begun, and was determined to bring other gentlemen up to the "bull ring."

[Mr. C. here had reference to the language of Mr. BOTTS, when that member commenced operations on this unfortunate subject.]

There being but a few members present,

Mr. CHAPMAN moved a call of the House, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 73, nays 55.

So the call was ordered, and the roll called, when 171 members answered to their names.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, all further proceedings in the call were then suspended.

The question then recurring on the motion to suspend the rules, for the purpose of submitting the resolution, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 100, nays 61:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Biddle, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Crabb, Crary, Cross, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dickerson, Dellet, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fletcher, Floyd, Galbraith, James Garland, Goggin, Graham, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hook, Hopkins, Jackson, Jameson, Jenifer, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, King, Leet, Lucas, McClellan, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, S. W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Parrish, Parmenter, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Rayner, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Robinson, E. Rogers, Ryall, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumpter, Swearingen, Sweney, Philip F. Thomas, Trumbull, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, David D. Wagener, Warren, Watterson, Weller, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, L. Williams, and Worthington—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Barnard, Bell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, James Cooper, Cranston, Crockett, Edward Davies, Garret Davis, Edards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Granger, Graves, Green, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hunt, James, Charles Johnston, Kempshall, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, Naylor, Osborne, Palen, Pope, Proffit, Randall, Randolph, Rariden, Ridgway, Russell, Sergeant, Simonton, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Waddy Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Peter J. Wagner, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Wise—61.

So, there not being two thirds, the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the rules were then suspended, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole (Mr. EVANS in the chair) on the

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question pending was the amendment of Mr. JONES, appropriating $300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Mr. GRAVES, being entitled to the floor, spoke at some length in opposition to the policy of the Administration in relation to the war, but was inclined to think he should vote for the appropriation, and hold the Administration responsible for the use of it.

Mr. DOWNING of Florida obtained the floor and spoke till the hour of recess, without concluding, in a criticism of the manner in which the Florida war had been conducted.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

The consideration of the Army Appropriation bill was resumed in Committee of the Whole, Mr. EVANS in the chair.

The question pending was on the amendment of Mr. JONES, appropriating $300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Mr. DOWNING of Florida resumed his remarks, and entered into a full discussion of the manner in which that war has been conducted. He contended that on the system hitherto pursued, the war would never be ended, as the Indians, in their fastnesses, would defy the finest troops that could be brought against them. He maintained that if, after a battle had been fought, the Indians had been followed up, the campaign would have terminated successfully long ago. It appeared to him, however, that an Indian battle was like the small pox, for one trial was always enough. In the course of his remarks, Mr. D. exonerated the War Department from all blame, in relation to the blood hounds. He said it was solely a Territorial measure, with which Government had nothing to do. And so incensed were the people of Florida against the murderous savages, that he verily believed if the Prince of Darkness himself should offer his services as an ally, they would accept him.

Mr. D. censured the President for not calling for adequate means to prosecute the war, and contended that, with a proper number of men, the war might be brought to a close in a single campaign. He complained that no more than $300,000 was asked for by the Government, as by such scanty means the war might be continued, but could never be brought to a close. The people of Florida were tired of the carrying on of the war. They wished to see it closed. He spoke of the cruelties which had been practised upon the people of Florida by the regular army.

Mr. MONROE followed, and with much warmth vindicated the conduct of the brave officers who had served in that war, and particularly General Scott, from the attack of Mr. DOWNING. He contended that they had done all that it was possible for men to do under similar circumstances, and that proper allowance had not been made for the many obstacles with which they had to contend.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then took the floor, and gave his views as to the plan which ought to be pursued in order to bring the war to a successful termination. He was in favor of establishing a chain of log huts throughout the whole territory, at suitable distances, and connecting with each other. He went on to show that this system might be carried out at much less expense than would be imagined, and that the concurrent testimony of all who were capable of judging was in favor of such a plan. He alluded to several instances where ten or twenty men, sheltered in one of these huts, had successfully defended themselves against many hundreds of the enemy.

Mr. U. then went into a defence of General Jessup against the attack made upon him by Mr. BIDDLE, in relation to the manner in which he had conducted the war. That officer, Mr. U. said, had received more wounds, and shed more blood, in defence of his country, than any man engaged in the last war, against the Indians and the British. He spoke of the many battles in which he had bled; you could not now shake him by the hand, unless by taking hold of a shattered limb. He spoke of the manner in which he had superseded General Scott in the management of the Florida war, and said it was not by his own seeking; and was not sent there until after Scott had been recalled as unworthy of command.

Mr. STANLY next took the floor, and on his motion,

The committee rose, and

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, July 14, 1840.

The PRESIDENT pro. tem. laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, covering a report of the superintendent of standard weights and measures; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRICK presented a memorial of a committee appointed by the Board of Aldermen and Board of Common Council of the city of Washington, remonstrating against the passage of a bill pending before the Senate "to amend and continue in force the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington;" which was read and ordered to be printed.

Mr NORVELL said he would take the liberty of noticing one mistake—indeed he might say gross error—in the memorial. The bill reported by the select committee was complete in itself, and contained all the powers which it was contemplated to grant, and made no reference to any other law, except for the purpose of repealing them. There were other errors in the memorial, both of fact and principle, which he would not at present notice, from a desire to avoid a debate at this stage of the proceeding.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the consideration of the petitions of Thomas Goin, of Timothy Winn, of Polly Clough, and of John Judge.

Mr. W. also, from the same committee, made adverse reports on the bill to regulate the pay of masters of the navy.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill for the relief of the Mobile and New Orleans railroad companies, including that of West Feliciana, (a particular bill for which was therefore indefinitely postponed.) Also, the Grand Gulf Railroad and Banking Company. The bill was read and ordered to a second reading.

DEFENCES OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. PIERCE, in behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of "the memorial of Gen. Edmund P. Gaines, proposing a system of national defence, and praying its adoption by Congress." And also from "the memorial of the military convention, holden at Norwich, Vermont, praying for the revision and alteration of the system of military defences of the United States."

Mr. P. said the inquiry had been repeatedly made, "What are the views of the committee upon this subject?" and before the question was taken upon the motion just submitted, he would briefly respond to that interrogatory, presuming, however, to speak for no member but himself.

The present session, it was well known, had, for several reasons, not been a season propitious for the discussion and adoption of any improvements in the plan of our national defences. This had been sufficiently manifested by the character of the debate that took place some days since upon one branch of the general question—the reorganization and discipline of the militia. But, although the committee had not deemed it expedient at this time to present a report, it had been deferred from no want of a deep conviction of its importance. He would rejoice if the public mind could be effectually directed to the subject; and he hoped that he might at least be able to call the attention of Senators to the memorials, which (although parts of each would doubtless be regarded as extravagant) contained, nevertheless, practical views and suggestions well worthy of consideration in connection with the very important measures of which they respectively treated—measures, he would take occasion to remark, that had been discussed with great ability in the report of a board of officers, communicated to the Senate by the President, in April last. He hoped the subject would be taken up at an early day in the next session, and be so deliberately and definitively acted upon, as to give to our mode and means of defence, efficiency, uniformity, and the advantage of a settled system. We could now do it with the light of enlarged experience, and the benefit of many experiments made at the expense of others. In this age of progress, and in this land of invention, and almost boundless resources, we were not the people to stand still. We had not stood still. But while individual and private enterprise had kept pace, in all the various pursuits of life, with the best improvements of the day, it must be admitted, considering our position upon the globe—the immense extent of our maritime frontier—the mode in which we must be assailed, if ever successfully assailed, by a foreign foe—the easy access to our most commanding harbors—the vast importance and exposed condition of our great commercial cities, especially since the successful application of steam power to ocean navigation—that we had been singularly regardless of the advances and improvements which, in other countries, especially in France and England, had, within the last few years, materially changed, and were now rapidly changing the character of defensive and offensive operations, both on the land and the sea. We should not shut our eyes to these things. We should not remain unmindful of changes in the art and practice of war, exceeded in importance only by those which followed the discovery of gunpowder in the fourteenth century.

There were some things about the military defences of this country, which might be considered as settled, in relation to which there could be little if any difference of opinion. For instance—he regarded it as certain, that no large standing army was ever to be maintained here in time of peace, while our free institutions remain unshaken. In this we differed entirely from those nations with whom, from our position and political relations, we were in the greatest danger of being drawn into collision. It was equally certain, in his judgment, that stationary fortifications, in the best condition, with abundance of materiel, and well manned, would prove wholly inadequate to the defence even of our large commercial cities. It must be regarded as not less clear, that no foreign power could ever embark in the Quixotic enterprise of conquering this country, unless its Constitution should be first trampled in the dust by its own children. Such a project could never be soberly contemplated, he might safely assert, while we were a united people. During the Revolution—in the weakness of our infancy—the invaders could scarcely command more territory than they were able immediately to occupy. The possession of any particular place, however important in itself, would be of little consequence, as bearing upon the ultimate result of a conflict. We had no great metropolis like Paris, which, in possession of one power or another, could control the country. And from the nature of our institutions, and the extent of our territory, we never could have. The leading purposes of an enemy, therefore, would be, by the celerity and boldness of his movements on our coast, to keep up a constant alarm; to harass and cut off our commerce; to destroy our naval depots and public works; and if possible, to lay our great commercial cities under contribution or in ashes. It was against prompt movements and vigorous exertions for objects like these, for which we should prepare and provide. Our fortresses were not to invested and made the objects of long, regular seige; they were not, for reasons to which he had before adverted, of sufficient consequence in this country, whatever might be the case in others, possessing limited territory and different situation. In the nature of things this would not take place, and it need not be contemplated in their construction. France and England had, and always must maintain, large and well appointed standing armies: they were the the indispensable appendages of regal power and dominion, without which no monarch in Europe could retain his crown a single year. They had not only them, but they had now the means of planting them upon our shores; nay, of quartering them in the heart of our cities, before we could set in order our insufficient, and now deserted fortresses, or call into the field any affective force organized as our militia at present was; indeed in some of the States there was no organization whatever; it was wholly disbanded, and men whose thoughts were never elevated above the contemplation of loss and gain, were out in the newspapers, with their calculations to show exactly how many dollars and cents would be saved annually by the "disbandment" of this safe and sure auxiliary in our defence.

Sir, said Mr. P. can any thing be more deplorably characteristic of the prevailing spirit and passion of the age?

If he was right on these points, we were not in a condition to warrant the folding of our arms in security. We were at peace, but we might be involved in war, we knew not how soon. This we did know, that the only sure way to keep it far off, was to provide for its approach.

He was not disposed to give color to any unnecessary alarm, but he felt bound to say that the indications of a speedy and pacific termination of the difficulties growing out of the North-eastern boundary question, which seemed to have strongly impressed other minds, had wholly failed to impart any fresh confidence to his. He feared that they would prove to be specious rather than substantial. He could not help feeling strongly upon this subject of national defences, because he had witnessed the deep lethargy in which the spirit of the nation, easily roused to every thing else, had seemed to slumber here. Within the last five years war clouds had lowered most portentously upon our horizon, and on one or two occasions seemed ready to burst, and scatter far and wide the calamities of that dreadful scourge. What was the effect upon the Government and the country, when, upon a question of money, we were upon the eve of a war with one of the most powerful and gallant nations upon the face of the earth. Did we manifest a willingness to apply our money in preparation for the contest. No. He would be ashamed to state, there in his place, the total want of any thing like adequate means of defence. In Congress there was as usual no want of patriotic demonstration in the way of speeches, but they were followed by nothing like decisive action. Through the country there appeared to be a profound repose, and blind trusting to luck in the face of admitted imminent danger. In the beneficent ordination of Providence, and through the energy and wisdom of that very extraordinary man, who always proved equal to great occasions, the impending danger was happily averted. How had it been more recently, when, for a long time, there had been a quasi war along our whole border, from St. Johns to the Lakes. In what condition did the evening of the 21 March, 1839, find the country? In what state did it find us in our places here? Like the nation generally—calm and undisturbed. Senators then present would not soon forget the scene that followed the arrival of the Eastern mail that night. The stirring report soon passed around the chamber, "there has been a battle upon our Eastern frontier; the blood of our citizens has been shed upon our own soil." A change came over the spirit of our dream. Every countenance was lighted up with high excitement. We were at last, when the strange spell of fancied security could no longer bind us, roused as from the delusion of a charm—we woke as from the trance of years—as from a dream we opened our eyes upon a full view of the nearness and magnitude of our danger. He would never forget the bearing on that occasion, nor the burning words of an honorable Senator on the other side of the chamber, not now in his place. That Senator seemed to feel that by our culpable neglect to provide the means of defence, we had almost invited aggression, and that we ought ourselves to take our places in the fiercest of the eddying storm which it was then supposed had already burst upon our border brethren. Every word, as then understood, he believed was heartily responded to. What was done? All that could be under the circumstances in which we were placed. The constitutional term of one branch of Congress had but a few more hours to run. There was little time for deliberation, but we showed that there was one contingency in which we could merge every thing like party, and present an unbroken front. We passed a bill placing at the disposal of the President the whole militia of the United States, to be compelled to serve for a term not exceeding six months—to raise fifty thousand volunteers—"to equip, man, and employ in active service all the naval force of the United States—and to build, purchase, or charter, arm, equip, and man such vessels and steamboats on the Northern lakes and rivers, whose waters communicate with the United States and Great Britain, as he shall deem necessary." This fearful responsibility was cast upon one individual. This vast command, with ten millions of dollars to make it effectual, was committed to the sole discretion and patriotism of the President. No man who loved his country could but deprecate the necessity of placing such tremendous and fearful powers in the hands of one man, however wise and disinterested.

He warned the people against another such crisis. Sooner or later it would come, and perhaps unattended by that good fortune which had borne us thus far on in peace. At all events, it was the most fatal temerity to depend upon it, and neglect the necessary preparation. What should be done? Where lies the most obvious, the most unquestionable and cheapest means of defence to the country? These were questions to which the memorialists undertook respectively to respond. He did not of course propose at this time particularly to examine the report of the board of officers to which he had before adverted but would take the liberty to remark that the positions assumed were much more questionable than the ability with which they were discussed and defended. There was at least one point of agreement between the memorialists, and one in which he thought both were right. It was as to the entire insufficiency of land or stationary defences to protect our harbors, and secure the approaches to them. That this had been fully illustrated in more than one instance, even when wind and sails had been relied upon, he might safely assert, without intending to discuss the relative power of floating and stationary batteries. How much less the security now, with the general and free application of the propelling power of steam, it required no particular science nor military knowledge to judge. He referred particularly to the passing of the castle of Crohenburgh, and the successful attack of Lord Nelson upon Copenhagen in 1801, to the attack upon Gibraltar by the French and Spanish in 1782, and the assault upon Vera Cruz, and the reduction of the strong castle of San Juan de Ulloa a year ago last November, all of which had been cited on both sides in the controversy between stationary and floating defences. Gentlemen would be more safe in reading the official and authentic accounts, and drawing their own conclusions, than in trusting to the statements of the supporters of one system or the other. Mr. P. said he would by no means dispense with the stationary fortifications upon which we had so much relied; in many positions they were indispensable, but, in his judgment, the system, with us, had already been carried too far in respect to the number of works, and in some instances, as to the vast expense incurred upon individual works. Our country was too broad—too immense in its sweep to rely upon such works. No man would be so visionary as to indulge the chimerical scheme of making a seacoast of more than 3,000 miles impervious to attack. There were not only a great number of harbors and roadsteads along the coast that could not be thus defended, but almost innumerable indentations, affording safe anchorage, from which a superior naval force might land any number of troops, notwithstanding the entire completion of the most extensive plan of stationary fortifications that was ever yet dreamed of. They could not be compelled to land under the guns of a battery, or to place themselves within its range. Unless they should be met successfully upon their chosen element, they would take their own time and pretty much their own place, to disembark. The contest would then be in the open field between our armies and theirs—generally between the steadiness and thorough discipline of their veteran, but mercenary regiments upon a foreign soil; and the valor and desperate energy of ours, fighting, it might be, within sight of their own homes.

That we were now sadly deficient in the means of defence, was a fact admitted by all. In that condition we ought not to remain. We should provide our harbors, that hold out the greatest temptation to an invading foe, in addition to the stationary fortifications, with the best floating defences known to the world. We should make, as soon as it can be done consistently with other demands upon the revenue, our navy equal at least to one-sixth of that of great Britain. We should never go for conquest. We had, in territory, and climate, and resources, all that any people should desire, and the armament alluded to was believed to be as large a proportion as England would ever be able to spare from other points, and detach to our seas. Consistently with the demands upon the revenue! He would not say that. He held that, with the wealth and great resources of the country, we should make our revenue equal to this demand. Want of funds should hereafter be regarded as no good excuse for neglecting defences universally admitted to be indispensable for the honor and safety of our country. If the current revenue was not sufficient for these and other objects of like magnitude and necessity, let articles of luxury and ornament, such as wines and silks, which are annually imported and consumed in the country, be taxed to raise the means. The navy of Great Britain consisted at present of five hundred and fifteen ships and twenty-three steamers, and mounted more than twenty-two thousand guns: France two hundred and thirty ships; America fifty-two in all, and thirty-eight effective, mounting only three thousand guns. Now the least with which we should be satisfied in our naval armament, was an increase at the lowest of fifty per cent. In the mean time, we should provide for an organization of the militia, to be efficient and uniform throughout the United States.

Thus prepared, with our large cities in a suitable state of defence, and with six hundred thousand disciplined citizen soldiers, so enrolled and organized as to admit of being promptly mustered and called into the field, we should be ready for that which, under such circumstances, would hardly be pressed upon us.

He would not be understood as admitting for a moment, that we would not, even unprepared as we now were, expel in a little time any invader that should venture to set foot upon our soil. He entertained not a doubt of it, because the same spirit that in 1793 prompted the celebrated decree of the French Convention, which proclaimed that—

"From the present moment, till that when all the enemies shall have been driven from the territory of the Republic, all Frenchmen shall be in permanent readiness for the service of the armies; the young men shall march to the contest: the married men forge arms and transport the provisions; the women shall make tents and clothes, and wait in the hospitals; the children shall make lint of old linen; the old men shall cause themselves to be carried to the public squares to excite the courage of the warriors, and preach hatred against the enemies of the Republic; the battalions, which shall be organized in every district, shall be ranged under a banner with this inscription: 'The French nation risen against tyrants.'"

The spirit which rendered that people invincible, and crowned their arms with such a succession of splendid victories over the veteran troops of the allied powers, as astounded the civilized world, would animate our countrymen from one extremity of the Union to the other; but let every man consider what dreadful sacrifices must precede the final result, if war come upon us in our present defenceless state. While our citizens were taking their places under the folds of the banner which the Republic would throw over them—a slow process at best for want of organization—our gallant little army, to which the country looked with pride and confidence, would be sacrificed; the blood of our most valuable citizens would perhaps stain the pavements of their own streets; and more property be destroyed in one commercial city, than would now defray the entire expense of perfect protection and security. This, Mr. P. said, was what might happen; and was that against which moderate patriotism and ordinary prudence should provide. He indulged the hope that when this storm of politics should have passed away, the Senate would take the subject up in the spirit and with the enlarged views of statesmen, acting for the common interest of their common country.

Mr. PRESTON remarked that he thought our system of fortifications had been commenced on too gigantic a scale. They ought to have been completed at less expense than had been already laid out upon them. And those which were completed were so large that it was difficult to man them.

Our whole inland frontier ought to be regarded as not needing fortifications. We were there, every where, in the attitude to invade, and not to be invaded; for we could there, in any case inflict tenfold more on an enemy than they could on us. And there was another consideration which ought to have more weight than had been heretofore given it in relation to our defences, and it was this: we were not a conquering nation, and were not to be conquered. The country was absolutely and intrinsically incapable of being conquered. The whole question, therefore, in relation to our defences, was a question of annoyances; and on that principle, and on that alone, the whole system of our defences ought to be projected and arranged. We should have merely points d'appui, to retreat to and refit.

Mr. P. proceeded to remark that an entire revolution was now going on, in regard both to inland and maritime defence, by the agency of steam. Railroads would enable large masses of troops to be thrown suddenly on any point of the country that might be assailed. A still greater revolution was going on upon the sea; so that forts, he thought, would be soon rendered unnecessary, and the struggle must be maintained in the open sea. The great difficulty would be the want of men in our navy; and he thought it would be our policy always to have as many ships as could be manned. We ought to have a power to redress all wrongs, wherever given, promptly on the spot, in all parts of the world.

Mr. P. urged this subject further, with much earnestness, and declared the present state of our defences to be deplorably deficient, beyond the knowledge and the belief of most of the members of Congress.

Mr. CALHOUN said all these subjects must come up in their order at the next session, and he should therefore not enlarge upon them now. He thought our present system of fortifications had been so far extended as to make us cautious in our future expenditures, and he hoped that spirit would govern in our appropriations the present session. Our system of fortifications and other defences would of course require to be changed; there must be great changes both in the art and the armament of war, and the attention of Congress ought to be directed especially to the navy in both its branches—that propelled by steam as well as that by wind. This arm of our national defence should receive the most kindly attentions of Government, and could not be neglected with impunity.

The committee were now discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

RETROCESSION OF ALEXANDRIA AND GEORGETOWN.

Mr. WALKER submitted a resolution instructing the Committee for the District of Columbia to inquire into the expediency of retroceding all those portions of the District of Columbia not within the limits of the city of Washington to the respective States to which they formerly belonged.

The resolution, by consent, was at once considered.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he would rather instruct the committee to bring in a bill at once authorizing the retrocession, with the consent of Alexandria and Georgetown, and the States respectively.

Mr. MERRICK said it would be recollected that Georgetown had formerly petitioned Congress to be restored to Maryland. Alexandria had not done so, but had recently expressed a unanimous wish to be restored to Virginia. Mr. M. was sure that Maryland would be glad to receive Georgetown. But he thought it altogether too late in the session to introduce a measure of this kind, which evidently could not be carried through. At the proper time Mr. M. would be glad to act upon it.

Mr. PRESTON argued that, even if the measure could not be consummated at this time, it was expedient to bring the subject under consideration, and he was therefore in favor of the resolution.

Mr. MERRICK said he was in favor of the retrocession, and he should not further object to a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said there were but two points to be ascertained in this matter; one, the consent of the people to be retroceded, and the other, the consent of the States to receive them. He thought, therefore, that a provisionary bill might readily be passed at this session, which would require no further action of Congress.

Mr. LUMPKIN, as a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia, concurred in granting a retrocession. But if a bill for that purpose was now to be framed, he proposed that it should be done by a select committee.

Mr. WALKER said that the Committee for the District were better acquainted with this subject than a select committee could be, and he wished the inquiry to be made by those best able to make it. He argued in favor of the retrocession, that it would lighten the duties, and shorten the sessions of Congress; and he believed it would be for the good of all the parties concerned.

Mr. MERRICK said he was anxious that the retrocession should take place, and if it should not be carried at this session, he should move upon it early in the next.

Mr. ALLEN spoke in favor of the bill, even if it should not now be passed, as it would more effectually call the attention of the parties to the subject, and of the people of the country.

The resolution was agreed to without dissent.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was resolved that the Senate on this day, and for the remainder of the session, take a recess from half past two to half past four o'clock.

BANKS OF THE DISTRICT.

The bill granting charters to the late banks of the District was taken up, and after various amendments had been adopted, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—ayes 20, noes 12.

The bill, as ordered to be engrossed, is in the following words:

AN ACT to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions, restrictions, and enactments of the act of Congress of the twenty-fifth of May, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, entitled "An act to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia," be, and the same are hereby, extended to the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, the Bank of Washington, the Patriotic Bank of Washington, the Bank of the Potomac, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria: Provided, That wherever, in the original act, the first of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight occurs, it shall be so construed as to mean the fourth of July, eighteen hundred and forty-one; and wherever the first of July, eighteen hundred and forty-two occurs, it shall be construed to mean the fourth of July, eighteen hundred and forty-four: Provided, further, That if the said banks, or any or either of them, shall, from and after the passage of this act, proceed, continue, or commence to pay in specie, on demand, all their notes and other liabilities, except such deposites as may have been heretofore made in funds not equivalent to specie, then the said banks, or such of them as shall so proceed, continue, or commence to pay specie, on demand, for all their notes and liabilities, except as aforesaid, and none other of the said banks, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges conferred by their late charters until the the fourth day of July, eighteen hundred and forty-one, unless Congress shall at any time otherwise direct: And provided further, That if any of the said banks shall fail to resume specie payments, and to continue the same at the time of the passage of this act, and such bank may, in case it shall so resume at any time within the period of sixty days from and after its passage, avail itself of all the privileges, from and after the time of such resumption, which are granted by the act to those which resume immediately; but no banking privileges shall be exercised by any institution in a state of suspension of specie payments; but if such bank or banks shall, at any time after the passage of this act, suspend specie payments, or refuse to pay any of their notes or obligations in specie, then such neglect, failure, suspension, or refusal, shall operate as a forfeiture of their respective charters, except for the purpose of winding up their affairs, under the provisions and restrictions contained in this act: And provided further, That in all cases where the the said, or either of them, shall hereafter refuse payment of any of their notes or obligations, there shall be a summary remedy therefor before any justice or judge having jurisdiction of the case on five days' notice, wherein there shall be supersedeas, stay of execution, injunction, or certiorari allowed, nor any appeal, except upon affidavit of merits by the president, cashier, or directors.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That neither of the said banks shall, from and after the passage of this act, issue or pay out other than for those existing deposites of the description mentioned in, and excepted by, the first section of this act, any bill, note, post-note, or other paper intended to circulate as money issued by any other bank, banker, banking association, incorporation, institution, or individual, unless such bill, note, post-note, or other paper, or promise to pay, is payable and paid in specie, on demand, at some fixed and certain place to be distinctly and plainly named upon the face of the paper.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That each and every stockholder in such bank shall, from and after the taking effect of this act, also be, and they are hereby made, severally liable in their individual capacity, each to the full amount of his stock in such bank, for all the debts and obligations thereafter contracted by or on behalf of such bank, and which may have been contracted during the time he was such stockholder, and such liability shall continue after he may have ceased to be such stockholder: Provided, Such bank shall refuse to pay on demand.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That within ten days after the taking effect of this act, and semi-annually thereafter, the said banks shall, each for itself, make out and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, and likewise publish in one of the newspapers printed and of general circulation in the District of Columbia, a complete list of the names and places of residence of all the officers and directors of, and stockholders in, such bank for the time being, with the full amount of stock then held in said bank by each of such officers, directors, and stockholders, affixed to his or her name, respectively.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no dividend shall be made among the stockholders of any of those banks, while they are in a state of suspension; and the president and directors of said banks, respectively, shall be individually responsible in the event of any deficiency of the assets of either of said banks, in addition to the capital paid in, for all the liabilities which their several institutions may contract, from and after the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be printed,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 14, 1840.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa asked leave to offer a resolution, setting apart to-morrow (Wednesday) for the consideration of Territorial business—to take precedence of all other. Mr. C. said that, from present appearances, it was not unlikely that the general appropriation bills would be debated till the end of the session, or so near it as to preclude the idea of any business which should be transacted by the House after the disposition of those bills being acted upon by the Senate. He hoped, therefore, that the introduction of the resolution would not meet with objection. It was known to every gentleman that, if even the appropriation bills were postponed to the last day, they must and would pass. He thought that out of a session of two hundred and thirty-three days, at least one day might be devoted to the transaction of Territorial business.

To keep Delegates here during the whole of a long session, engaged in the laborious business of preparing measures for the action of the House, and then deny them a few hours for their final action, would be without example in the history of our legislation. Many measures for this Territory had been prepared, at an expense of much time and labor, which would be a total loss to his constituents, if this House should refuse or neglect to act upon them.

After repeated efforts by the Committee on the Territories to get a day for the consideration of Territorial business, he had determined to move in the matter himself, and so far succeeded as to get the day after the disposition of the appropriation bills. But, from recent developments, he greatly feared that the last moment of the session would be used in debating those bills. What is the state of the calendar? Why, the first four bills, he believed, were yet upon it, not reached in their regular order. That being the fact, and judging by the past, we could reasonably hope for but little during the few remaining days of this protracted session. Whatever may have been the cause, or shall be rendered as an excuse for the great moral conflict which we had witnessed during the present Congress, of neither of which it was his purpose to speak, it appeared to him that the effect upon the public business was of a character revolutionary, and wanted nothing but the forms of war to entitle it to be recorded as one of its greatest evils.

Should the resolution fail, he would still not despair of seeing gentlemen pause in the midst of their career, and suffer the business of the country to be transacted. If, however, in this his just expectations should be disappointed, he would be conscious of having discharged his duty, of which it would be his pleasure to render such an account to his constituents as truth should justify.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected until the appropriation bills were disposed of.

Mr. C. then moved a suspension of the rule, and asked the yeas and nays, which were refused.

And the question being taken, the House refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of offering the following preamble and resolutions; which were read for information:

Whereas the public buildings in the City of Washington have been erected at great expense to Government, and are of great value, especially as the depositories of the public records; and whereas, by a late act of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue," the Treasury building in the city of Washington and the custom-houses at the various points where the revenue is collected have been made the depositories of the public money; and whereas the said buildings and their contents are liable to be destroyed by fire or otherwise, as experience has proved in the recent instances of the destruction of the Treasury Building, the Patent Office, and the General Post Office: therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to authorize and require the heads of the several Departments to have the said public buildings, occupied by them respectively, together with the archives, records, books, and vouchers contained in the same, as far as the value thereof can be estimated in money, insured against destruction by fire or otherwise, to the full amount of their value; provided the same can be done.

Resolved, That if the said committee should deem it expedient to report a bill for such purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required to have the custom-houses in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, together with their contents, including books, records, and vouchers, as far as the value thereof can be estimated in money, insured to the full amount of their value, provided the same can be done; and that the insurance on the said public buildings and custom-houses be effected on or before the first day of November, 1840.

And, the question having been taken, the House refused to suspend the rule.

Mr. HOFFMAN, by leave, presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, and memorial of the Board of Trade of New York, against the passage of the bill now pending before Congress to insure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports; which memorials were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

THE CASE OF LIEUTENANT HOOE.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was read for information as follows:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee, having charge of the case of Lieut. Hooe, do forthwith report a bill to this House, prohibiting the enlistment of negroes or colored persons in the service of the navy or army of the United States.

Mr. STANLY was understood to say that the committee had not time to give the subject investigation, that it was physically impossible to make a report, and therefore objected.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama moved a suspension of the rules, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. BOTTS moved a call of the House.

Mr. TALIAFERRO demanded the yeas and nays on that motion, which were ordered.

Mr. STANLY asked if it was in order now to move to be excused from voting, and to give his reasons.

The SPEAKER said it was in order to make the motion, and that it would admit of limited debate.

Mr. STANLY said he would keep within the limit, and that if he felt himself going beyond it, he would endeavor to stop.

He (Mr. S.) would vote against a call of the House, because it was physically impossible for the Committee on the Judiciary to take up this business and report on it this session; and also, because the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy had full power to remedy these abuses, if they pleased.

And the question on the motion for a call of the House being then taken, they were stood—yeas 29, nays 112.

So the call was not ordered.

And the question recurring on the motion to suspend the rule,

Mr. BRIGGS moved to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. RIVES asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. BRIGGS then withdrew the motion to lay on the table.

The question again recurred on the motion to suspend the rules, when

Mr. STANLY asked to be excused from voting, because the Judiciary Committee had not time, at this period of the session, to examine and prepare any law on any subject; because the President and Secretary of the Navy had already full power and authority to exclude negroes from the service—and to exclude them from giving testimony against white men, and to set aside the proceedings of courts martial if they saw any thing requiring their interference; and because he (Mr. S.) could not consent that the navy should be deprived of the services of negroes as cooks, stewards, and servants; for there is no necessity they should be witnesses; and because to enact such a law as the gentleman from Alabama proposes would, in effect, make white men negroes, by imposing on them the necessity of discharging duties heretofore discharged by negroes.

Mr. DROMGOOLE asked the yeas and nays on the question of excusing Mr. STANLY; which were ordered, and, being taken, were—yeas 18, nays 132, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Bond, Botts, Clark, Edwards, Hook, Cave Johnson, Lincoln, McCarty, Mallory, Parmenter, Simonton, Tillinghast, Underwood, Peter J. Wagner, Edward D. White, T. W. Williams, and Christopher H. Williams—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Barnard, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Blackwell, Boyd, Briggs, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, S. H. Butler, Calhoun, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Chinn, Clifford, Connor, J. Cooper, M. A. Cooper, Craig, Cranston, Cross, Curtis, Cushing, Dana, Edward Davies, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dennis, Dellet, Doan, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Evans, Everett, Fisher, Fletcher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Graham, Granger, Green, Griffin, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hoffman, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, James, Jameson, N. Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Kille, Leet, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Monroe, Montanya, Morgan, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Nisbet, Ogle, Parrish, Paynter, Petrikin, Pope, Prentiss, Proffit, Ramsey, Randien, Rayner, Reynolds, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, James Rogers, Russell, Ryall, Samuels, Shepard, Thomas Smith, Steenrod, Strong, Stuart, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taliaferro, Taylor, F. Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, W. Thompson, Jacob Thompson, Toland, Turney, Vanderpoel, Vroom, Warren, Watterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Lewis Williams, J. L. Williams, and Worthington—132.

So Mr. STANLY was not excused.

Mr. S. then said he hoped his reasons might be entered on the Journal. He should vote, he said, against the suspension, and he hoped that no Southern man would vote for such a proposition.

Mr. DROMGOOLE said the rules prescribed that a member should give a brief verbal statement, and it would be a violation of the rule for gentlemen to be permitted to enter their reasons at large on the journal. He protested against it.

Mr. BOTTS asked to be excused from voting on the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama, and assigned as reasons therefor—

1st. That a bill to prevent the enlistment of negroes in the navy of the United States did not remedy the evil complained of, nor had it any reference to the question of the admissibility of negroes as witnesses upon the trial of officers of the navy; and

2d. He had objected in the first instance to the reference of this subject to the Judiciary Committee, and did not now desire a report from them upon this question—he wished it to go to a select committee; and gentlemen would perceive his reason for that objection to be well founded, when he communicated the fact that every member of the committee either belonged to the Administration party or was the Representative of a free State. What could be expected from them? He wanted no report from a committee thus constituted that would operate as a white-washing report. The conduct of the President could not be extenuated or excused; and he wanted the South fairly represented by any committee to whom the subject might be given in charge.

After assigning these reasons, Mr. B. withdrew his proposition to be excused, as he only wanted to place his reasons before the House for thus resisting the efforts that had been made to procure a report.

Mr. STANLY rose, and interrupted Mr. B. and stated that he was a member of the Judiciary Committee; and was understood to say that the interests of the South were safe in the hands of that committee.

Mr. PROFFIT asked to be excused from voting, and gave as a reason, that the resolution, for the introduction of which a motion is made to suspend the rule, was, in his opinion, an evasion, a palpable and shuffling evasion, of the true question at issue between the people of the United States and the President, on the fact of the President of the United States having, in his official capacity, sanctioned and approved of the admission of the testimony of negroes in the trial of Lieut. Hooe, of the United States Navy. Mr. P. said he was opposed, unqualifiedly opposed, to the admission of the testimony of colored persons against white men. He approved fully of the laws of the State of Indiana, which provided that no negro, or mulatto, or Indian, or even the quarter blood, should be admitted as evidence against white persons. He considered the conduct of the President in the case of Lieut. Hooe as an insult not to be pardoned by any Southern man, and a direct attack upon the institutions of the South. He considered the resolution requiring the committee to report a bill to prevent the enlistment of colored people into the service of the army and navy of the United States as evasive of the question of evidence, and only calculated to place white men in the situations now occupied by colored persons as cooks, stewards, servants, &c. Mr. P. said that the President of the United States had disgraced——[here some person called to order.] Mr. P. said he would not transgress the rule, but he wished that an opportunity would occur in which he could express his detestation of the President's approval of the proceedings of the trial alluded to.

And the question being taken, the House refused to excuse Mr. PROFFIT.

And the motion to lay on the table the motion to suspend the rule having been withdrawn, the question recurred, and was taken, on the motion to suspend the rule; and was decided in the negative—yeas 107, nays 73, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a suspension of the rule for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to resume the consideration of the Army Appropriation bill.

Mr. MONROE appealed to Mr. B. to waive the motion for a moment, to enable him to offer a resolution.

Mr. PROFFIT made a similar request for another purpose.

Mr. BRIGGS declined.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The rule having been suspended, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. EVANS of Maine in the chair) on the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1840; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. JONES to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of three hundred thousand dollars for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Mr. KEMBLE said that he did not rise at this late period of the session to discuss the merits of the bill, but to disavow a statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. W. THOMPSON] on Saturday last, when discussing the bill to raise 1500 men for the Florida war, as derogatory to the committee of which he [Mr. K.] had the honor to be a member, and injurious to the character of the Secretary of War. The chairman stated in substance that the Secretary of War had written a letter to the committee asking for 1000 men, while he had indirectly applied through the members for 1500. This was certainly incorrect, so far as it regarded himself, and so palpably so, that his honorable friend and colleague from New York, also a member of the committee, too little versed in the party politics of the House, and too honorable to subject any man to unjust asucation, had disavowed it at the time, which he should himself have done could he have got the floor.

Mr. W. THOMPSON said that he repeated to the fullest extent what he had said on Saturday, and was in every way responsible for it. The Secretary of War had made a communication to the committee, (not in the regular way, through the House to the committee,) asking for an additional regular force of a thousand men, when he believed fifteen hundred men would be more desirable, and that this opinion of the Secretary was communicated to the committee by the member to whom he had expressed himself. This is what I said, and I should like to hear it denied.

Mr. MONROE said that he believed he could explain the matter in such a way that it would be satisfactory to both the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from South Carolina.

A proposition from the Secretary of War was under consideration by the Military Committee, proposing to raise a force of a thousand men for the war in Florida, to be armed and equipped in a certain way, provided for in the bill before the House. He thought that the proposition came from himself to increase the number to sixteen hundred, as he did not believe that one thousand would be sufficient, and thus make four battalions instead of three.

He (Mr. M) saw the Secretary, and mentioned it to him; that officer concurred in the opinion that an increase of this corps would be advisable, but he did not ask for them, as he believed that Congress would not willingly grant an increased number, and feared that the number already asked for would be refused.

Mr THOMPSON said: Therefore I stand justified to the fullest extent as to what I did say. If the purpose of the gentleman [Mr. KEMBLE] was to prove that he was not the member alluded to, he has succeeded; if to exculpate the Secretary of War from the charge of not asking as large a force as he deemed expedient, he has failed.

Mr. KEMBLE stated that, as a member of the Military Committee, he had concurred in the increase proposed, not from any intimation on the part of the Secretary, but because he believed it to be far more economical to employ regular troops than mounted militia—the only description of force to which the Department could recur—the first cost of which, besides the waste, was, by the reports to this House of the last session, at least six for one, besides the loss of horses and waste of military stores, and the embarrassment caused in the movements of the army.

The dread of the Florida war was so great that recruits could not be found to fill the ranks of the army. This bill proposed certain bounties on enlistments for the war, but further than that no additional expense would be incurred, inasmuch as the officers would be temporarily drawn from the army.

Mr. K. would take advantage of the occasion to answer an inquiry of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts—whether, if this bill passed, any further appropriation than what was asked for by the Committee of Ways and Means would be required to carry it into effect? He understood that such was not the intention of the Government; but should the bill not pass, a further appropriation would probably be required to meet the additional cost of a volunteer force of mounted militia.

Mr. K. would say a few words in relation to the armed occupation bill, which it had been his duty to report from the committee—that this bill was no novelty in the history of the country; that it was based on principles sanctioned throughout our whole history, and more particularly adopted in the settlement of Kentucky and Tennessee; with this difference, that we should supply the settlers with provisions and ammunition for a certain specified time, but incurring no other expense; and if by these means we could render the settlers as efficient in occupying the country, and thus wresting it from the Indians, as troops could do, it did appear to him, that the plan recommended itself by its economy as well as its efficacy.

Mr. McKAY alluded to the charge, made on yesterday against some of the Government officers in Florida, and contended that such a mode of attack was extremely unfair, as there was no opportunity for the persons accused to explain, or vindicate themselves in any manner whatever.

He contended that the Administration party in the House had in no instance refused to vote for a proper investigation into alleged abuses, when resolutions for the purpose were worded in a proper way. But sometimes such resolutions were so worded, that they could not be voted for by the friends of the Administration. For instance, there was the resolution recently offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOTTS,] in relation to the case of Lieutenant Hooe. Instead of that being a simple call for information, a long preamble was affixed to it, in relation to "Northern men with Southern principles," and much more such matters, so that, with such a preamble, no friend of the Administration could vote for the resolution, without censuring himself, and the party to which he belonged. If gentlemen would simply call for information without any such objectionable appendages, they would never have cause to complain of a want of co-operation on his part.

Mr. McK. then, at some length, took a review of all the circumstances connected with the increase of the army, and showed from documentary evidence, that propositions for the increase of the army, instead of coming from the Administration party, had been made by the Opposition themselves.

The remarks of Mr. McKAY will be given in full hereafter.

Mr. ADAMS inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. JONES] whether the sum of three hundred thousand dollars intended to be appropriated by this amendment was intended to apply to a bill (not yet before the House) authorizing the President to raise sixteen hundred men in addition to the present existing standing army?

Mr. JONES of Virginia could scarcely be heard in reply; but he was understood to say that there was a communication on this subject from the Secretary of War, which would give the information desired by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The communication was in the committee room, and could be sent for in few minutes.

Mr. ADAMS wished, he said, to have that question settled before deciding whether he could vote for this appropriation or not. The bill which authorized the President to raise sixteen hundred men contained no appropriation.

Mr. JONES could not see, he said, how an appropriation could be made in this bill for a force not yet raised, and to authorize the raising of which there was, as yet, no law in existence.

Mr. ADAMS said he then understood the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means as stating that he did not understand that this sum of $300,000 was to be applicable to the law providing for an additional force of 1,600 men; that was to say, that if that law should pass, (containing, as Mr. A. had stated, no appropriation,) it must be provided either by the bill now before the committee, or there must be another appropriation made.

Mr. JONES understood this to be an appropriation of $300,000 to carry out existing laws of the land; and that whether the additional force contemplated in another bill were raised or not, this sum would be required for the particular service to which it was designed to be applied.

Mr. A. referred to, and read passages from the act of July, 1836, etc.

[Here the document above alluded to, from the Quartermaster's Department, in relation to the estimate required for services in Florida, was read.]

Mr. ADAMS was not yet satisfied, he said, that this sum of of $300,000 might not be expended in part by the President for this new corps. He did not, however, say that such was the design; but, in the uncertain shape in which the matter now stood, he should feel compelled to vote against it. This he would not do, if he could consider the appropriation as confined to expenditures which had been incured. The bill to raise the additional force he regarded as an act for the continuation of the Florida war; and if he had not entertained that opinion before, he should certainly have formed it after listening to the remarks made yesterday by the Delegate from Florida, [Mr. DOWNING.] He (Mr. A.) was not for carrying on that war; he was for bringing it to an end: and he believed the President had it in his power, with one quarter part of this appropriation, to close the war to-morrow, and the President had possessed that power every day and year since the war had first broken out.

Mr. A. then proceeded to speak of the two reports which had been made by the majority and minority of the Committee on the Militia; the latter, he said, he had read with pleasure, but not so the former. And he would proceed to give his reasons.

The CHAIRMAN having here announced the hour of half-past two,

The House took a recess until 4 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess

The consideration of the Army appropriation bill, was resumed in Committee of the Whole, the question being on the amendment appropriating $300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Mr. ADAMS continued his remarks in favor of closing the war forthwith, which he contended the President could do if he chose, with one quarter of the appropriation asked for. He went at much length into an examination of all the circumstances attending the prosecution of the war, and concluded by urging the adoption of mild instead of forcible and vindictive measures.

Mr. BOTTS then took the floor, and moved that the committee rise.

On this motion tellers were ordered, when no quorum voting, the committee rose, and that fact was reported to the House.

Mr. WISE moved to adjourn, which motion was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays as follows—yeas 37, nays 105.

A quorum now appearing, the House went again into committee, and Mr. BOTTS commenced his remarks. He had not proceeded more than five minutes, when it being obvious that a quorum was not present,

Mr. TALIAFERRO moved that the committee rise, which motion prevailed.

Mr. STANLY moved to adjourn, which motion was negatived—yeas 31, nays 52.

Mr. DANA moved a call of the House; which motion was also negatived—yeas 44, nays 46.

The motion to adjourn was then renewed, and rejected as follows: yeas 39, nays 63.

Mr. DANA renewed his motion for a call of the House, and the yeas and nays being ordered, were, yeas 70, nays 39.

So the call was ordered.

Mr. WISE moved to adjourn, and the yeas and nays being ordered were, yeas 40, nays 75. So the House refused to adjourn.

The CLERK then called the roll, after which 124 members answered to their names.

A quorum now being present, all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

The House then went again into committee, and Mr. BOTTS resumed and continued his remarks until half past ten.

The committee then rose for want of a quorum.

Mr. WISE moved to adjourn; but the motion was negatived: yeas 24, nays 62.

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi moved a call of the House, which was ordered.

Mr. MONROE moved to adjourn, which motion was negatived by tellers, as follows—ayes 30, noes 62.

The roll was then called, when 103 members anawered to their names.

The doors were then closed, and excuses received for the absentees, until

On motion of Mr. WISE,

At half past eleven o'clock, the House adjourned—yeas 42, nays 40.

IN SENATE,

WEDNESDAY, July 15, 1840.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Wilfred Knott, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. WILLIAMS, was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to Congress, as early as may be at the next session, a list or the officers of the navy of the United States, denoting the periods of their admission into the public service, the dates of their present commissions, and the time of their actual service at sea, and at yards, stations, and hospitals, in separate columns, since January 1, 1824.

PENSION BILLS.

The following bills from the House, to wit: Acts for the relief of John England, Catharine Allen, Phebe Dickinson, John Keeler, Elizabeth French, John H. Genther, William A. Cudneback, Sarah Oakley, Reuben Murray, Jacob Adams, Joseph Bailey, John Latham, James Phelps, Conrad Widtig, Elizabeth Case, administrator and heirs of John Lindsey, administrator of Lamech Blanden, heirs of Michael Seitsinger, Ann Bloomfield, Benjamin Mitchell, James Deatly, David Mellon, Mary Hunter, Mathew Wiley, James J. Coffin, George Morriss, Peter Headrick, Job Wood, Fielding Pratt, Samuel B. Hugo, Levi Johnston, Neil Shannon, Martha Strong, Asenath Campbell, Thomas Wilson, William Poole, Myron Chapin, Joseph W. Knipe, Simon Knight, Robert Lucas, Wilfred Knott, John Davis, Samuel M. Asbury, James Bailey, William Sloan, Levy M. Roberts, Thomas Collins, Hiram Sauls, John H. Lincoln, Nathaniel Davis, Barton Hooper, Isaac Justice, Samuel Brown, Lieutenant John Allison, Jabez Collins, Hugh Davis, Elijah Foochee, Thruston Cornell, James Smith, Robert Whittel, Lyman N. Cook, Benjamin McCulloch, John Lybrook, Christian Brougher, John Piper, James Cummings, William Butterfield, John Brown, David Wilson, Isaac Austen, Elijah Blodget, Stephen Appleby, Isaac Boyd, William Glover, Nathan Baldwin, James Boylan, William Neil, Charles Risley, George Hommill, Helen Miller, Robert Frazier, James Fleming, which were severally reported by the Committee on Pensions unfavorably, were taken up, and their further consideration indefinitely postponed.

The bill for the relief of Josiah Strong, was laid on the table.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez was ordered to be engrossed.

The bills for the relief of the following persons were taken up as in committee of the whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, to wit: for the relief of William Rand, Jacob Beeker, Mary Snow, Mary Prettyman, Elizabeth Davidson, Margaret Jamison, Erastus Pierson, heirs of Leonard Smith, Philip Hartman, James Francher, William Andrews, Chauncey Rice, Seneca Rider, Sylvester Tiffany, Israel Parsons, Medad Cook, Peter W. Short, Ichabod Beardsley, Peter A. Myers, Daniel W. Going, William Bowan, Gideon Sheldon, Jared Winslow, Lyman Bristol, and Thomas Bennett, were considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The above bills were subsequently read a third time, and finally passed.

On motion by Mr. HUBBARD, the bill for the relief of Joseph M. Hernandez was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to incorporate the late banks of the District of Columbia was taken up on its third reading, and after some remarks from Mr. MERRICK, in opposition to the bill, and Mr. CLAY of Alabama in favor of it, it was lost—ayes 16, noes 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, King, Nicholas, Roane, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clayton, Dixon, Henderson, Hubbard, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Pierce, Porter, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tappan, and Wall—20.

Mr. PRESTON then moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was negatived, and the motion to reconsider was advocated by Messrs. GRUNDY, WRIGHT, CLAY of Alabama, and ANDERSON, and opposed by Messrs. MERRICK, SMITH of Indiana, PHELPS, and DIXON.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he wished to make some remarks on this question, but as there was important Executive business, he would, with the consent of the Senate, move to postpone the further consideration of the subject till tomorrow.

The Senate then went into Executive session,

And afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

WEDNESDAY, July 15, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. STANLY, pursuant to notice, moved to amend the same by inserting therein the reasons offered by him on yesterday morning, for asking leave to be excused from voting on the motion to suspend the rule for the purpose of receiving the resolution of Mr. CHAPMAN, in relation to the enlistment of colored persons in the army and navy.

After some debate of a colloquial character the, question was taken on the motion to amend, by yeas and nays, and negatived as follows—yeas 23, nays 120.

Mr. CHITTENDEN asked permission to make a report from a select committee, of which he was chairman; but it was objected to, and the House refused to suspend the rules for the purpose.

Mr. POPE asked the consent of the House to take up the bill regulating the mileage of members which had been returned from the Senate amended.

Objections having been made,

Mr. P. moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering said bill, and called for the yeas and nays, which were refused.

The question was then taken by count, and resulted—yeas 43, nays 114.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. J. W. JONES asked permission to lay before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the present condition of the finances, for the purpose of having it printed.

Mr. PROFFIT objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection; when

The communication was laid before the House, and, without being read, was ordered to be printed. To which communication the following statement, showing the condition of the Treasury, was appended, viz:

Statement of receipts and expenditures from January 1 to July 1, 1840, as ascertained and compiled.

RECEIPTS.

From customs - - -	$6,940,000
Lands - - - -	1'680,000
Miscellaneous - - -	40,000
	$8,660,000
[Those for the last quarter are taken from the running account, and for June mostly estimated.]
From the issue of new Treasury notes	1,836,009
Made available, and collected from indebted banks - - -	585,885
Aggregate -	$11,082,894

EXPENDITURES.

Excluding trust funds, the funded debt, post office, and redeeming Treasury notes	$10,036,364
Funded debt	8,233
Redemption of Treasury notes, including principal and interest, as carried on the books	2,964,710
Apparent aggregate	$13,009,307
Deduct amount of notes computed to be redeemed in 1839, but not carried on the books until 1840	460,000
Real aggregate as computed	$12,549,307

The difference between the actual receipts and and expenditures has been paid out of the available balance on hand at the beginning of the year.

SUMMARY STATEMENT.

Probable deficiency of receipts in duties in 1840, arising from continued suspension of specie payments and commercial embarrassments	$2,000,000
Probable deficiency of receipts arising from new judicial decisions on on the tariff	500,000
Probable deficiency in receipts from lands	750,000
Whole amount of deficiency	3,250,000
Add what is due from banks, being still contingent as to its payments, including principal and interest	2,900,000
Whole sum, in estimated receipts, considered doubtful	6,150,000
This may be met by the Treasury note bill to the extent of its means	5,000,000
Balance left	1,150,000
Add probable excess of expenditure out of old appropriations for Florida war, Indian treaties, &c.	1,750,000
Probable excess of new appropriations beyond annual estimates	1,500,000
Leaving to be provided for on all accounts	4,400,000
But if no excess of new appropriations is intended to be made, deduct	1,500,000
So, if the new appropriations shall be reduced below the estimates, to the extent of the balance, deduct	2,900,000

Leaving, in that event, no balance to be provided for.

The debts due from the banks being also equal to about the same amount, no new means furnished for that will probably be used, if the banks seasonably pay all which is due from them.

On motion of Mr. J. W. JONES the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union [Mr. EVANS of Maine in the chair] resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1840; the pending question being on the motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia to amend the bill by adding thereto an appropriation of 300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Mr. WISE then took the floor and spoke for three hours in a general review of the circumstances which, in his opinion, led to the commencement of the war in Florida. In the course of his remarks he replied to some portion of the speech of Mr. BUTLER of Kentucky, on Saturday last, in relation to the Swartwout Committee. Mr. W. also descanted at some length on the qualities of the blood hounds, which the people of Florida had procured from Cuba. In the course of his speech Mr. W. alluded to the purchase of negroes from the Indians in Florida, and in connection with that, referred to the permit given by President Jackson to General Call, in the application of the latter to trade for negroes.

Mr. W. THOMPSON rose only to do justice to a gallant and honorable man—Gov. Call. Although the gentleman from Virginia did not charge that gentleman with any thing wrong in relation to the permit which was granted by Gen. Jackson to purchase negroes from the Indians; yet such a construction might be put upon the gentleman's remarks. Gov. Call had no interest whatever in that transaction, nor any agency in it further than this: he happened to be in Washington, and on the application of two friends in Florida of as high character as any there or elsewhere, he obtained the permission for them to do what they had a right to do without such a permit.

Mr. T. further said, that the fact of claims for indemnity for fugitive slaves were not made before the fund for that purpose was disposed of, does not raise even a presumption that such claims were unjust, most of them being cases where the slaves have run away to the Indians since; and as to those of an anterior date, the country has been in all the confusion since of a state of war.

After Mr. WISE had concluded,

Mr. KEIM took the floor; and in the most pointed manner replied to the sarcasms of Mr. ADAMS on yesterday, in his attack and criticism on the report of the Committee on the Militia, some notice of which will be given hereafter.

The hour of half-past 2 o'clock having arrived, The House took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

The Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the army appropriation bill; the question pending being on the amendment appropriating $300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida.

Mr. KEIM being entitled to the floor, resumed his remarks in reply to the illnatured criticisms of Mr. ADAMS on the report of the Militia Committee in favor of the plan of the Secretary of War for a reorganization of the militia.

Mr. K. after defending the language of the report as strictly correct, proceeded to notice more particularly an objection of Mr. A. to a certain Latin phrase used in the report. He proved to the member that in objecting to the words, he had been attacking Cicero himself, for the phrase in the report was a literal quotation from that illustrious man. Mr. K. then favored the hypercritical gentleman with the chapter and line where the words were to be found; and having done so, said he would leave him and Cicero to settle the matter between themselves.

Mr. K. then proceeded to say that he did not set himself up as a rhetorician. He was content with using plain language, and did not care so that it could be understood by those by whom it was designed to be read. He had never wasted his days and nights in abstract studies. He had never attempted to trample on any one, nor would he suffer any one to trample on him with impunity. He had no objection to any attack, provided it was done on the principle of courtesy, and in accordance with those rules which characterize order. But when the attack assumed the appearance of malignity, he would repel it in the manner which it deserved. After some further remarks, Mr. K. in a very severe manner, proceeded to show that the language of the report was correct, by a reference to the work of Mr. ADAMS himself on rhetoric. (Mr. A. to all appearance, did not listen to this cutting reply with much patience, for he was constantly asking to explain, and kept jumping up and down like the key of a piano.)

Mr. K. was shorty afterwards called to order by the CHAIR, on the ground that a reply to literal criticism was not relevant to the subject before the committee.

Mr. K. submitted to the decision of the CHAIR, but thought it strange that the gentleman from Massachusetts had not been called to order when he was making the attack.

Mr. ADAMS then made some brief remarks, by way of rejoinder, in the course of which he gave Mr. K. full credit as a gentleman of high literary standing, and was glad that the affluence which the gentleman enjoyed was so liberally devoted to the patronage of the fine arts.

Mr. TRIPLETT then took the floor, and made some general observations in relation to the plan of the Secretary of War for a reorganization of the militia.

No other member rising to speak, the question was then taken on the amendment appropriating $300,000 for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida, and was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER of Tennessee moved to amend by inserting an appropriation of $10,000 for the construction of a brass bomb howitzer, or the principle of the invention of J. W. Cochran, under the direc-direction of the Secretary of War.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. A. McCLELLAN moved to amend by inserting the following: "For indemnifying John L. Cline for the amount of a judgment recovered against him for acts performed in the execution of his official duties, while in the service of the United States, $642 07.

Mr. McCLELLAN observed, that the reason this claim had been delayed so long was, that a promise had been made by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, to report a bill for the satisfaction thereof. As that gentleman had omitted it, he (Mr. McC.) conceived it his duty to offer it as an amendment to the present bill. He then gave a detailed statement of the circumstances of the case, and trusted there would be no objection to its reception.

The CHAIR, however, ruled the amendment as out of order.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the committee then rose and reported the bill to the House with two amendments.

Mr. RAMSEY then rose, and said, that however anxious he would otherwise have been to speak on this bill, the advanced period of the session admonished him that there was no more time for debate. He therefore moved the previous question.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, put, and carried, and the main question ordered to be now taken.

Mr. MASON of Ohio asked that the question might be taken separately on each amendment; which was ordered.

And the first amendment—to wit, that which appropriates the sum of $19,765 for repairs of arsenals damaged by storm and fire—was concurred in.

And the question then being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in the amendment appropriating 300,000 dollars for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida—

Mr. MASON of Ohio asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and beng taken, were—yeas 123, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alford, Hugh J. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Baker, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Briggs, Albert G Brown, Burke, Bynum, Calhoun, William B. Campbell, Carr, Carroll, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Clifford, Connor, Mark A. Cooper, William R. Cooper, Cross, Cushing, Dana, John Davis, John W. Davis, Dawson, Dellet, Doan, Dromgoole, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Evans, Fine, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, James Garland, Rice Garland, Goggin, Hand, John Hastings, Hawes, Hill of Virginia, Hillen, Hook, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. So the amendment was concurred in.

And the question then recurring on ordering the bill (as amended) to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. LINCOLN said that, having voted against the amendment, and being disposed to vote for the bill notwithstanding he had done so, he would ask the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and, being taken, were yeas 150, nays 0.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, JULY 21, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 34.

BY BLAIR & RIVES. ——WEEKLY—— PRICE $1 PER SESSION.

So, having been ordered to a third reading,

The bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia, the rules were suspended, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DROMGOOLE in the chair.)

Mr. EVANS moved that the committee proceed to the consideration of the bill to provide for the expenses of making an exploration and survey of the Nort eastern boundary.

[Mr. E. under leave, said the bill would not occupy five minutes.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved that the committee proceed to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indean Department, and for carrying into effect the treaty stipulations with certain Indian tribes.

The question was first taken on the motion of Mr. EVANS, and, by ayes 72, noes 73, it was rejected.

The committee then took up the bill commonly known as the Indian Appropriation bill; which was read by sections.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and means [Mr. JONES] introduced a number of incidental amendments from that committee; which were agreed to without debate.

Mr. CUSHING moved an amendment appropriating $5,000 for the purpose of holding treaties with the Lake and other Northwestern tribes of Indians to procure the cessation of subsidies annually paid to said Indians.

After some remarks from Messrs. CUSHING and VANDERPOEL,

Mr. JONES of Virginia raised the question that the proposition was not in order—not being to carry out any existing treaty or law.

The point of order was not pressed; and, the question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WICK offered an amendment (based, he said, on an estimate furnished individually to him by the War Department) appropriating $3,000 to pay the expense of holding a council with the Miami tribe of Indians, with a view to the extinction of the great Miami Reservation in Indiana—the amount to be expended or not according to the discretion of the President.

Some remarks were made by Messrs. WICK, PROFFIT, RARIDEN, and others, when the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES also moved an amendment, to come in at the end of the bill, appropriating $45,000 to defray the expenses of removing the Winnebago Indians from Wiskonsin over the Mississippi, and for the erection of a gristmill, &c.

This amendment was debated by Messrs. JONES, EVANS, and BELL, the latter of whom, at 8 o'clock, not being willing to address the few members who had not left the hall, moved that the committee rise; which motion prevailed, and the committee rose.

Mr. CAMPBELL, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, asked leave to present the report of the committee on the New Jersey contested election case, with a view of having it printed.

Messrs. PROFFIT, STANLY, BELL, WISE, and others, objected; and after several ineffectual attempts by Mr. CAMPBELL to explain that the reception of the report would not occupy more than two minutes, he moved to suspend the rules.

Mr. WISE moved to adjourn; which motion was negatived—yeas 38, nays 61.

After an ineffectual motion for a call of the House,

Mr. WISE appealed to the chairman of the Committee of Elections as to the propriety of postponing the presentation of the report until to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL replied that he could not consent; and at the same time expressed his surprise at the opposition to the reception of the report, as in one-twentieth part of the time wasted on motions to adjourn, etc. it might have been received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS then renewed the motion to adjourn; and it was negatived.

Mr. STANLY moved a call of the House, which was not ordered.

The motion to adjourn was then renewed, but without success.

Mr. WISE said, as the House persisted in its refusal to adjourn, he would renew the motion for a call of the House. It was evident that Miss Fanny Elssler was far more popular with the majority than the business of the country; and if the call were ordered, he would suggest that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to go to the theatre, where, no doubt, the delinquents would be found.

The question on ordering the call was then taken by tellers, and resulted—ayes 40, noes 46.

So the call was not ordered.

Several members then simultaneously moved an adjournment, which motion prevailed; and at 9 o'clock,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,
THURSDAY, July 16, 1840.

Mr. NICHOLAS presented resolutions of the council of the third municipality of the city of New Orleans, against the extension of the limits of the port of New Orleans, which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. LINN, the Committee on Private Land Claims,

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, the Committee on Commerce,

On motion by Mr. LUMPKIN, the Committee on Manufactures,

On motion by Mr. PIERCE, the Committee on Military Affairs, and

On motion by Mr. BUCHANAN; the Committee on Foreign Relations, were severally discharged from the further consideration of the various subjects heretofore referred to and not acted on by said committees.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred, on the 24th December last, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the the daily employment of the persons connected with the collection of the customs, reported the letter of the Secretary, and an abstract of the amount of tonnage entered in each district, with a request that they might be printed; which was ordered.

[The report was made in compliance with the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. DAVIS, and passed by the Senate April 19, 1838:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to cause, for the term of one year, each officer employed in the collection of the customs, to keep a daily account in writing of the time he is actually employed in the public service, each and every day, and what his employment each day is, stating the same so much in detail as to exhibit a clear and intelligible account of all his services from day to day.

Resolved, That such memoranda as is made by each and every officer shall be quarterly sworn to, as a full, just, and complete account of the services actually rendered, and the time actually spent by him in public employment.

Resolved, That the memoranda of each district be embodied together for the use of Congress, and that the Secretary add to it the amount of tonnage entered, cleared, or owned in such district, with the amount of revenue collected therein, and the expense of collecting the same, showing what each officer receives for all such services.

Resolved, That where any officer discharges, or claims to discharge, the duty of more than one office, his services in each shall be distinguished as well as his compensation.

In regard to the report, the Secretary says: "It comprises at least twenty thousand pages foolscap written matter. Is is estimated they would fill 16,000 octave pages, or 20 volumes of 500 pages each, printed. In manuscript they will fill six boxes, containing on an average six to eight cubic feet each."

The resolution to print the report of the geological and mineralogical survey of the mineral region of Iowa and Wiskonsin was taken up, and

Mr. TAPPAN spoke in favor of the printing.

Mr. DAVIS said that, although he had not examined the subject thoroughly, he had looked at it enough to know that the printing would be a pretty heavy job. The report itself was voluminous, and lithographing the drawings would be very nearly, if not quite, as expensive as engraving. The whole expense, Mr. D. had been told, would probably be $15,000 or $20,000. And within the last two days there had been a proposition to supply the Treasury with $4,000,000, in addition to Treasury notes already granted. Under all these circumstances, he hoped the Senator from Missouri would consent that this should lie over till the next session, especially as many more important objects must so lie, from the state of the Treasury.

Mr. LINN admitted that there was much force in the statements of the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] but the estimate he made of the sum of money necessary to have this work published, was certainly much too high. Instead of its costing fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, he did not think it would require as many hundreds. But even if it did, and much more, it would be the cause of bringing into the Treasury hundreds of thousands of dollars, from the knowledge it would give to the world of the great mineral wealth of these public lands, and the consequent enhancement of their value. Mr. L. said that he had an opportunity of conversing often with gentlemen engaged in mining operations, both in this country and in Europe, who said, with great emphasis, "prove to us that the geological structure and mineralogical affinities of your mineral country are the same, or similar to the great lead region of England, and we will have the greatest confidence in its resources, and without fear invest capital in your mines." It is a little remarkable that Mr. Owen's report proves conclusively this resemblance; and with permission of the Senate, he read the outlines of the report, as given by Mr. Owen himself.

1. An inspection of the chapter on the "geological character" and on the "lead mines" of the svrveyed district, will show its close resemblance, both in the character of its rocks and in its geological position, to the celebrated mining district of the north of England, the most productive lead region in the known world.

2. The chapter on the "Statistics of the lead mines" affords proof that even under the numerous disadvantages to which this American lead region has hitherto been subjected, it probably produces, at this moment, nearly as much lead as the whole of Europe, with the exception of Great Britain alone; and that it has indisputable capabilities of producing as much lead as all Europe, Great Britain included.

3. The chapter on copper ore, and the appended analysis, prove that the copper ore of Wiskonsin is richer and more valuable than the copper ore of Cornwall, the greatest copper district in Europe or the world; exceeding that ore in its yield, by from one fifteenth to one-third; and that this ore is found in abundance and can be raised with the same expense as lead one.

4. That zinc is also abundant, and the zinc ores of excellent quality.

Thus, that the materials for the manufacture of brass exist in profusion over the district.

5. That iron ore, equal in quality to the Tennessee ores, is found throughout the district in such quantity that iron works to any desirable extent might profitably be established there.

And, upon the whole, that the district surveyed is one of the richest mineral regions (compared to its extent) yet known in the world.

The chapter on soils also shows that, unlike most other mineral regions, it is fertile, and capable of yielding to the farmer a liberal reward for his labor.

This report of Mr. Owen, was made in pursuance to a resolution of the House of Representatives passed on the 6th of February of the last session, and is in the following words:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared and presented to the next Congress at an early day, a plan for the disposal of the public mineral lands, having reference as well to the amount of revenue to be derived from them and their value as public property, as to the equitable claims of individuals upon them; and that he at the same time communicate to Congress all the information in possession of the Treasury Department relative to their location, value, productiveness and occupancy: and that he cause such further information to be collected, and surveys to be made, as may be necessary for these purposes.

In pursuing the wishes of the House, considerable expense had already been incurred, which would be lost unless this document was given to the world. Mr. Owen had pursued the subject with ardor, zeal, and with a critical and scientific eye. He with much care collected, arranged, and marked specimens of the various ores found on the public lands surveyed by him. So that a person desirous of commencing mining operations can call on the Commissioner of the Land Office and find the quarter section marked on the ores; this will greatly facilitate him in him in his researches, made with a view to a perminent location. The publication of this report will unfold one leaf of the vast volume of wealth the God of heaven had bestowed upon the magnificent valley of the Mississippi, and pay back to Europe a small portion of the great literary debt we owed that continent. It would be republished there, and sought for by the scientific inquiring and emigrating portion of the community. He said he was aware of the embarrassed state of the Treasury, and was admonished by it of the necessity of economy in the public expenditures.

But the printing this document, he believed most sincerely, would have the effect of replenishing, instead of exhausting it. He hoped, therefore, the Senate would order its publication, and give the superintendence of it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as he was very desirous to have it made public for the benefit of the country and national domain.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he had great confidence in the views and opinions of the Senator from Missouri. But there appeared to be no certainty of the extent of the expenditure. One Senator set it down at $15,000 or $20,000; another at so many hundreds; and a third at not more than considerable. Under these circumstances, and considering that the Government was compelled to resort to paper money of its own, Mr. H. expressed the hope that the resolution would lie over till the next session.

Mr. ALLEN spoke in favor of now adopting the resolution, and insisted that the wants of the Treasury was a strong argument in favor of it, for it would bring money into the Treasury.

Mr. LINN read the resolution of the House of Representatives, by which this survey was ordered. The Commissioner of the Land Office, he said, was often called on for this kind of information, and it was important that he should be able to present it in a ready and convenient form.

Mr. WALKER said he had examined the document with some care, and he had risen from its perusal with feelings of pride, astonishment, and delight. No document could be more useful, and it would be published and republished throughout Europe. It was due to the West that it should be published.

Mr. DAVIS again urged that the delay till the next session would be short, and that, considering the state of the Treasury, it ought to lie over. He moved its postponement till the next session.

Mr. CALHOUN also spoke in favor of postponing it, and of rigid economy in every department.

Mr. KNIGHT said: Having had some experience in the examination of the cost of engraving maps and drawings, I have come to a different conclusion as to the amount of the cost of engraving than that expressed by the Senator from Missouri. I am of the opinion that it will cost nearly as many thousand dollars as the Senator supposes it will cost hundreds. But if it is to be printed, we should leave it with the Secretary of the Senate to make a contract for the engraving on such terms as he shall deem best. By so doing we shall save a large sum that otherwise will be expended.

I should like to have a greater number of copies printed for the use of the Senate than the resolution proposes, so as four or five copies might be distributed to each Senator for the purpose of diffusing the information it contains more generally among the people. If the document contains the valuable information represented, we ought not to hide it under a bushel, but publish it for the use of our citizens. As to the want of money in the Treasury that has been suggested, I conceive it to be of little consideration. We can issue a few more Treasury notes, and print it now as well as at the next session.

Mr. LINN admitted that the privilege of printing had probably been abused, and he would aid in correcting it at the next session, by reducing the printing of memorials, reports, &c. many of which ought not to be printed. But he thought this work ought to be published.

Mr. DAVIS's motion to postpone the subject till the next session was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, Huntington, King, Lumpkin, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Prentiss, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Tallmadge, and White—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, and Wall—18.

Mr. DAVIS moved to amend the resolution by requiring that the work should be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate, (as usual,) and on the most favorable terms.

This amendment, after a few remarks from Messrs. TAPPAN, DAVIS, and LINN, was rejected as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Tallmadge, White—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Wright—24.

Mr. DAVIS now moved to lay the resolution on the table, and it was so ordered as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Roane, Ruggles, Tallmadge, White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Mouton, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall—17.

RETROCESSION OF GEORGETOWN AND ALEXANDRIA.

Mr. MERRICK, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill making provision for ascertaining the wishes and will of all the people of the District of Columbia, not within the limits of the city of Washington, in regard to their being retroceded to the States of Maryland and Virginia respectively: read, and ordered to a second reading.

BUSINESS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. LINN, by consent, introduced a joint resolution (and obtained its immediate consideration) providing that, after six days in the second session of any Congress, now and hereafter, the bills, &c. acted on and decided by either House, and remaining untouched or unfinished on the table of the other House, should be deemed so far valid, and should be acted on precisely as if there had been no adjournment.

This resolution was opposed by Messrs. BENTON, CALHOUN, and GRUNDY, and advocated by Messrs. LINN and HUBBARD; and laid on the table.

FLORIDA WAR.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the bill providing for enlisting 2,500 volunteers to serve for two years in the Florida war, was considered, and ordered to be engrossed.

EXCHANGE OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

On motion of Mr. TAPPAN, the joint resolution providing for the exchange of extra copies of books in the Congress Library, and of public documents, for those of foreign countries, was taken up and considered.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee on Commerce, moved to amend the resolution by an appropriation of $500 to effect an exchange of certain weights and measures with England, France, Russia, and Holland. Negatived by ayes 9, noes not counted.

The resolution itself was then rejected by ayes 9, noes not counted.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The Senate again proceeded to consider the bill to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia, the question being on Mr. PRESTON's motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate at length in favor of the motion, and was replied to by Mr. MERRICK.

After some further remarks by Messrs. PHELPS, GRUNDY, MERRICK, WALKER, HUNTINGTON, and DAVIS, the question was taken on reconsidering the vote, and it was negatived—ayes 18, noes 21, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, King, Nicholas, Roane, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, Huntington, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Norvell, Porter, Phelps, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Tappan, Walker, and Wall—21.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill making appropriations for the army for 1840, with sundry amendments; which were ordered to be printed.

The bill providing for the enlistment of 2,500 volunteers to serve in Florida, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. MERRICK presented a remonstrance of citizens of Washington to the passage of the bill for the renewal of the charter of the city of Washington; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution for the exchange of documents was defeated.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

THURSDAY, July 16, 1840.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina asked the consent of the House to make a report from the Committee of Elections in relation to the New Jersey contested election.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS objected to the reception of the report.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved a suspension of the rules; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The CHAIR informed the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the House, that the question pending when the House adjourned on yesterday evening, was the motion to suspend the rules for the reception of the report.

Mr. EVERETT inquired of the CHAIR what was the regular business in order during the morning hour.

The CHAIR replied that reports would be in order.

Mr. BELL said he had not the slightest objection to the reception of the report in its order; but he did object as proposed.

Mr. PETRIKIN said it was the object of gentlemen to suppress the report in the hands of the committee; and it was with that view they opposed the reception. If the rules were not suspended, some other report would be interposed, and a debate would be gotten up for the purpose of staving off the reception of this report, and thereby to defeat any action upon it this session. That was the real intention of gentlemen of the Opposition, whatever might be their professions.

Mr. RIVES said he hoped the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] would withdraw their objection, as it was merely the wish of the committee that the reports should be received and ordered to be printed, and made the special order for a future day.

Mr. PETRIKIN rose to a point of order. He contended that the report should be received as a matter of right. It was a privileged question: one involving the right of members to seats, and the rights of a sovereign State to be represented on this floor. It was therefore in order to report at any time.

The SPEAKER was of the opinion that it was not a privileged question. It was a regular report of a Committee on Elections, and could not be received out of its order, except by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina said he differed with the SPEAKER, and coincided with the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PETRIKIN;] and, notwithstanding he had moved a suspension of the rules for its reception, and wished that motion to be decided, he did not wish to be understood as yielding the opinion of his right to make the report as a question of privilege; and should the House refuse to suspend the rules, he would then insist on the question of privilege.

The SPEAKER said the question would be taken on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. CRAIG demanded the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House, and on that motion he asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were, yeas 53, nays 87.

So the House refused the call.

The question then recurred and was taken on the motion to suspend the rule, and resulted as follows: yeas 115, nays 64.

[The Whig party voted against the suspension of the rules for the reception of the report; or, in other words, to suppress the report, and thereby evade the vote on the question this session.]

So (there not being two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, who said that he had two reports from the Committee of Elections, involving the rights of members to seats on this floor, and he submitted that the question was one of privilege, and that, as such, it was entitled to precedence over all other business.

The SPEAKER decided that a report from the Committee of Elections was not a question of privilege; and supported his opinion by reference to the case of contested election from the State of Mississippi, which occurred at a former Congress, by which it would be seen that the House could not have so considered it a privileged question, as it was determined that it required a vote of two-thirds to make that case the special order for a particular day.

From this decision Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina took an appeal.

Mr. STANLY made some remarks in opposition to the reception of the report—a report of a description which nobody, he said, cared any thing about.

Mr. McKAY hoped the gentleman would withdraw the appeal, and a majority of the House could refuse to go into committee; and if the gentlemen of the Opposition did not interpose questions which would give rise to debate, the report would be reached in the course of the day.

Mr. CAMPBELL said his duty to the country and a respect for the rights of the claimants, would not permit him to take any course which might delay or defeat action on the subject.

The appeal was spoken to briefly by Messrs. CAMPBELL, STANLY, McKAY, and CUSHING.

When Mr. TURNEY moved the previous question, which was seconded.

Mr. PROFFIT asked the yeas and nays on ordering the main question, which were ordered; and, being taken, were—yeas 124, nays 66.

[The Whigs voted against ordering the question to be put; and thus staving off the question.]

So the main question was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. STANLY raised the question of order, whether certain members from New Jersey, whose names he had heard read, (Messrs. DICKERSON, &c.) had a right to vote. In the early part of the session it was decided that members from New Jersey could not vote in their own case.

The CHAIR was understood to reply that they had the right to vote on the appeal.

The question then recurring "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. PROFFIT asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

And the Clerk having called that portion of the roll which includes the names of members commencing with C—

Mr. STANLY again rose, and inquired whether certain members from New Jersey had a right to vote.

The SPEAKER said the proper time to raise the question would be when the call of the roll was completed.

The roll having been called through—

Mr. STANLY raised the question of order, whether Messrs. DICKERSON and Co. were entitled to vote?

The SPEAKER said that this was a mere preliminary question of order as to precedence of business, and not a question affecting the personal rights of the members alluded to.

Mr. STANLY. Does not this question of order affect their rights?

The SPEAKER said that the interest which the New Jersey members had was, whether they were entitled to seats or not. The question now before the House was a mere question of precedence of business; and the CHAIR, not seeing that they had more interest in that than any other, was of opinion that the gentlemen were entitled to vote.

Mr. STANLY appealed from the decision, and submitted to the CHAIR that the House had already decided this question.

The SPEAKER asked the gentleman to specify when.

Mr. STANLY said he did not exactly know.

Mr. ADAMS. There was such a decision. The question was raised during the time that I was in the chair. I decided then that the members from New Jersey had a right to vote, the question of interest, as I expressly stated at the time, being, not their individual interest, but the interest of their constituents. The House reversed my decision, and the gentlemen were not permitted to vote; and now, whether this be a preliminary question or not, when I am called upon to vote, I shall vote according to the principles I then assumed, and not according to the decision of the House.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired of the CHAIR whether the result of the vote would be changed by the admission or rejection of the votes of these gentlemen?

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

Some delay took place in looking for the record of the decision, during which,

Mr. STANLY expressed himself willing to waive his right to the floor, if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would consent to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES (though the question was one of great importance, involving the rights of a sovereign State, and rights of members to seats, and did not wish to procrastinate action) did not yield to the suggestion.

After a few moments—

Mr. ADAMS said that there must be a record of the decision.

The SPEAKER said that the Clerk stated he could not find such a decision as the gentleman had reference to. It was probably before the organization of the House, when it was decided that neither party were entitled to vote.

Mr. ADAMS. I am not responsible for the making up of the journal at that time, or any other. I state the fact, however, that such a decision was made.

Mr. STANLY inquired whether, if he waived the question now, with a view to go to the regular business of the country, he could bring it up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER replied that it would be too late.

Mr. STANLY then said he must insist on the decision of the appeal at this time. After a few remarks, in which Mr. S. expressed his own opinion to be that these gentlemen ought to vote, but said that he was desirous that the House should abide by its own decisions, he asked the yeas and nays on his appeal; which were ordered.

Mr. VANDERPOEL demanded the previous question; and there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be now taken.

And the main question, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the House?" was then put.

Previous to the announcement of the vote,

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky rose and said that he had at first voted in the affirmative—but that he would change his vote on the ground that these gentlemen were no more entitled to seats in this House than any other person. If he could consider them so entitled, he would sustain the decision of the CHAIR. As it was, however, he could not do so.

Mr. MONROE rose and said that for the same reason he would change his vote.

And the votes of both gentlemen were recorded accordingly.

The SPEAKER then announced the vote to be: yeas 125, nays 38.

So the House sustained the decision of the CHAIR, by which it was declared that Messrs. DICKERSON and Co. were entitled to vote.

The SPEAKER then announced the vote on the original appeal taken by Mr. CAMPBELL of S. C. to be: yeas 88, nays 95.

So the House reversed the decision of the CHAIR. And it was thus declared that the question of a report from the Committee of Elections was a question of privilege, and entitled to take precedence over all other business.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina then made a report in the case of the New Jersey contested election—moved the printing of the report, evidence, &c. and that it made the the special order of the day for Saturday next. And Mr. C. demanded the previous question.

The report of the minority of the committee concluded as follows:

"Thus it appears the result of this investigation has been to increase the majority of the five claimants who received the greatest number of votes from the whole State, and the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That PETER D. VROOM, PHILEMON DICKERSON, WILLIAM R. COOPER, DANIEL B. RYALL, and JOSEPH KILLE, are entitled to occupy, as members of the House of Representatives, the five contested seats from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut, on leave, presented a report from the minority of the said committee, and moved the printing.

[The minority report was of great length. The minority believe that three of the Whig contestants were (from testimony which they produce in their report, and which the majority of the committee did not believe competent testimony) entitled to seats, though they conclude their report without recommending by resolution any action on the conclusions to which they came.]

Mr. PROFFIT inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. CAMPBELL] whether the evidence was a part of the report.

Mr. CAMPBELL was understood to say of course it was so.

Mr. PROFFIT. Then I call for the reading of the majority and minority reports, and all the testimony. [It would have taken the Clerk three days to read all the testimony which the committee had acted on, and which formed the basis of the conclusions in the report, and which was already printed, under the direction of the committee, by authority of the House.]

Mr. CAMPBELL submitted, as a question of order, to the CHAIR, that the gentleman had no right to have these papers read on a question of printing.

The SPEAKER said he would decide that point after having ascertained whether there was a second to the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FILLMORE suggested to Mr. CAMPBELL to include in his motion to print, the journal of the committee.

The suggestion having been acquiesced in, (though Mr. CAMPBELL remarked that the journal had already been printed,)

The SPEAKER put the question on the demand for the previous question. And there was a second.

And the main question was ordered to be taken.

Several members of the Opposition here objected to making the resolutions accompanying the report the special order for any day, when

Mr. FILLMORE asked that the question might be taken separately—first on that part of the motion which proposed to print the two reports—and, secondly, on that part of it which proposed to make the subject the special order for Saturday And the division was ordered accordingly.

Mr. DROMGOOLE also asked for a separate question on the motion to print the journal; which was also ordered.

Mr. PROFITT then inquired of the CHAIR if it was in order now to call for the reading of the paper?

The SPEAKER said that it was.

Mr. PROFFIT. Then I call for the reading of every word, syllable, and letter. I am ready to take the responsibility of the motion. But I first make the offer to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to waive the matter for the present if he is willing to go into comm t ee to resume the consideration of the appropriation bill; or take up any other public business which the chairman might prefer.

Mr. JONES returned no answer, and several Administration members objected. They were opposed to suppressing the printing of the report, and opposed to the attempt to get rid of the question by indirection. The reading progressed for about half an hour, when

Mr. BOTTS said if the reading of the testimony was persisted in, no other business could be done this session.

Mr. DAWSON of Georgia proposed to go into committee on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. PROFFIT assented. But a number of Administration members, again objecting, said that they were opposed to sacrificing the rights of a sovereign State, and to suppressing the truth.

Mr. STANLY rose to inquire who objected, in order that the country might know which party was responsible for the delay of public business.

Mr. BEATTY of Pennsylvania rose and said he objected; and, speaking in an angry tone, said the gentleman could turn his notice to him. He wished the people of the country to notice which party wished to smother the truth; which party it was that called for the reading of a mass of printed testimony for the purpose of consuming the time of the House, and thereby defeat the motion to print the reports to which this testimony was appended, the reading of which was called for by a Whig, and the reading of which was insisted on by a Whig, unless the Administration party would so far forget right and justice as to agree that it should not be printed, and that no action should be had upon it this session. If the gentleman wished to save the time of the House, why did he not agree to the motion of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, to lay the reports on the table for the present, for the purpose of having them printed, and to make the subject the special order of the day for Saturday, when the members will then have read the report and testimony, and be better prepared to act upon the question, if indeed they are not sufficiently informed from what has been already read.

Mr. STANLY made some reply of an offensive character.

The reading proceeded for some time longer.

Mr. HAWES appealed to the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his demand for the reading of the volume, and let it be printed; but the appeal was in vain.

At fifteen minutes past two o'clock, Mr. FILLMORE rose and appealed to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PROFFIT] to dispense with the further reading. This was no time to go into this matter.

Mr. PROFFIT said he had not forced this question upon the House; the House had done so by its own decision. He wished the reading to proceed.

Mr. MEDILL, in the course of the reading of the report of the minority, was surprised at its extraordinary character; said it had never been submitted or read to the majority in committee, and that it contained falsehoods.

The CLERK proceeded in the reading of the reports until 2½ o'clock, at which time the House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

The CLERK resumed and concluded the reading of the majority and minority reports of the Committee of Elections in relation to the New Jersey contested election; when

Mr. CAMPBELL, the chairman of the committee, wished to inquire of the SPEAKER whether he could not modify his original motion, so as to print only the majority report and the journal. He had, in the morning, at the request of a member, included the minority report in his motion to print; but after hearing it read, he could not sanction the printing of such a document with his name. It contained things which were not matters of fact—were untrue.

The SPEAKER said that the gentleman had the right, provided the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT,] on whose motion the reading was ordered, yielded the floor.

After some debate of a conversational character, Mr. PROFFIT yielded the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL then modified his motion as above, not being willing to sanction the printing of such a document as the minority report, by his name; and the question being on the printing, on which the previous question had been ordered,

Mr. ANDREWS wished to know—

Several members here called Mr. A. to order.

Mr. ANDREWS in a very loud voice exclaimed, "I am in order."

(Cries of hurra; well done ANDREWS.)

Mr. CLARK of New York made some remarks, in which he complained that the chairman of the Committee of Elections had first entrapped the House into ordering the previous question, under a motion to print both reports, and having secured the previous question, he now wished to leave out the minority report.

Mr. MEDILL, with much vehemence of gesture, rose and repelled the charge that the House had been "entrapped" in any way. The House had not been entrapped, and the charge was a vile slander upon the House and the majority of the committee.

Mr. ANDREWS moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question had been seconded; which motion was rejected.

Mr. PROFFIT having withdrawn the motion to read the volumes of testimony accompanying the reports,

The question then being on the motion to print the majority report and the journal of the committee,

Messrs. RICE GARLAND and FILLMORE made each a speech on what they termed tyranny on the part of the CHAIR in applying the question of reconsideration on the second to the previous question, instead of the previous question itself. It subsequently appeared, however, that the CHAIR had been misunderstood.

The question was then taken on a motion of Mr. G. to reconsider the motion by which the previous question had been ordered, and was negatived by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 65, nays 80.

The question then recurring on the modified motion of Mr. CAMPBELL to print the majority report and journal,

Mr. DAVIS of Kentucky, in a very violent manner, was proceeding to give his reasons why he wished to be excused from voting, and denounced the modification of the motion, etc. as fraud and chicanery; when he was loudly called to order by the SPEAKER, and by members from various parts of the hall.

The CHAIR said the gentleman's language was an imputation upon the House, which was out of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL desired the member from Kentucky to know that such language would not be permitted out of the House, neither would it be suffered in the House. The character of the report of the minority was not known when he consented to include it in his motion to print.

(Much confusion here arose, and it was sometime before order could be restored.)

Mr. HOLMES appealed to the House, in the name of fifteen millions of freemen, to know whether such proceedings should be suffered.

Mr. RICE GARLAND said Mr. HOLMES did not represent fifteen millions of freemen.

Mr. HOLMES rejoined, that he was sure, in condemning such disorderly proceedings, he was speaking the sentiments of every lover of decorum in the country.

The question then being taken on the first branch of the motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, viz: on printing the majority report, it was agreed to, as follows—yeas 172, nay 1.

The question then being taken on agreeing to the second branch, viz: the printing of the journal of the committee, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 154, nays 18.

Mr. FILLMORE then moved the printing of the minority report.

Mr. RAMSEY demanded the previous question, which was seconded, and the main questisn was ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to print the minority report, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 102, nays 68.

So the minority report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JAMESON then moved the adoption of the resolution accompanying the majority report, as follows: see preceding column:

Mr. J. then moved the previous question.

Mr. FILLMORE wished to inquire whether, when the House was acting in its judicial capacity, the operation of the previous question would be to prevent the contestants from speaking at the bar of the House on their case.

The SPEAKER was understood to say that the operation of the previous question would be the same in this as in all other cases.

Mr. BRIGGS moved a call of the House, and on that motion made some brief remarks in favor of allowing the contestants an opportunity of being heard at the bar of the House.

After some vehement vociferation on the part of Mr. MONROE, which set the House in a roar of laughter,

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BRIGGS for a call of the House, and it was negatived—yeas 68, nays 75.

Mr. BOTTS wished to know if it would be in order to submit a resolution permitting the claimants to appear at the bar of the House.

The CHAIR replied in the negative, as such a resolution could not be entertained until it should be ascertained whether there was a second to the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina wished the gentleman from Missouri would withdraw the motion for the previous question, and let the report be made the special order for Saturday or Monday.

Cries of No, no, from many; the question has been discussed for months; every one understands it. The interest of the people requires that the House should act without delay. If the subject were discussed for months, no gentleman could come to a more correct conclusion than he has already arrived at. There is no time for delay. The reports of the two committees have been read to the House. The committee have been for months examining the testimony and determining upon the same. Their report is right.

Mr. JAMESON would not withdraw the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put—yeas 101, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Black, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Sampson H. Butler, Bynum, Carr, Carroll, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Hook, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leet, Leonard, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloh, McKay, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rives, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Shaw, Shepard, Albert Smith, John Smith, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alford, John W. Allen, Andrews, Baker, Bell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Brockway, Calhoun, John Campbell, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, J. Cooper, Mark A. Cooper, Crabb, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushin, Garret Davis, Dawson, Deberry, Dennis, Dellet, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Gates, Gentry, Giddings, Goggin, Goode, Graham, Green, Grinnell, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hill of Virginia, Hopkins, Hunt, Kempshall, Lincoln, McCarty, Marvin, Mason, Mitchell, Monroe, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Nisbet, Osborne, Palen, Pope, Profit, Randall, Rariden, Rayner, Ridgway, Russell, Saltonstall, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Stuart, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Underwood, John White, Thomas W. Williams, Lewis Williams, Joseph L. Williams, and C. H. Williams—85.

The question now recurring on the adoption of the resolution appended to the report of the majority,

Mr. ANDREWS, for reasons assigned by him, asked permission to be excused from voting; and the question being on granting leave, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. EVERETT asked to be excused, for reasons which were read to the Hous; and on that motion he asked the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 70, nays 100.

So the House refused to excuse him.

Messrs. BRIGGS, ADAMS, LINCOLN, L. WILLIAMS, DAWSON, MONROE, WADDY THOMPSON, POPE, CAMPBELL of Tennessee, BOND, SERGEANT, CUSHING, POFFIT, CALHOUN of Massachusetts, BELL, SALTONSTALL, SLADE, DAVIS of Kentucky, STANLY, EVANS, ALFORD, BOTTS, HILL of Virginia, RARIDEN, OGLE, JOHNSON of Maryland, and FILLMORE, successively rose, and asked to be excused, or said that they would refuse to vote for various reasons, such as that they had not heard the volume of testimony read; that the parties had not been heard at the bar of the House; and that they could not sufficiently understand the merits of the question from the reading of the reports of the minority and majority of the committee. The House refused those who made such a request, and did not compel those who said (regardless of the rules) that they would not vote. The excuses are of too great length for this day's paper.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina said, as the burden of the excuse seemed to be that the gentlemen did not sufficiently understand the subject conscientiously to vote, he would, to afford gentlemen an opportunity to read the reports which had been read at the table, and ordered to be printed, move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PROFFIT and many of the Whigs objected, and Mr. P. demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas 34, nays 107, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boyd, A. V. Brown, William O. Butler, Bynum, Calhoun, John Campbell, Chapman, Coles, Curtis, Dana, Davee, Davies, Dawson, Edwards, Fornance, Galbraith, John Hastings, Hook, Hopkins, Lewis, McKay, Marvin, Montanya, Petrikin, Starkweather, Stuart, Sumpter, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Underwood, David D. Wagener, Warren, and Christopher H. Williams—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Alford, H. J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Blackwell, Bond, Botts, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Burke, Carr, Casey, Chinn, Chittenden, Clark, Clifford, Connor, Craig, Cranston, John Davis, John W. Davis, G. Davis, Dennis, Dellet, Doan, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Evans, Fillmore, Fisher, Floyd, Rice Garland, Gates, Goggin, Graham, Green, Grinnell, Hammond, Hand, William S. Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Hill of Virginia, Hubbard, Hunt, Jackson, James, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, William Cost Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Kemble, Kempshall, Leet, Lucas, McClellan, McCulloch, Mallory, Marchand, Mason, Medill, Morgan, Newhard, Ogle, Osborne, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Pope, Prentiss, Profit, Ramsey, Rariden, Reynolds, Ridgway, Rives, Edward Rogers, Russell, Samuels, Sergeant, Simonton, Slade, Truman Smith, Stanly, Steenrod, Swearingen, Sweney, Philip F. Thomas, Toland, Triplett, Trumbull, Turney, Edward D. White, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Thomas W. Williams, Henry Williams, Lewis Williams, and Worthington—107.

[It will be perceived, by reference to the yeas and nays above, that, although the Whigs complained that they could not vote, because they had not been afforded an opportunity to read the testimony, (which was printed, and ready to be laid on the table,) they voted against the adjournment. That is, all those who voted for the adjournment, (which would have afforded an opportunity to read the testimony,) with the exception of ten, were Democrats. The motion to adjourn compelled the House to vote immediately on the adoption of the resolution.]

Mr. HAWES and Mr. TRIPLETT asked to be excused, but the House refused to excuse them.

The question now being on the adoption of the resolution reported by the majority of the committee, (declaring those who were now holding seats as Representatives from New Jersey, were entitled to said seats,)

Mr. EVANS demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 101, nays 22; just a quorum, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Judson Allen, Hugh J. Anderson, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Blackwell, Boyd, Aaron V. Brown, Albert G. Brown, Burke, William O. Butler, Bynum, John Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chapman, Clifford, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Dana, Davee, John Davis, John W. Davis, Doan, Doig, Dromgoole, Duncan, Earl, Eastman, Ely, Fine, Fisher, Floyd, Fornance, Galbraith, Hammond, Hand, John Hastings, Hawkins, Hill of North Carolina, Hillen, Holleman, Holmes, Hopkins, Hubbard, Jackson, Jameson, Joseph Johnson, Cave Johnson, Nathaniel Jones, John W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Leonard, Lucas, McCulloh, McKay, Mallory, Marchand, Medill, Miller, Montanya, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Newhard, Parrish, Parmenter, Parris, Paynter, Petrikin, Pickens, Prentiss, Ramsey, Reynolds, Rhett, Rives, Edward Rogers, Samuels, Thomas Smith, Starkweather, Steenrod, Strong, Sumter, Swearingen, Sweney, Taylor, Francis Thomas, Philip F. Thomas, Jacob Thompson, Turney, Vanderpoel, David D. Wagener, Watterson, Wick, Jared W. Williams, Henry Williams, and Worthington—101.

NAYS—Messrs. Botts, Briggs, Carter, Chinn, Chittenden, Mark A. Cooper, Cranston, Fillmore, Goggin, Green, Hawes, James, Mason, Morgan, Ogle, Osborne, Pope, Ridgway, Truman Smith, Thomas W. Williams, and Joseph L. Williams—22.

So the resolution was adopted.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. McCLELLAN of Tennessee said he had, a few minutes before the vote was taken, stepped out of the House, and did not return until after his name was passed. He asked permission of the House to allow him to vote. He wished to vote for the adoption of the resolution. Several members objected, and Mr. M. was not allowed to vote.

[It would be proper to state that when the roll was first called, several of the Whigs only voted, and finding that the Democratic vote was not sufficient to constitute a quorum, some of those who said that they could not vote for or against the resolution, without doing injustice to one set of claimants or the other, or doing violence to their conscience, recanted for the purpose of making a quorum, and voted against the resolution, viz: Messrs. POPE, OGLE, HAWES, FILLMORE, BOTTS, and BRIGGS.]

On motion, the House, at a quarter past nine o'clock, p. m. adjourned.

IN SENATE,

FRIDAY, July 17, 1840.

Mr. WALL asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill, entitled "An act to remove restrictions upon discounting notes, and other securities in the the District of Columbia."

Perhaps it was not generally known to the public, or even to Congress, that there exists a prohibition in the laws of Congress, against any unchartered banking company, or any association, partnership, or company of individuals, within the District of Columbia, discounting any notes, or other securities, for the payment of money, under a penalty of not less than $100, and not more than $500; and all such, discounted contrary to the provisions of the said act, are declared utterly void. This extraordinary annihilation of the rights of the many for the benefit of the few, is to be found in the 29 and 31st sections of "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia and to prevent the circulation of the notes of unincorporated associations within the said District," approved March 3, 1817. This law takes away the rights of the whole, to give privileges to a few to found a monopoly. This monopoly has fallen by the expiring of the law. This abridgment of the rights of the whole, can no longer aid the defunct banks. They can no longer discount as a chartered company. Why then should individuals be prohibited within the ten miles square, from doing what individuals every where else may do? Why should they be deprived of using their money or funds as they may see proper in discounting notes, or other securities for the payment of money? In my opinion, the prohibition should fall with the monopoly. It was designed for the benefit of the banks, and rights were taken from natural persons, to vest them in artificial persons. The artificial persons are now dead, so far as relates to the exclusive privilege of discounting. Is it not just and proper that those rights, thus taken for a purpose which no longer can be reached, should be restored to those from whom they were taken? I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to repeal this extraordinary abridgment of the rights of the natural being, for the benefit of the artificial being. The bill which I have the honor to submit to the Senate merely repeals this odious, extraordinary and injudicious prohibition. I think the subject demands immediate action.

By unanimous consent the bill was introduced; and, having been read,

Mr. WALL asked that it might have its second reading at that time.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana asked if the secon reading was required merely for reference.

Mr. WALL said that the provisions of the bill was so simple there could be no necessity for reference. He therefore desired that the Senate would read it a second time now for the purpose of consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana objected to this, and the bill was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY.

Mr. WILLIAMS, on leave, introduced a bill authorizing the President, and appropriating $25,000 to explore and survey the Northeastern boundary between Maine, New Hampshire, and the British Provinces. Read twice by consent, and ordered to be engrossed: subsequently read a third time and passed.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to enable the President of the United States to hold a council with the Miami Indians for the purpose of treating for the purchase of the reserves held by them in the State of Indiana, should he deem it expedient to hold such council.

Mr. S. said he would make a word of explanation. It was desirable that a treaty should be held as contemplated in the resolution; and as the Senate had decided that an appropriation by law to hold the same should precede the convention of the council, he had brought the matter to the consideration of the Senate in the proper manner. He desired the question to be submitted to the Committee on Finance, for the purpose of enabling that committee to make an amendment to the bill from the House on the subject of Indian appropriations, which would shortly be before it. He hoped the resolution would be acted upon now. The committee, he had no doubt, would give the subject its consideration at the proper time.

The resolution was agreed to, and the accompanying papers referred.

On motion of Mr. MOUTON, the Committee on Private Land Claims was discharged from the further consideration of sundry memorials, heretofore referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and not acted on by them.

The adverse reports of the Committee of Claims on the memorials of citizens of Jackson county, Alabama, and of other citizens of Alabama, were taken up and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, the Committee on Claims were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Alexander Jones and of a Senate resolution of inquiry as to improving the harbor of St. Louis.

EXCHANGE OF FOREIGN BOOKS.

The Senate took up the joint resolution (the rejection of which had been reconsidered on motion of Mr. WHITE) providing for the exchange of extra books in the Congress Library, and of public documents for those of foreign countries.

Mr. DAVIS asked if the amendment offered yesterday from the Committee on Commerce for the exchange of certain weights and measures would now be in order?

Mr. RUGGLES said he had learned that the amendment would not be requisite to the object proposed.

The resolution was ordered to a third reading, and subsequently read a third time and passed. The vote ordering its engrossment was as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Mouton, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Strange, Surgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, and Wall—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Hubbard, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Smith of Indiana, and Williams—10.

CHARTER OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. NORVELL, in accordance with a notice which he had given some days since, moved to take up the bill to alter and continue the charter of the city of Washington.

Mr. MERRICK objected to the taking up, that the changes proposed were very important, involving a vast amount of rights and property, and there could not be time at this session to give them the consideration which they demanded.

Mr. NORVELL was surprised to hear these objections fall from the lips of the honorable Senator from Maryland. The subject had been before that Senator and his committee for several months. And whose fault was it that it had been so long delayed? The changes proposed in the charter of the city of Washington were few and simple, and would require very little time for their consideration. The first and most important was the extension of the right of suffrage to all free white male citizens of the United States who had resided twelve months in the city immediately preceding the election. The adoption of this principle was demanded by a due regard to the equal rights of our fellow citizens, whether they possessed property or not. It had been called for by a large and respectable number of the citizens of Washington, of whom many were wealthy property holders, such as Mr. Travers, Mr. Boyle, and others. Of three or four hundred petitioners, whose names were on the memorial which he held in his hand, he had understood that two hundred and thirty were owners of real estate. The idea, however, that property alone was affected by the proceedings of a city corporation, was preposterous. The liberty, interest and personal safety of every man within its limits, were liable to be affected by them. No principle was more sacred that that of equality in the right of suffrage. It did not rightfully belong to property. It attached to persons. It was the right of every citizen. It was too late in the day to claim property qualification as necessary to entitle the citizen to vote, whether in States or municipal corporations. This was not with him a party question. It was a fundamental principle, and rose above all mere party views. The election by the people of magistrates and constables was another change proposed in the charter. This mode of appointing such officers had been successfully tried in several States. It secured better officers, and a greater and more efficient responsibility in the performance of their duties. All property qualifications in the mayor, aldermen, and members of the common council, were also abolished. The power to assess and levy a poll tax, limited to one dollar per annum, was given in the charter, but not as a qualification for voting. The charter was limited to ten years, subject to repeal or modification at any time by Congress. He moreover proposed to modify the bill so as to authorize the division of the city into any number of wards, not more than ten, nor fewer than six, to secure as near an approach to equality in the population of each ward as possible. He should move another amendment, prohibiting the enrolment and registry of citizens with a view to the determination of the question who was or was not entitled to vote. We had all seen the wanton abuse of that power elsewhere for party purposes.

The motion to take up the bill was carried by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Dixon, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Ruggles, Southard, and Tallmadge—10.

Mr. MERRICK remarked, as the Senate had determined to take up the bill and apparently pass it, after what he had said, he should take no further notice of the bill or the amendments.

Mr. TAPPAN: I am sorry that we are under the necessity of getting through this bill without the aid of the Senator from Maryland. Without his valuable services, I fear that we shall make but lame work of it; but we must get on as well as we can.

Mr. T. then offered an amendment, which was agreed to, requiring the elections to begin at 9 o'clock, a. m. and close at 7 p. m. and that the commissioners should declare the result of the vote before separating; and if the two boards should fail to appoint a commissioner, the electors should choose three viva voce, to conduct the election.

Mr. DAVIS spoke strongly against passing the bill at this session, on account of the great importance of the questions involved, and the want of time to consider them. Mr. D. did not know enough about them; and his only alternative at this time was, therefore, to vote against the bill. He alluded to and deprecated the general disposition at this time to regulate the affairs of the District.

Mr. NORVELL having replied briefly,

Mr. ALLEN said that the proposition was to continue the charter of the city of Washington, with two or three amendments, the principal one of which is to extend the orbit of the elective franchise; and the question was, whether a portion of the citizens who are now disfranchised, should have extended to them those rights which they are now deprived of by a property qualification. Now the action on this proposition would demonstrate one fact to the country: that if in the ranks of the Democracy there prevailed some diversity of sentiment in relation to the mode and extent of bank reform, yet on the great and fundamental question of the right of suffrage, there was perfect unanimity—there was but one feeling—and that was to extend to every citizen the right of participating in the choice of those who were to make the laws by which he was to be governed.

The amendments proposed by Mr. NORVELL were all agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK asked that the memorial of the corporate authorities of Washington, remonstrating against the passage of the bill, be read.

Mr. WALKER hoped that it would be read, and fully considered, and particularly that portion of the memorial which opposed the right of suffrage, and advocated the government of the city by property alone.

Mr. CLAY of Ala. merely wished to mention the fact that this was a remonstrance by the corporate authorities of the city of Washington, whose charter was to be amended. They were protesting against several amendments which extended the right of suffrage, and modestly proposed to Congress not to give the people power to oust them from the power which they now hold. The only provision which seemed to be so very objectionable to them, was that giving to the people, on whom the laws operate, the power of choosing who are to make them. This bill did not deprive these corporate authorities of any rights, but it conferred on the people at large rights which they did not hold under the late charter. The principles embodied in this bill were such as he had ever been in favor of, and such as he would maintain as long as he continued to live.

Mr. MERRICK then moved to lay the bill on the table; and, after some remarks from Messrs. ALLAN, MERRICK, and CLAY of Alabama, the motion was rejected—yeas 12, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Huntington, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, and White—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—26.

Mr. KNIGHT said if Congress should frame a form of Government for the city of Washington, it was the proper business of the citizens to investigate it, and adopt it for themselves. This model, if passed, should be exhibited to them, and thus Congress should ascertain whether it would be acceptable to them. Let them all vote even on the liberal scale provided for by this bill, and if a majority were then against it, it ought not to be forced upon them. But if the majority were in favor of it, Mr. K. would say amen to whatever they would say.

Mr. NORVELL replied that the remarks of the Senator would be entitled to some weight, if we were about to form a new and fundamental constitution for the government of a people. In the present case, Congress were the legislators and rulers of the people of this District, made so by the Constitution of the United States. The proposed bill was nothing more than an amended charter for the city, and had no reference to the great principles of government, so gravely and tritely urged by the Senator. The essential principle embraced in the amendments, was the extension of the right of suffrage; and upon that subject he should consult nobody. He could not mistake the rights or the wishes of any free people on that point.

The bill was now ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Williams, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, and White—10.

RETROCESSION OF ALEXANDRIA AND GEORGETOWN.

Mr. MERRICK moved to take up the bill authorizing the President to ascertain the opinions of the people of the District of Columbia, not within the limits of the city of Washington, as to their being retroceded to Virginia and Maryland respectively.

Mr. GRUNDY spoke strongly in opposition to the motion.

Mr. MERRICK said the object was only to ascertain the wishes of the people.

Mr. GRUNDY was opposed to any action on the subject.

The bill was taken up by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Grundy, Pierce, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Wall, Williams, Wright—8.

Mr. ROANE spoke with great earnestness against the bill. It was a question even whether Congress had the constitutional power to pass it.

He spoke of the great anger and excitement which had recently been manifested in the District, and which was known to all, and said the public mind ought to be allowed time to settle down before proceeding at all on a measure of this kind.

Mr. MERRICK said this measure was not the mere result of anger or excitement. It had been stated here, by a member on the other side of the House, [Mr. WALKER,] and it is well known that Georgetown had a year ago sent in her cool petition to be retroceded.

Mr. ROANE said he had alluded alone to the present perturbed state of the southern portion of the District. The retrocession, it was true, had been several times proposed, but was promptly put down; and he believed it did not agree with the sober second thought of the people of the District. Alexandria, in her cool moments, would not receive the proposition, hampered and overwhelmed as she was in debt.

Mr. WALKER again urged the importance of the retrocession to the Government itself, and insisted that without it the seat of Government would be removed.

Mr. GRUNDY again spoke earnestly against the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to lay the bill finally on the table, and it was so ordered, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Brown, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Porter, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, White, Williams, and Wright—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Davis, Henderson, Knight, Merrick, Norvell, Phelps, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon and Walker—13.

DISTRICT BANKS.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of Messrs. Kurtz, Van Ness, and Bradley, presidents of the Metropolis and Patriotic Banks, and of the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, praying the continuance of their banking powers, and that of other banks, on the condition of their resuming and continuing specie payments, and concluding with the form of a joint resolution, which, if passed by Congress, would be acceptable to them.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLEN, with great emphasis, characterized this presenting of the form of a joint resolution to be acted on by Congress as an insult on the country represented in this Senate. He moved to lay it on the table; which motion was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Linn, Lumpkin, Pierce, Porter, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Roane, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Wall, White—25.

Mr. TAPPAN asked if a question which had been twice decided could be presented again?

The CHAIR. Yes, half a dozen times.

Mr. WRIGHT renewed his motion to refer the memorial to the District Committee, (Mr. MERRICK remarking that this was equivalent to laying it on the table;) and it was so referred.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. WRIGHT, proceeded to consider the bill from the House making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1840.

Mr. W. proceeded to offer, severally, and explain various amendments from committee, some of the first of which having been agreed to without dissent—

The appropriation ($12,000) for the purchase of an island in the Mississippi, near Fort Snelling, was debated by Messrs. CALHOUN, WRIGHT, TAPPAN, BUCHANAN, and BENTON, and agreed to by ayes 18, noes 17.

The provision by committee, authorizing the President to suspend certain works at his discretion, was opposed by Mr. SOUTHARD and advocated by Mr. WRIGHT till the recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. WRIGHT explained the object of the 3d section of the amendment—which was that, in case the means of the Treasury, from any cause, should not be sufficient to meet all the appropriations made by Congress, the President should be authorized to postpone the expenditures for repairs and improvements at the Springfield armory; for repairs and improvements at the Harper's Ferry armory; for the purchase of saltpetre and brimstone; for continuing the barracks, quarters, &c. at Fort Leavenworth, at Fort Wayne, at Fort Smith, at Plattsburg, and at Fort Jesup, or such and so many of them, or such portions of each, as, in his judgment, after careful examination and inquiry, the condition of the Treasury shall demand and the public interests will best permit; such postponements, in each case, to be merely temporary, or until the close of the next session of Congress.

Mr. SOUTHARD opposed this amendment in a speech of considerable length. He was willing to make the appropriation for whatever might be necessary; but he was utterly opposed to allowing the matter to depend on the Executive will. It was in short transferring the powers of Congress to the hands of the Executive. It would be a step unknown to the legislation of any country, and was without precedent and utterly uncalled for.

Mr. HUNTINGTON expressed his regret that his health would not allow him to enter into this subject as fully as he desired. He condemned the amendment as virtually transferring to the President a power which ought never to be entrusted to any Executive. He did not mean to insinuate that the President would abuse it; but it was not proper to trust such irresponsible power with any man, however virtuous or exalted he might be. It was a temptation too strong. It gave the power to the President to select favorite objects, and at such spots as best suited his inclination. For that reason, he considered it both dangerous and, under the circumstances, unnecessary.

Mr. LUMPKIN took a different view. The discretion was limited to an intervening period, in case the money should not be in the Treasury. He could not see any alarming features in the measure.

Mr. WRIGHT defended the amendment at length, declaring the committee had no other alternative than to make it discretionary with the President, who could best tell, from the information in his possession, where the expenditures might be suspended with least injury to the public service.

Mr. SOUTHARD spoke for near an hour against the amendment in all its phases, and replied to the arguments of Mr. LUMPKIN and Mr. WRIGHT. The readiness with which gentlemen were willing to give discretionary power to the Executive was matter of regret to him. "There is no danger," (say gentlemen.) That was the same siren song sung in Athens and Rome until liberty was lost.

Mr. HUNTINGTON followed in some remarks explanatory to Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: It seems we are in a most delicate crisis, and that the Republic is on the very brink of ruin. We are on a precipice and are just about to tumble into the yawning destruction beneath. We have arrived at the very point in our career, according to the opinion of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. SOUTHARD] where the Republics of Athens and Rome perished; and it would therefore be presumptuous in us to expect to survive much longer. He has informed us that the principle involved in this amendment is that which destroyed Athenian liberty and deprived Rome of her free Government. Whilst the Republic was thus threatened with ruin, strange to say, the Senators in fatal security sat unconcerned, reading their newspapers and writing their letters, utterly insensible of danger.

And what is this great danger. I have heard ruin to the Republic often predicted since I came into the Senate; but never with more force and earnestness than upon the present occasion. But is not all this "ocean into tempest wrought, to waft a feather or to drown a fly?" What is the question now before the Senate? Unfortunately we are very much in want of money, and our Treasury presents "a beggarly account of empty boxes." In this state of affairs, it will depend upon contingencies to which I need not advert, whether there will be sufficient money in the Treasury to pay all the appropriations for which we have provided. If there should not be, what will be the consequence? Unless this amendment shall be adopted, the President will have unlimited discretion over all the great objects of appropriation, and he may select or reject which of them he pleases. The amendment then is an express limitation, not an extension, of Executive discretion. We take up the general list of appropriations and select from it what we deem to be the least important objects: and we said to the President, if you have not money to pay all our appropriations then you shall withhold it from these designated objects alone. Your discretion shall be limited, and Congress, not you, will decide how the money must be applied in case the revenue should prove insufficient to meet all the appropriations. Let human ingenuity turn and twist this question as it may, this is the result: The amendment is an abridgment of Executive discretion. We may not have money enough to accomplish all the objects provided for by law; and in such an event we say to the President that we will designate those objects with which we are willing to dispense.

And this is the whole amendment! And this is the vast stretch of Executive power which may destroy the Government! The President, for example, in case of a deficiency of money, is directed to dispense with the appropriations "for barracks, quarters, and storehouses," and for the purchase of "saltpetre and brimstone," and for other objects, which I need not enumerate, and which are not of great and pressing importance. Does not the Senator from New Jersey perceive that this is an express limitation on Executive power? Without it, if there should not be money in the Treasury sufficient to accomplish all the objects for which we have provided, the President will have the unlimited power of dispensing with any appropriation which he may please. But we choose to exercise this dispensing power ourselves, and not to confer it on the Executive.

It is true that we might borrow more money; but we think it is wiser to reduce our expenditures than to increase our debt. If we cannot make all the improvements we desire, we will not trust our Executive agent with the discretion of roaming over the whole list, and rejecting such as he pleases. We perform this duty for ourselves by the present amendment, and give him his instructions.

The Senator from New Jersey, with all his ingenuity, cannot make more than this out of the amendment. The President cannot expend more money than there is in the Treasury. If there be not money enough for all the objects designated in our laws, without the amendment, he could divert this money from any one of them; and apply it to another. But we say, and say very properly, that he shall not exercise this power. It is much better that we should adopt this course, than either to borrow money or trust to the unlimited discretion of the Executive.

Mr. HUBBARD spoke for some time, and with much zeal, in defence of the amendment. He alluded to the bill which had passed at a prior session, where, at one sweep, discretion was given to the President to raise 50,000 men and 10,000,000 dollars, and yet nothing had then been said about discretionary power.

Mr. SOUTHARD drew a wide distinction between the time when the country was threatened with a war with one of the most powerful nations of Europe, and discretionary power granted in time of peace, when there was no necessity for it, and when it would be setting a dangerous precedent. Mr. S. said he had two distinct acknowledgments from the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUBBARD:] 1st. That the Treasury might be incompetent to meet the expenditures; and 2d. That these items were not indispensably necessary. If, (said Mr. S.) that is the ground on which the Senator stands, I put it to him and the whole Senate whether it would not have been wiser to have stricken out those items than to leave the matter to Executive discretion? The money was in the Treasury, or it was not. If it was not, why make the appropriation? They had no right to throw the responsibility on the President—it belonged to Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN did not profess to have any wit, nor did he believe he had any; but if he had, he should be very sorry either "to burn or drown" the Senator in it. His acquaintance with ancient history was not such as to inform him where, when, or how either Cæsar or Alcibiades had destroyed the liberties of their respective countries by a provision similar to this amendment. That might be owing to his own ignorance, which he hoped the Senator from New Jersey would condescend to enlighten.

The Senator, said Mr. B. has replied to what he calls my wit, but not to my argument. He has wisely passed the latter over. What is the amendment but this? I have an estate on which I desire to expend $100,000 in the course of the year. I employ an agent to direct and superintend this expenditure. It depends, however, upon the ability and will of a bank which is indebted to me, whether I shall be able to place the whole amount of this sum in his hands. Under such circumstances, what would a wise man do? He would say to his agent, you shall not exercise the discretion of deciding what particular improvement you will arrest in case I am not able to furnish the whole $100,000. This discretion I shall exercise for myself: and in case of a deficiency of means to accomplish the whole, you shall apply none of my money to such and such improvements, which, although important in themselves, must yield to others of more pressing necessity and greater utility. And, sir, this is the true nature of the amendment now before the Senate; and yet, strange as it may seem, it is strongly urged that it is an extension of Executive discretion! This is the whole amendment; and human ingenuity may be defied to make any thing more of it. What do we say by the amendment, to the President? If sufficient money should come in, you shall apply it to all our appropriations; but if it should not, you shall not expend any of it upon those objects of minor importance which we have designated. It is a clear limitation, not an extension of Executive discretion.

The amendment was then adopted.

Mr. TALLMADGE offered the following amendment, and urged the importance of it to the unobstructed navigation of the Hudson river, and the preservation of the public works:

Fifty thousand dollars, to be expended under the direction of the War Department, in continuing such part of the public works already commenced as may be most indispensable, for the improvement of the Hudson river above and below Albany; in dredging and removing obstructions formed in said river near such works; in making necessary repairs for the preservation of the existing public works on that river; and in providing for the care and preservation of the machinery and other public property connected with the said works.

Mr. WRIGHT said he did not wish to be understood as recriminating upon his colleague; but his position as a member of the committee would compel him, whatever might be his feelings on the subject, to vote against the amendment. He was aware of the importance of this improvement, and of the deep interest felt in it by the people of his State; and were this amendment proposed to a bill making appropriations for works of a kindred character, he would most cheerfully give it his support. But the bill now before the Senate was one making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1840; while the improvements on the Hudson were of that class of works usually provided for in the harbor bill. Were this to be adopted by the Senate, he could not but anticipate that a multitude of similar amendments would be proposed, which would weigh down this important bill, and finally sink it. Had his colleague been aware of the pertinacity with which applications for similar appropriations had been resisted in the committee, he thought he would not have placed him in the unpleasant position of being compelled to vote against an improvement of so much importance to his State, and one in which his constituents felt so deep an interest.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCHANAN moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $6,000 for an outfit for the Minister resident at Constantinople.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama opposed it. He said it was distinctly understood at the time when Com. Porter was raised from a Charge that there was to be no outfit, and he hoped that it would not be introduced in this bill.

Mr. BENTON and Mr. WALKER both advocated it.

Mr. SOUTHARD did not like the idea of making outfits years after the post of resident Minister had been created. If the Senator from Pennsylvania would move to place Com. Porter on the same ground with other Ministers, he would cheerfully give it his support. He thought, at the present juncture, it was all-important to have a competent Minister at the court of the Sultan.

Mr. BUCHANAN spoke from personal knowledge of the inadequacy of the salaries to maintain ministers in foreign countries.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama called for the yeas and nays, when there appeared for it—yeas 19, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Norvell, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Robinson, Southard, Williams, and Wright—15.

Mr. TALLMADGE now offered the following amendment:

"That $6,000 be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in making the necessary repairs for the preservation of the public works on Hudson river, above and below Albany, and providing for the care and preservation of the machinery and other public property connected with said works."

Mr. T. again pressed on the Senate the necessity of the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Walker, and White—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Strange, Sturgeon, Tappan, Wall, and Williams—21.

Mr. STRANGE moved to amend the bill by appropriating $5,000 for the purchase of a town lot adjoining the site of the arsenal at Fayetteville, in North Carolina.

The question having been taken on the amendment, it was negatived.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama moved to insert an appropriation of $12,000 for the purchase of an island at the confluence of the St. Peter's and Mississippi rivers.

This motion was debated at some length by Messrs. BUCHANAN, HENDERSON, CLAY of Alabama, WALKER, and others.

The motion was adopted by a vote of 16 to 13.

The question was here taken on agreeing with the committee in vesting the discretionary power in the President to postpone certain expenditures, and adopted.

Mr. STRANGE here renewed his motion to amend the bill by inserting the appropriation of $5,000 for the purchase of the site adjoining the United States arsenal near Fayetteville.

Mr. S. said, so far as appropriations were concerned, it would seem that North Carolina was scarcely known to the Union. On this motion he should demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, when there appeared for it 16, against it 16; so the motion was lost.

The question was then taken on the engrossment, and carried.

The private calender was taken up, and the following bills were considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reaing, and were subsequently read a third time and passed.

An act for the relief of Cornelius Tiers;

An act for the relief of Ebenezer Lobdell;

An act for the relief of certain settlers on the Salt Lick reservation in the western district of Tennessee;

An act for the relief of Pierre Molaison, the widom of Pierre Richoux, Alexander Comeau, Alice L. Foley, the widow of John Foley, and Francis Martin, of the State of Louisiana.

An act for the relief of the children of Stephen Johnson;

An act for the relief of William Marbury;

An act confirming the claim of Augustine Lacoste to a tract of land therein named;

An act for the relief of Mary Sroufe;

An act for the relief of John L. Bowman and Enoch J. Noyes;

An act for the relief of Oliver Welch;

An act for the relief of John A. Faunce and Oliver Perrin,

An act for the relief of the widow and heirs-at-law of the Lewis Grant Davidson, deceased;

An act for the relief of Boggs and Thompson, Robert and Thomas Hutchinson, and others;

An act for the relief of Thomas Latham;

were severally read three times and passed.

A joint resolution directing the transfer to the State of Maryland of the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, standing in the name of the United States, upon certain conditions, was passed and sent to the House for concurrence.

An act from the House for the relief of the sureties and heirs and representatives of Melancton W. Bostwick, deceased, was, on motion of Mr. BENTON, amended by adding a section for the relief of Mary W. Thompson, widow of Col. Alexander Thompson, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The following bills were considered, and laid on the table:

A bill for the relief of Eliza Causin, daughter and heir of John H. Stone, deceased;

A bill making provision for the adjustment of the title to a site for a light-house on the Roanoke marshes, in North Carolina;

A bill granting to the county of Kent, in the State of Michigan, the right of pre-emption to a quarter section of land;

A resolution authorizing the purchase, for the use of the United States, of the banking house of the Bank of Alexandria;

A bill granting to the State of Illinois the right of way through the public lands of the United States, and for other purposes;

A bill to relinquish to the State of Indiana the title of the United States to eight acres of land,

A bill for the relief of James McCrory;

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Frederick Seigle; and

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John Jordan, deceased, late a captain in the continental line of artillery artifices.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

FRIDAY, July 17, 1840.

After the reading of the journal,

Mr. STANLY moved an amendment of the journal of Thursday, giving his reasons why he did not vote for the resolution submitted by Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama, proposing to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill to prevent the admission of negroes into the naval service.

After some conversation between Messrs. STANLY, DROMGOOLE, and the CHAIR,

Mr. DROMGOOLE objected to the entry of reason for votes on the journal. It was unprecedented, and would lead to bad practices.

Mr. STANLY moved to suspend the rules, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 99, nays 69.

So the House refused to suspend the rules for the purpose.

Messrs. BOTTS and PROFFIT proposed amendments to the journal; which were agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina, from the Committee of Elections, in the case of the contested election from Massachusetts, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of certain electors of the 6th Congressional District of the State of Massachusetts, alleging that Osmyn Baker, the sitting member from that district, was not duly elected a member of the House of Representatives; there being no evidence produced to the committee in support of the allegations of the petitioners, and the time limited by agreement of parties and the authority of the committee, for completing the taking of the same, having expired on the 4th Monday of May last.

Mr. CAMPBELL said this was a unanimous report of the committee, and he therefore moved the adoption of the resolution, and on that motion moved the previous question, which received a second, and the main question having been ordered, the question was put, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FILLMORE, from the Committee of Elections, made a report from the majority of that committee, in relation to the seat of CHARLES NAYLOR from the third Congressional district of Pennsylvania, which was contested by Charles J. Ingersoll. Said report was accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That CHARLES NAYLOR was duly elected a member of the House of Representatives for the Twenty-sixth Congress, from the Third Congressional District in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MEDILL, from the minority of the Committee of Elections, submitted a report of the views of the minority on the said contested election.

On motion of Mr. FILLMORE, both reports were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GRAHAM of North Carolina (the rules having been suspended for that purpose) made a personal explanation in relation to certain speeches of Dr. DUNCAN, which he alleged on the authority of a paper in North Carolina, had been sent to his district under his frank. Mr. G. said it was a fraud which he could not account for, and disclaimed having franked any such speeches.

[A few days ago some of the Democratic members were franking, as they thought, public documents to their constituents; but they accidentally discovered that, instead of the packages containing public documents, they contained the lives of Harrison and Harrison pictoral Almanacs, which, no doubt, had been inadvertently done in the folding room of the Capitol by the boys. It was, in all probability, in the same manner, that Mr. GRAHAM franked those speeches.]

On motion of Mr. JONES, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. DROMGOOLE in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question pending was on the amendment offered by Mr. JONES, appropriating $45,000 for the removal of the Winnebago Indians from Wiskonsin to the neutral ground beyond the Mississippi, the creation of a grist mill, etc.

Mr. BELL opposed the amendment, and at some length gave his reasons therefor.

Mr. JONES explained, and produced letters from the Governor of Wiskonsin and other sources, showing that the removal of the Winnebagoes was essential to the safety of our citizens in that quarter.

Mr. EVERETT moved to amend the amendment, by striking out $45,000, and inserting $100,000, which would provide for the protection of the Winnebagoes after their removal.

Mr. JONES objected to the amendment of Mr. EVERETT, on the ground that sufficient provision was already in contemplation for their protection.

After some brief remarks from Messrs. CRARY, and CHAPMAN of Iowa, the amendment to the amendment was negatived.

The question then being on the amendment of Mr. JONES, it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES then moved to amend by inserting $36,265 40 for carrying into effect a treaty with the Stockbridge and Munsee tribe of Indians, made September the 3d, 1839, and ratified May 16th, 1840.

Mr. PROFFIT commenced a speech in which he censured the Secretary of the Treasury for not inserting this appropriation in the annual estimates at the commencement of the session.

Mr. JONES asked the member how it was possible for this appropriation to be contained in the annual estimates, when the treaty was not ratified until May the 16th, several months after those estimates were given in?

Mr. PROFFIT then resumed and concluded his remarks on another issue.

Mr. MASON of Ohio followed, and gave his views in opposition to the amendment; and the hour of half past two o'clock having arrived,

The CHAIR [Mr. DROMGOOLE] rose, and begged most respectfully to inform the gentleman from Ohio, that as the time had arrived when it was customary for the House to take a recess he would be pleased to suspend his remarks.

The Hous accordingly took the usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess,

The consideration of the Indian appropriation bill was resumed in Committee of the Whole, Mr. DROMGOOLE in the chair.

The question pending was on the amendment offered by Mr. JONES, appropriating $36,265 40 for carrying into effect a treaty with the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes of Indians, made September the 3d, 1839, and ratified May the 16th, 1840.

After some remarks from Messrs. DAVIS of Kentucky, BARNARD, EVANS, RICE GARLAND, McKAY, VANDERPOEL, RHETT, COOPER of Georgia, MASON, BIDDLE, and BELL, with explanations by Mr. JONES, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BELL moved to amend, by inserting the following: "for holding a treaty with the Cherokee Indians, including all the different interests and divisions which exist among them, upon the basis of their right to adopt any form of government which they, or a majority of them, may think proper, to elect their own officers or chiefs, and establish any law or regulation they may deem best for their welfare and happiness, provided they do not conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, applicable to their affairs, five thousand dollars."

Mr. BELL commenced a speech in support of his amendment, when it being obvious that no quorum was present, on motion, the committee rose, and that fact was reported to the House.

A motion to adjourn was then made simultaneously by several members; and it was negatived—yeas 26, nays 70.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved a call of the House, which was ordered, and the roll being called, 109 members answered to their names.

By general consent all further proceedings in the call were then dispensed with, and the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. BELL resumed his remarks, and at great length gave a detailed history of all the circumstances relating to the obligation between the Government and the Cherokee nation.

He was followed by Messrs. EVERETT, SHEPARD, POPE, and others, who gave their views on the policy of the Government, as pursued towards the Cherokees.

The question then being put on the amendment, it was discovered that not more than fifty members were present, half of whom were asleep.

It being now about eleven o'clock, and those present not being willing to re-enact the farce of spending seven or eight hours in procuring a quorum, were understood to consent that the amendment should be considered as agreed to, reserving the right to vote upon it when the bill should be reported.

Several amendments involving private claims were then moved and rejected.

At 1 o'clock the committee again rose.

Several ineffectual motions to adjourn were made.

Those who voted in favor of an adjournment, then, by way of retaliation, refused to vote for a call of the House, and thus much time was consumed in such motions—the House refusing to adjourn, and also refusing to order a call.

By general consent, the House went again into committee.

At half past one, Mr. BOTTS said it was evident the bill could not be reported at that time. Besides, he was not willing that so important an appropriation bill should be decided by thirty members, one half of whom were asleep. He therefore moved that the committee rise.

The vote on this motion being taken, no quorum voted.

The committee then rose, and that fact was reported to the House.

After some debate of a desultory character on the fate of the bill, should it be deferred until to-morrow,

At a quarter before two o'clock,

The House adjourned.

IN SENATE,

SATURDAY, July 18, 1840.

Mr. MERRICK presented the memorial of several hundred citizens of Alexandria city and county, praying that they might be receded by Congress to the State of Virginia. The memorial was in two forms; one of them simply asking a retrocession, the other assigning as a reason for it the oppressions of the Government, under which they were now suffering. Read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed, with the aggregate number of names.

Also, the memorial of the stone-cutters on the new Treasury building, asking to be remunerated for the two months' time which they were out of employ, for the alleged want of an appropriation by Congress. After a few remarks by Mr. MERRICK and Mr. GRUNDY for, and by Mr. HUBBARD against the petition, it was referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of John Ross, in behalf of certain Indian warriors, and praying pensions for them. Mr. D. also obtained leave for Mr. Ross to withdraw the papers heretofore presented on this subject.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, the Committee on Commerce were discharged from the further consideration of a great variety of subjects, the repeal of the act of March, 1837, buoys and a harbor in Delaware Bay, light-house on Brandywine Shoals, fog bells near Boston, etc.

EXTRA ALLOWANCES.

Mr. KNIGHT, from the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reported a resolution, proposing to make various extra allowances to the officers, messengers, and other attendants of the Senate.

Mr. FULTON having proposed to amend the resolution, by adding the Secretary, clerks, and various other officers employed in and about the Capitol, and discussion ensuing thereon—

Mr. LUMPKIN said: Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I consider it my duty to state that I do not consider myself in the slightest degree responsible for the report of the committee just made to the Senate. Indeed, sir, (said Mr. L.) I entirely dissent from that report. Moreover, sir, I feel it to be my duty to state that the report is directly adverse to the agreement and principles laid down by the committee, when in conference yesterday on this subject.

I have, sir, fully examined this subject, and have been surprised to find the loose and careless manner in which the contingent fund set apart for the expenses of the Senate is applied, so far as the payment of officers, messengers, and other persons in the employ of the Senate, is concerned. And whatever of impropriety there may be in this matter, I consider justly chargeable to the Senate, and to no one else. The officers, messengers, and others, in the employ of the Senate, have salaries and per diem pay, fixed either by law or resolution, which appears on your statute book, in plain and explicit terms; but, sir, this practice, now proposed to be continued, of giving extra allowance and gratuities, by the introduction of a resolution, at the close of each session of Congress, has wholly changed the real amount of salary and compensation received by these officers and messengers.

Their nominal pay, and real pay, is altogether different.

My desire was, and still is, to give to these persons a reasonable and adequate compensation for their services, and to fix and define that compensation by law, and leave nothing to the uncertainty and confusion of such a moment as the present. It is known to every Senator present that on the near approach of the adjournment of Congress, it is exceedingly difficult to obtain that due consideration and strict attention which is always desirable to a proper discharge of the important duty of fixing salaries, and appropriating the public money. I have no disposition to withhold from any person connected with the service of the Senate a just and equitable compensation; and I consider the most certain mode of ensuring this object, is to leave nothing to uncertainty. I consider my plan the best calculated to ensure the ends of justice, both to the Government and the individuals whose interests are involved in this subject. But, sir, I do protest against the practice of giving to salaried officers and per diem agents and messengers of the Government, extra allowances and gratuities. It is our duty to investigate and determine the value and amount of services rendered the Government by each officer and agent, and fix the compensation accordingly. We should not veil or mask appropriations of money in a vague or ambiguous manner. Salaries and compensation should be in reality what they appear to be. Under the system now in practice, in regard to the payment of persons in the employment of the Senate, it is difficult to ascertain what is the amount of pay of any one of these individuals.

From a paper which I now hold in my hand, and which exhibits the facts, names, and items, it may be seen, that the clerks, officers, messengers, and others, in the service of the Senate, from the 1st of December, 1838, to the 1st of December, 1839, inclusive, in every instance, not only received allowances for extra services, but gratuities of from two to three hundred dollars each—making an aggregate in gratuities of about five thousand dollars in one year to these persons. The principal clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate is allowed by law a salary of $1,800; yet, in the last year, he actually received $2,700. The Executive clerk's salary is $1,500; whereas he actually received $2,200. Four other clerks, whose salaries are $1,500 each, received, during the last year, $1,700 each. And in a similar proportion will be found the allowances made to the messengers, and others.

Mr. President, how can we justify this mode of distributing the public money? Sir, if you employ persons to do your own private work or business, do you not have some definite understanding upon the subject of wages? and when the work is completed, are you in the habit of seeking for pretexts and excuses to add to the pay and compensation of those who have done your work? Do you put your hand in your own private pocket, and hand out your money, by hundreds and thousands of dollars, as extra allowances, or gratuities? No, sir, none of us act thus in regard to our private concerns. How, then, can we justify ourselves in taking the money of our constituents for such purposes?

For myself, I can take no such liberty or latitude with the public purse. I repeat again, sir, that I am ready and disposed to give to each and every person employed by the Senate ample and adequate compensation. I entertain kind and respectful feelings to the whole of these persons. I have no complaint against any one of them. I have uniformly found them all disposed in a becoming manner to discharge their respective duties. I entertain kind feelings to these persons, in consideration of their uniform attention to every call which I have found it necessary to make for their services. My greatest objection to this annual call for extra allowances and gratuities, is mingled with mortification at the indelicacy of such discussions as we are now engaged in, while no consideration shall intimidate me from exposing what I consider improper practices in disbursing the public money. Yet I feel a becoming reluctance, when a faithful discharge of duty urges upon me the necessity of dwelling, as I am now doing, upon what I consider the abuses in any department of the public expenditures. I feel, sir, that the character and dignity of the Senate, as well as the respectability of the persons concerned in this investigation, should induce the Senate to fix definitely the amount of compensation, which may be deemed proper for every person in its employ; and hereafter avoid discussions on this subject of granting extra allowances and gratuities at the close of every session of Congress.

Mr. President, let us avoid this humiliating scramble for increase of pay. I am disposed to mete out justice to all, without special favor or partiality to any individual. If you continue these extra allowances for the present session, I protest against the proposition of extending it to one portion of the persons in your service, while you exclude another portion not less faithful and meritorious; and persons too, who are more important to the interest and service of the country, so far as the legislation of Congress is concerned.

Sir, I consider the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and the clerkships subordinate to, and connected with that office, of great importance to the country. It should never be held by any person, who is not possessed of high qualifications and character. It is an office, the duties of which cannot be well discharged by persons of ordinary qualifications. I am pleased to say, sir, that office, in all its branches, is discharged with great ability and fidelity to the public interest. I therefore, sir, feel great reluctance in lending my aid or sanction to any measure which may serve to discriminate between the present Secretary of the Senate and his clerks, and those persons who are in the subordinate employ of the Senate, to the disparagement of our Secretary or his clerks.

Sir, if the extra allowances are to be continued to most of the persons who are in the employ of the Senate, I will not consent to withholding from the Secretary and his clerks the same justice and liberality which we extend to all others.

Opposed as I am to the whole system and practice of extra pay, yet I will not consent to increase the evils of such a practice, by a partial application of liberality, which is calculated to disparage merit, and subject the Senate to the imputation of the exercise of a partial system of arbitrary favoritism.

Mr. President, it is the duty of the Senate to systematize this whole business. The duties of the Sergeant-at-arms and Doorkeeper, and of his assistant, with all their subordinates, ought to be defined, and their several compensations fixed by law. And, sir, should it be my lot again to have the duty assigned to me in part to attend to these matters, I shall persevere in my efforts to correct the evil of complexity which in many cases exists in regard to public expenditures. And if I am not connected with this service, I hope it may be confided to abler hands, and I shall content myself with having brought the subject to the attention of the Senate.

Messrs. KNIGHT, FULTON, GRUNDY, CLAY of Alabama, DAVIS, MERRICK, TALLMADGE, and CALHOUN, thought that the present period, at the close of a very protracted and arduous session, during which the officers of the Senate had distinguished themselves by fidelity to their duties, was an inauspicious time to commence reform in a practice heretofore sanctioned by the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 33, noes 7; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted—ayes 31, noes 8.

CHARTER OF WASHINGTON.

The bill to alter and continue the charter of the city of Washington having been read a third time,

Mr. NORVELL said, that he asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to propose an amendment which had been rendered necessary by the omission of a clause in copying the original charter. He had not, in reading over the manuscript copy, particularly compared it with the book containing the old charter. The fault was his in letting this error escape his detection He was bound to take it upon himself, because it was his duty to have been more particular in his examination of the copy. He believed, however, that the omission in transcribing, had been accidental. The omission related to the summary power vested in the corporation to punish servants or slaves in certain cases. He regretted the necessity of suspending the progress of the bill even for a moment; but if the Senate would consent to the proposed amendment, the bill would be at their disposition, and he should have discharged his duty.

Mr. N. then sent the following amendments to the Secretary's table:

In section 11 of the printed bill, line 67, after words "meetings of," insert "slaves;" after "mulattoes," insert "and to punish such slaves by whipping, not exceeding forty stripes."

In same section, line 98, after word "marriages," insert "to punish corporeally any colored servant or slave for a breach of any of their laws or ordinances, unless the owner or holder of such servant or slave shall pay the fine in such cases provided."

Mr. MERRICK would not object, if there was an understanding there should be no attempt to pass the bill; but he proceeded to remark on the great haste with which this bill had been pressed forward, in spite of the earnest remonstrances of himself, Mr. DAVIS, and others. After the bill was in this manner ordered to be engrossed, it was found that there was an extraordinary omission of a portion of the bill. Mr. M. made these remarks simply for the purpose of showing, a fortiori, that if so great and palpable an omission could get through the Senate in its hurry of proceeding, how much more might wrong, important, and intricate provisions thus get through without due consideration, even if they were discovered at all.

Mr. NORVELL said that the progress of the bill had been characterized by no haste, nor by any thing unusual. It had been printed and laid on our tables a month ago. He was astonished at the remark of the honorable Senator with regard to what he was pleased to call the extraordinary omission in the bill. Things of that kind often took place. No one could more deeply regret such an omission than he did on the present occasion, as it might afford a pretext for the postponement of the bill. But after the explanation which had passed between himself and the honorable Senator on the subject, he considered his remarks as uncalled for. No one who knew his sentiments could doubt the probity of his course on the point under consideration. The charge of indiscretion on the part of the Senate in its proceedings on the bill, was also entirely gratuitous. It was not founded in any correct view of the subject.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he was fearful that time enough did not remain to perfect the bill at this session, and to secure its passage in the other House. He was anxious for its success; and he hoped that no objection would be made to the amendment proposed by his friend from Michigan.

Mr. DAVIS objected to the reception of any amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then said, as the objection of any Senator was fatal to this bill in its present stage, he should have to move to lay it on the table. But he gave notice that early in the next session its friends would renew it, and endeavor to effect its passage.

The bill was laid on the table.

The bill to amend the act to grant certain relinquished and unappropriated lands to the State of Alabama for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee, Coosa, Cahawba, and Black Warrior rivers, having been read a third time,

It was discussed at some length by Messrs. GRUNDY, CLAY of Alabama, and CALHOUN, and, on motion of Mr. GRUNDY, laid on the table for further amendment at the next session.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. MERRICK, took up (by yeas 22, nays 13) the joint resolution to cede, on certain conditions, the stock of the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the State of Maryland.

Mr. MERRICK explained and advocated the resolution, remarking on the existing delay in the progress of the work, and urging the great desire of Maryland that it should be completed, and the probability, or rather certainty, that the United States would appropriate no more money, and could receive no profit from the work without such appropriation.

Mr. CALHOUN said it was too late in the session to act upon this bill, but, at the next session, Mr. C. would be in favor of a relinquishment by the Government of all rights of this kind.

Mr. MERRICK said Maryland was $7,000,000 in debt, and must lose the interest on this sum unless the canal should be completed. The interest of that sum for one year was to her very important, and if Congress should now pass this resolution, the Government of Maryland would forthwith convene the Legislature, they would comply with the terms, the completion of the work would be hastened, and Maryland saved from very heavy losses.

Messrs. TAPPAN, SMITH of Connecticut, WALKER, and ALLEN, spoke in favor of the immediate relinquishment of the stock by the United States, as that which would yield them no profit; and by them ought never to have been possessed.

Mr. BENTON was ready to act upon the question now: with him there was no reason for a postponement to the next session. His mind had long been directed to the character and progress of this canal. He was one of the few who voted against the United States subscription of a million of dollars to its stock fifteen years ago. He then thought the United States ought not to engage in the work, and he now thought they ought not to continue in it. As a general proposition, he thought it was wrong for the United States to engage in these undertakings; consequently, as a general proposition, he thought it right to get out of them. In this point of view, he had advocated all the propositions to sell out the United States stocks of all sorts, whether in a National Bank or a national road, or in canals. He had been in favor of selling the United States stock in the Bank of the United States; and that stock was sold in good time—when it was at 16 above par, instead of being, as it is now, at 30 below it. He had been in favor of ceding the Cumberland road to the States through which it passed; and the cession was made—not a sale, but a cession. He was in favor of dissolving the connection between the United States and all companies or corporations, and with all State undertakings. Acting on these general principles, he was in favor of dissolving the connection between the United States and the canal in question; and the only question was as to the terms. Does the joint resolution, said Mr. B. propose a cession, or a sale at the market price?

[Mr. MERRICK answered, it proposed a relinquishment of the interest of the United States in the canal to the State of Maryland, on certain conditions, &c.]

Mr. B. said he believed there was no practical difference between a sale and a relinquishment. If sold, it could only be at the market price; and if bought, it could only be by the State of Maryland. Now the market price, he presumed, was nothing. He supposed that, in the present condition of the canal, its stock would have no market value, and, therefore, that any attempt to make sale of the stock held by the United States would be nugatory and idle. If, therefore, it was desirable, as he believed it to be, for the United States to become disconnected from the work, he saw no way to do but to follow the policy adopted in the case of the Cumberland road, and make a cession. Mr. B. believed that there were several peculiar reasons for this cession in the present case. The United States had subscribed a million of dollars to the work, and thereby encouraged the State to go on with it, and to enlarge and augment it. This million was now worth nothing, and if it becomes valuable, it must be made so by expenditures and sacrifices on the part of Maryland; she must resuscitate it; for it was quite certain the United States would make no further subscription to it. He was, therefore, in favor of the cession. It will strengthen the State—it will encourage it—it will increase its inducements to prosecute the work. In our hands it is of no use to the United States, or to the State; in her hands it will be of some use to her immediately, and to the United States eventually.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, the bill for the issue of certain general land warrants was considered and ordered to be engrossed.

The joint resolution from the House, authorizing the sending of certain bills between the two Houses, was received and agreed to.

The joint resolution reported from the Committee on Public Buildings, to provide compensation for the stone cutters on the public buildings, was taken up, and, after being so amended as to include "other workmen," was ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK, the joint resolution ceding the stock of the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to Maryland, on certain conditions, was read a third time and passed.

The Senate then took up the bills from the House on the general orders and disposed of the same.

Mr. MERRICK now moved to take up the joint resolution which had been ordered to a second reading, chartering the banks of the District for one year, on condition of their paying specie, &c.

Mr. TAPPAN said he objected to taking up the time of the Senate, which could be more profitably employed than in discussing the chartering of broken banks. These institutions seemed determined not to take "No" for an answer, but had again thrust themselves forward to plague the Senate with their importunities. He thought it a very strange course of proceeding.

Mr. MERRICK said the subject had been fully discussed before, and he would not again trouble the Senate with any remarks. He was extremely desirous, for the sake of the interests of the people of this District, that the resolution should be passed on, and he really hoped the Senator from Ohio would not object to its being taken up and disposed of.

Mr. TAPPAN. I ask the yeas and nays on the proposition to take it up.

The yeas and nays being granted, there appeared for it 22, against it 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Grundy, Henderson, Knight, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Williams, and Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, and Wall—13.

Mr. ALLEN moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the bill which had been ordered to be engrossed and afterwards rejected by the Senate. [It made the stockholders liable, prevented the banks from paying other than their own notes, and provided for redeeming all their liabilities in specie, &c.]

Mr. MERRICK made an explanation in relation to the subject.

Mr. GRUNDY gave his reasons why he should feel himself bound to vote against the proposition of the Senator from Ohio. He regarded the whole as a mere temporary measure for the relief of the people of the District.

The question was debated by Messrs. ALLEN, SOUTHARD, and HENDERSON,

When the question was taken on the adoption of Mr. ALLEN's substitute, and decided in the negative: Yeas 9, nays 21—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, and Wright—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Huntington, King, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Porter, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Young—21.

Mr. TAPPAN here moved to strike out those sections in the bill relating to the restrictions of confining the power to issue notes to the banks.

Mr. T. made a long and able speech in favor of the principles of free banking, but the motion was lost by a very large majority.

Mr. ALLEN then moved to add a provision to the bill making stockholders liable for the debts of the banks.

On this proposition a long debate ensued, Mr. ALLEN contending for its propriety, and Mr. SOUTHARD denouncing it as unjust to make widows and others who were stockholders, liable beyond their contracts.

The question was here taken on Mr. ALLEN's motion, and negatives—yeas 13, nays 21.

The question was now taken on ordering the joint resolution to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, King, Merrick, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, and Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Norvell, Pierce, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—12.

Mr. WRIGHT asked to take up the bill from the House making appropriations for the support of the navy for the year 1840. Mr. W. said the House had thought proper to strike out the amendment of the Senate making an appropriation of $30,000 for the survey of the Southern coast from Appalachicola to the mouth of the Mississippi river, because it was prohibited by a rule of that body from attaching appropriations to any bill that had not been recommended by the Department.

The motion pending was, that the Senate recede from said amendment.

On this motion a very warm and animated discussion ensued, in which Messrs. HENDERSON, SOUTHARD, WALKER, and others, insisted that the Senate ought not to recede.

The debate lasted to a very late hour, when the question was taken on receding and decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Hubbard, Linn, Pierce, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Crittenden, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, King, Lumpkin, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Porter, Preston, Southard, Walker, Wall, and White—18.

The House bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department having been reported from the Committee on Finance without amendment, was read a third time and passed.

Mr. MERRICK moved that the joint resolution relating to the banks of the District have its third reading now.

Mr. ALLEN. I object. [The rule being imperative, the resolution could not be read.]

Mr. MERRICK asked to introduce a resolution suspending the 16th joint rule so far as to allow the resolution to be embraced under its provisions.

Mr. TAPPAN here objected, when

Mr. MERRICK gave notice of his intention to call the question up on Monday.

At a very late hour, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, July 18, 1840.

Mr. HOPKINS asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the CLERK of this House be and he is hereby authorized and requested to pay to each messenger and page in attendance on the House, the usual allowance for extra services.

Mr. McCLELLAN objected.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to suspend the rules, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS spoke of the immense labor which those pages and attendants had performed; and had read from the CLERK's table the following statement:

'I have the honor to transmit the following folding-room statement, in reply to your note of the 17th inst:

From the commencement of the session to April 1st, according to the best estimate I am able to make, there were folded, of papers of different kinds, at least - - - - -	800,000

The packages containing seeds, books, &c. will amount to about - -	20,000
There have been folded, sealed packages, which were extra documents ordered by the House, about -	70,000
Speeches, addresses, &c. since April 1st have amounted to - -	1,330,000
Supposed to have been folded in other parts of the Capitol, and at the members' rooms . - - -	250,000
	2,470,000

J. R. QUEEN.

[Of the above aggregate, the probability is that more than two-thirds were Whig documents—such as the life of Harrison, of four kinds, to be sent to the four sections of the United States, and Harrison pictorial almanacs; and Whig speeches in Congress.]

The question was then taken, and the rules were suspended.

Mr. HOPKINS moved the previous question on the adoption of the resolution; which received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. McCLELLAN called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; but they were not ordered; and the resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was read for the information of the House, and was in substance as follows, viz: that the Committee of Elections be authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to J. M. Carlisle, clerk to said committee, per diem allowance at the rate of $5 per day for his services.

Mr. CAMPBELL stated, in reply to an inquiry, that the clerk was now allowed $4 per day; but, owing to his arduous duties, the committee thought him entitled to a larger sum.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved to suspend the rules to admit the resolution.

Mr. PETRIKIN called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 34, nays 99. So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was read for the information of the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House pay to Messrs. Ayerigg, Maxwell, Halstead, Stratton, and Yorke, the same compensation per diem and mileage that is allowed to members of Congress, computing the per diem from the commencement of the session until the 7th day of July instant.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected.

Mr. SMITH said it was the usual resolution, and he moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to submit it, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 81, nays 59.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. RAMSEY asked the general consent of the House to submit the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House pay to Charles J. Ingersoll the same compensation per diem and mileage that is allowed to members of Congress, computing the per diem from the commencement of the session until the 17th of July instant.

Objection having been made,

Mr. RAMSEY moved that the rules be suspended to enable him to submit the resolution, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 49, nays 86.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. ADAMS asked that the House would agree to take up the bill of this House, originally reported from the Committee on Manufactures, which had been returned from the Senate, with amendments, entitled, "An act to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws regulating the collection of duties on imports," for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to consider those amendments.

Mr. A. said the bill had been passed by both Houses by a large majority, and he did not believe it would occupy the committee five minutes.

Mr. PETRIKIN objected to the motion, as being out of order.

Mr. ADAMS repeated that his only object was to have the bill and amendments referred to the committee.

Mr. PETIKIN withdrew his objection; and

Mr. CRABB renewed it.

Mr. ADAMS moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to make the motion above indicated.

Mr. CRABB demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, having been taken, were—yeas 90, nays 64.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. J. W. JONES moved to suspend the rules, and that the House would resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TILLINGHAST said this was private bill day, and he hoped the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would not press his motion, but that he would withdraw it, and thereby enable the House to consider the private bills.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked the general consent of the House to consider the motion he submitted a few days ago, for printing 5,000 extra copies of the report of the Select Committee upon the subject of steam boilers. The document was now in type, and, unless the printing was ordered immediately, it would cost double as much at another time.

Mr. R. GARLAND objected. There had been an extra quantity of these documents printed last year, some of which were on hand.

Mr. U. did not press the motion to print.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The question pending was the amendment to the bill appropriating $35,327 for carrying into effect a provision of the treaty of New Echota, in 1835, in reference to the removal of the Indians.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS inquired of the CHAIR whether the amendment was in order.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment was in order.

Mr. RUSSELL said the appropriation was not authorized by existing law, and that it was for the satisfaction of a mere private claim; and he appealed from the decision of the CHAIR.

Mr. JONES of Virginia explained that it had been called for from the War Department, as necessary to carry into effect the treaty which had been ratified.

A debate ensued, in which Messrs. RUSSELL, TILLINGHAST, EVERETT, COOPER of Ga. THOMPSON of South Carolina, and EVANS, participated, in opposition to the decision of the CHAIR and to the propriety of the amendment, and by Messrs BANKS, BROWN of Tennessee, and WATTERSON.

The question was taken, and the decision of the CHAIR was reversed.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Alabama proposed an amendment appropriating $1,126 for the payment of the claim of a company of Alabama volunteers, ordered out under Capt. Snodgrass of Alabama, to aid in the removal of the Indians.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina said the claim had received the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question of order was raised; when it was ascertained that a bill was pending before the House for the payment of this claim, and, in consequence,

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order.

On motion of Mr. MARVIN, the committee then rose and reported the bill to the House; and the question being on concurring in the amendments of the committee, and reading the bill a third time,

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved the previous question, which received a second, was put, and carried.

Several amendments of the committee having been concurred in, and the question being on concurring in the amendment appropriating $10,175 for the payment of balances due on account of the removal of the Creek Indians, was disagreed to.

The question being on concurring with the committee in the amendment, in the following words, viz:

For payment of the claim presented by the Alabama Emigrating Company, and allowed by the accounting officers, $38,646;

Mr. L. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 79, nays 66.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The question was then put, that the House do concur in the eighth amendment of the committee to said bill, which is as follows:

For expenses attending the removal of the Winnebago Indians from their present residence in Wiskonsin to the neutral ground across the Mississippi river, estimating the number at 4,500, to cost $10 each, $45,000.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays on concurring; which were ordered, and were —yeas 81, nays 57.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The question now being on concurring in the ninth amendment of the Committee of the Whole House to said bill, in the following words:

Insert in the bill the following item: "To carry into effect the treaty of the 3d of September, 1839, with the Stockbridge and Maumee tribe of Indians, ratified the 16th May, 1840, $32,265 40;"

Mr. BARNARD demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 77, nays 57.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The question being now on concurring with the committee in the 10th amendment, in the following words, viz: Add to the bill the following words: "For holding a treaty with the Cherokee Indians, including all the different interests and divisions which exist among them, upon the basis of their right to adopt any form of Government which they or a majority of them may think proper; to elect their own officers or chiefs; and establish any law or regulations which they may deem best for their welfare and happiness, provided that they do not conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States, applicable to their affairs, $5,000;

Mr. BOYD demanded the yeas and nays; which having been ordered, were—yeas 60, nays 77.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and having been engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved to amend the title so as to read "A bill to encourage hostilities with the Cherokee Indians," but subsequently withdrew his motion.

Mr. R. GARLAND and Mr. STANLY warned the House that, unless a different course were pursued in rejecting the amendment proposed by Mr. BELL as above, bloodshed would ensue, and war be kindled up along our Southwestern frontier.

Mr. STANLY, under this conviction, moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had been passed.

The motion was sustained by Mr. W. THOMPSON and Mr. CROSS of Arkansas, in very earnest speeches, appealing to the House against the responsibility it incurred by refusing this pitiful amount of $5,000, at the imminent hazard of an Indian war

Mr. STANLY withdrew his motion.

Mr. CROSS renewed it.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved the previous question; which was seconded, put, and carried; when the reconsideration was negatived by yeas and nays as follows: yeas 71, nays 74.

On motion of Mr. ATHERTON, the joint rule of the two Houses which forbids bills being sent from one House to the other during the last three days of the session, was suspended in relation to the Indian bill, the bill for the military academy, for fortifications, for mileage, and for all territorial bills.

On motion of Mr. PICKENS, the House went into Committee of the Wole on the state of the Union, (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair,) and took up for consideration the bill appropriating $25,000 for the expenses of the exploration and survey of the Northeastern boundary of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS moved an amendment to include the establishment of four stations for meteorological and geological observations. He explained the object of the amendment, and argued in its favor, but it was rejected.

Mr. PICKENS moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana hoped the committee would not rise, but that the bill would be laid aside in order to be reported, and that the committee would agree to take up Senate bill 141, entitled An act to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected by her for that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal which lies between Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes. Mr. D. was going on to show the great importance of the bill to the State of Indiana, but was arrested by

The CHAIR, who stated that the question must first be put on rising, before the gentleman's motion could be entertained.

The question was then taken on the motion that the committee rise, which was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly reported to the House.

Mr. ADAMS then renewed his amendment to the bill which was rejected in committee, in the following words, viz:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of twenty thousand dollars be, and the same are hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the establishment of five several stations, at suitable distances from each other, for making observations of terrestial magnetism and meteorology for three years; the said sum to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for the fulfilment of those purposes; he to account for the expenditure thereof to the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. A. wished to have his vote recorded in favor of the amendment, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

After a few remarks by Messrs. ADAMS and STANLY,

Mr. DAVIS moved the previous question on the bill and amendment, which received a second; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question being first on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. ADAMS,

Mr. KEIM called for the reading of the amendment; which having been done,

Mr. KEIM moved to amend it by striking out the word "are," and insert the word "is," instead.

[This motion, on the part of Mr. KEIM, caused a great deal of merriment. It will be recollected that, a few days ago, Mr. ADAMS entered into a criticism of the diction and grammar of the report of Mr. KEIM on the militia, and this motion to correct the grammatical error of Mr. A. was considered a fair hit. Mr. A. responded in relation to this error, that it was the same principle of construction as the sentence "that our sufferings 'is' intolerable."

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. A. and disagreed to—yeas 34, nays 96.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

The House then, at 2½ o'clock, took its usual recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. JONES moved that the naval appropriation bill, as amended by the Senate, be taken up, with a view of considering the said amendments.

The several amendments having been read by the Clerk,

Mr. JONES said he hoped there would be no objection to the immediate consideration of the amendments.

Mr. ANDREWS said he had no objection to the bill; but he did object to going on without a quorum.

Mr. JONES replied that he did not desire to proceed without a quorum, and, after some conversational debate, Mr. J. agreed to withdraw his motion until a quorum should appear.

Mr. ADAMS asked leave to take up the bill to ensure the more faithful execution of the revenue laws, as amended by the Senate.

Mr. HOLMES objected, and the bill was not taken up.

In the mean time, while the Senate's amendments were read, Mr. LINCOLN wished the time occupied, till a quorum should appear, in receiving the reports of committees to whom Senate bills had been referred.

After a desultory conversation,

The question was put on Mr. JONES's motion, and the votes were—ayes 67, noes 20. No quorum voting.

Mr. LINCOLN moved a call of the House which was ordered. Ninety-six members responded to their names.

The absentees having been called, 122 members were found to be present.

Mr. JONES moved to dispense with further proceedings in the call, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa made a strenuous effort to get territorial business taken up. He raised a question of order, that inasmuch as the House on the 8th inst. by a vote of two-thirds, set apart the first day after the passage of the appropriation bills, for the consideration of territorial business, to take precedence over all other business, the motion to consider amendments of Senate to bill No. 6 was not in order, and the first order of the day was on territorial business, seeing that the appropriation bills had been passed.

The SPEAKER decided that the appropriation bills could not be considered as passed as long as they were pending by amendments or otherwise; and that consequently the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] was in order.

From this decision Mr. CHAPMAN appealed, and debated that appeal, showing what injustice would be done the Territory if the business he proposed was not taken up.

After a few remarks by Mr. W. C. JOHNSON on the appeal—

Mr. RAMSEY moved the previous question on the appeal, which received a second, and the main question was by order put, and the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

And the question recurring on Mr. JONES's motion to take up the Navy bill and amendments, it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES moved that the House do concur in all the amendments of the Senate; and on that question he demanded the previous question.

Mr. R. GARLAND remonstrated.

But Mr. JONES refused to withdraw the motion.

Mr. R. GARLAND moved a call of the House.

On this motion Mr. L. WILLIAMS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered and taken, and resulted as follows—yeas 44, nays 82.

So the House refused to order a call.

The previous question was seconded, and carried by yeas and nays as follows—yeas 78, nays 54.

The main question then recurring on concurring in the amendments of the Senate, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. R. GARLAND asked that the question be divided, and put on each amendment separately.

The question being put on the following amendment of the Senate,

"Provided, That no more of the several appropriations last mentioned for the improvement and repair of the navy yards shall be expended previous to the 4th day of March next, than shall be found by the Secretary of the Navy, upon inquiries made for the purpose, to be absolutely necessary for the preservation of the public works, the security of the public property, and the preservation of the public business at the respective yards."

The yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. R. GARLAND, were taken, and resulted as follows: yeas 93, nays 62. So this amendment was concurred in.

The next question was on concurring with the Senate in the following amendment:

Strike out of the second section the words, "a violation of existing contracts, and insert, "impairing the ability of the Navy Department to make payment under existing circumstances prior to the 4th day of March, 1841."

The question on concurring in the above amendment was agreed to by yeas 91, nays 51.

The question was next on concurring with the Senate in the following amendments, viz:

Strike out from the second section of the bill, "which provided for reimbursing the fund for the gradual improvement of the navy, which had been authorized to be expended in building steamships," and insert the following:

"And the residue of the said sum of $340,000 shall be, and is hereby, appropriated, and shall be paid of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The question was taken on concurring with the Senate in the above amendment, and agreed to—yeas 93, nays 49.

The question now being on concurring with the Senate in striking out the sixth section of the bill in the words following:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $60,000 be and the same is hereby appropriated out of money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for the preparation and commencement of the third steam vessel of war, authorized by an act of March 3d, 1839, in addition to any materials which may be on hand suitable to such vessels."

The question was taken, and the above amendment was concurred in—yeas 84, nays 54.

The question was next on concurring with the Senate in the seventh amendment, viz: Strike out from the seventh section of the bill, which reappropriates unexpended balances of former appropriations the following item: "For the purchase of a site and the construction of a dry dock for the naval service in the harbor of New York, as authorized by the act of March 3d, 1835—$95,063 61."

The question was taken, and the amendment concurred in.

The question was next on concurring with the Senate in the following amendment as an additional section to the bill, viz:

"SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated from any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for the immediate survey of the coast from Appalachicola bay to the mouth of the Mississippi river, for the ascertainment of the practicability of establishing a navy yard and naval station, which shall best subserve the protection of the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, the sum of $30,000 to be taken from the appropriation already made for the survey of the coast of the United States."

The question was taken on concurring in the above amendment, and it was disagreed to—yeas 64, nays 89.

Mr. JONES moved to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which motion prevailing, the House went into committee accordingly, (Mr. CLIFFORD in the chair,) and took up the Senate's amendments to the army appropriation bill.

A discussion arose on an item in these amendments for the outfit of a Charge to Texas, as being incongruous to the character of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS raised the question whether the Senate should send amendments such as were not permitted by the rules of the House; this subjected every member of the House to the will and power of the Senate; against which he protested.

The CHAIR deciding the amendments to be in order,

Mr. ADAMS took an appeal; which was argued by Messrs BANKS, ADAMS, EVANS, BRIGGS, RAMSEY, and FILLMORE, and finally withdrawn.

The amendment was concurred in.

Another discussion arose on an amendment allowing for the outfit of a Minister resident at Constantinople, in which Messrs. EVANS, STANLY, PICKENS, McKAY, RAMSEY, DELLET, CRAIG, PROFFIT, and TILLINGHAST participated.

When, the question being taken, the vote was—ayes 46, noes 49. [No quorum voting.]

The question was taken by tellers, and resulted as follows—ayes 58, noes 49.

No quorum voting, the committee rose and reported the fact to the House.

[It was now a quarter past 8.]

Mr. TRIPLETT moved a call of the House.

It was suggested that a quorum was present; whereupon

The SPEAKER counted the House, and reported that 108 members were present.

The call was then ordered—ayes 62, noes 59.

But it being discovered by the vote that a quorum was present, the call was dispensed with.

The House having returned to committee—

The subject of the outfit to Commodore Porter was resumed.

Mr. PICKENS explained.

Mr. LEWIS WILLIAMS opposed the appropriation.

And it was further discussed by Messrs. GRAVES, DAWSON, and MONROE.

A communication from the Senate was received, announcing the passage of certain resolutions, one relating to the transfer of certain stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the State of Maryland, and the other to the pay of workmen.

Mr. JENIFER pressed for having this taken up, but Mr. GRAVES objecting, the House returned into committee, and resumed the subject of discussion, which was debated by Messrs. RANDOLPH, McKAY, CUSHING, GRAVES, and PICKENS, when, the question being taken, the amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

The next item was for certain repairs in the custom-house at Philadelphia, $3,200.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana moved to amend this item by adding $10,000 for completing the construction of the Mint at New Orleans.

Mr. JONES considered this amendment as not within the rules of the House.

The CHAIR deciding it out of order,

Mr. GARLAND of Louisiana took an appeal.

But, after some discussion, the decision of the CHAIR was sustained: ayes 75, noes not counted.

The Senate's amendment was then concurred in.

The next item was for running the boundary line of Iowa Territory, $1,096, and it was concurred in.

Several other amendments having been concurred in without debate, the following additional section to the bill was next taken up:

And be it further enacted, That in case of a deficiency of receipts of revenue from customs or lands, or other sources, or of a failure on the part of the late deposite banks, or of the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, to pay the debts due from them, or to become due in the course of the present year, or if from any other cause the means of the Treasury shall not be sufficient to meet all the appropriations made by Congress, the President of the United States shall be authorized to postpone the expenditures under the following heads of appropriation in this act, viz: For barracks, quarters, and storehouses, &c.; for the national armories; for armament of fortifications; for the current expenses of the ordnance service; for ordnance stores and supplies; for arsenals; for repairs and improvements at the Springfield armory; for repairs and improvements at the Harper's Ferry armory; for the purchase of saltpetre and brimstone; for continuing the barracks, quarters, &c. at Fort Leavenworth, at Fort Wayne, at Fort Smith, at Plattsburgh, and at Fort Jesup, or such and so many of them, or such proportions of each, as in his judgment, after a careful examination and inquiry, the condition of the Treasury shall demand; such postponements to be merely temporary, or until the close of the next session of Congress, as the Treasury will warrant, &c.

Mr. BARNARD inquired how much the appropriations amounted to which the Executive was thus allowed to postpone?

Mr. JONES said he could not tell at the moment with perfect accuracy, but he believed the amount to be about $1,200,000.

A debate arose, in which Messrs. BARNARD, CALHOUN of Massachusetts, PROFFIT, WADDY THOMPSON, MORGAN, and EVERETT opposed the amendment, and Mr. SMITH of Indiana advocated it; when

Mr. BRIGGS, adverting to the fact that it was now near 12 o'clock, and expressing his hope that the House would respect the Sabbath, moved that the committee rise.

The motion prevailed, and the committee rose accordingly, and reported progress.

And then the House, at five minutes before 12 o'clock, adjourned.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, July 20, 1840.

The following resolutions were submitted, considered by consent, and agreed to:

By Mr. BENTON: A call on the Secretary of the Treasury for a statement, at the commencement of the next session, of the annual and total amount of goods imported from each foreign State since the 30th of September, 1833.

By Mr. CALHOUN: A call on the President, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to present to the Senate, at the commencement of the next session, the correspondence and documents with any of the British authorities in regard to certain allegations against Mr. Consul Trist, in connection with the slave trade.

By Mr. DAVIS: A call on the President for a copy of the report of Captain Perry, of the United States navy, on lights and light-houses, to be sent to the Secretary of the Senate, and to be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motions by Messrs. WRIGHT, WALKER, ROBINSON, WALL, LINN, YOUNG, and DAVIS, the Committees on Finance, Public Lands, Post Office and Post Roads, the Judiciary, Indian Affairs, Roads and Canals, and on Commerce, were respectively discharged from the further consideration of all subjects on which they had not already reported.

On motion by Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, the bill for the relief of the owners and crew of the schooner Buffalo was indefinitely postponed.

A resolution making the whole amount of the salary of the postmaster of the Senate $1,000, was debated at some length, and agreed to by yeas 25, nays 10.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The joint resolution to revive and continue as they were the charters of the banks in the District of Columbia, till March 4, 1841, on condition of their resuming and continuing specie payments, having been read a third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. ALLEN moved to recommit the resolution, with instructions to substitute for it the bill lately rejected by the Senate on this subject. This motion was negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Huntington, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Tallmadge, White, Young—23.

Mr. ALLEN now moved to recommit the bill, with instructions to make all stockholders in the banks subject to all liabilities of the banks to the amount of their stock respectively. If the resolution was passed in its present shape it would exhibit the humiliating spectacle of the Senate passing a law which was sent here by the banks in the shape of a memorial—the only difference between the memorial and the law being that in place of the signature of the President of one of these banks, there would be that of the President of the United States, and in the place of the signatures of the Presidents the two other banks, would be that of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. To avoid this humiliating spectacle he submitted the motion to recommit the bill for the purpose of amendment.

The motion was negatived—ayes 14, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wall, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Huntington, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, Tallmadge, White, and Young—23.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, his chief purpose, throughout the whole time which had been occupied in the discussion of this subject, was to grant these banks all proper indulgence for a limited period, but to render it absolutely certain that they should be compelled to wind up their affairs, under the provisions of the act which we had passed for that purpose. This latter was his main object. He had, on a former occasion, stated his reasons at length why these six little banks should not be permanently rechartered within this District of ten miles square, under any circumstances, and why another bank, or banks, under proper restrictions, should be substituted in their stead. He feared that the present resolution would interfere with this principle. It enabled the banks to delay their resumption of specie payments, until the very day before the 4th of March next, if they thought proper, and then, upon resumption, they were to be restored immediately to all their banking privileges. No reference whatever was made in this resolution to the law now in existence for winding up these institutions; and whether this law was not altogether repealed by the resolution, might be a serious question. In any event, these banks would come here before the 4th of March next, having all resumed specie payments, in obedience to your resolution, on some day, however distant, previous to that time, and ask, almost as a matter of right, for an extension of their charters. He desired that this resolution might pass, on the express condition that, after the 4th of March next, they should immediately commence winding up their affairs, and that they might have no pretext whatever to claim any further extension of their privileges from Congress. He proposed the following amendment, and said that, under all the circumstances of the case, if this should prevail, he would vote for the resolution:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to relieve the said banks or either of them from the provisions of the act entitled "an act to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia for certain purposes," approved July 3d, 1840; but they and each of them shall proceed to wind up their affairs under the said act, immediately after the said fourth day of March next.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama hoped no one would object, as such was the actual intention of the friends of the resolution.

Mr. TAPPAN said that for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Senate of the United States would pass a law for the benefit of the banks of the District, in the precise terms prescribed by those banks, he would avail himself of every legal privilege to prevent any alteration in its form. He therefore objected to the amendment.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama desired that it might be particularly noticed that this objection came from no man who wished to continue these banks at all, on any conditions.

Mr. TAPPAN thought there would be no difficulty in ascertaining the position he occupied in relation to these banks.

Mr. BUCHANAN's amendment could not be considered without recommitment, which was not moved.

The resolution was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Norvell, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Wright—13.

Mr. ALLEN moved to amend the title of the resolution by calling it a resolution to charter six banks in the District of Columbia. Negatived without a count.

Mr. BUCHANAN said his object would, in some degree, be accomplished by amending the title. He moved, therefore, to strike out the present title of the resolution and insert the following:

"A resolution supplementary to the act entitled 'an act to continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia for certain purposes,' approved July 3d 1840;" which was unanimously adopted.

On motion of Mr. MERRICK, the sixteenth joint rule was suspended, on the part of the Senate, in regard to this joint resolution, and it was sent to the other House for concurrence.

Mr. ALLEN moved the printing of the bank memorial on this subject, to show, as he said, that the Senate had humbled itself so much as to pass this measure under bank dictation, and in the very form which the banks prescribed.

Mr. MERRICK said it differed in several particulars.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said the memorial would show that the banks came here as humble petitioners, and he therefore desired to have it printed as much as any body.

The printing of the memorial was accordingly ordered without dissent.

NAVY APPROPRIATIONS.

A message was received from the House, announcing that the House insisted on its rejection of the amendment of the Senate, (an appropriation of $30,000 for a survey on the Gulf of Mexico, and asking a conference by a joint committee, the House having appointed the committee on their part.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate futher insisted on its amendment, and agred to a conference, authorizing the President pro. tem. to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate.

The bill from the House, to refund certain duties paid by John M. Jacquelin, an importing merchant at New York, was discussed at some length by Messrs. RUGGLES, HUBBARD, DAVIS, CALHOUN, and WRIGHT, and laid on the table without dissent, on the ground, alleged by Mr. WRIGHT, that the Committee on Finance had at this session rejected all claims of this kind.

On motion of Mr. WALL, a Senate resolution, relating to Colt's firearms, (very indistinctly heard,) was taken up, debated, and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the joint resolution authorizing the purchase of Colt's repeating rifle for the use of the navy, was taken up, discussed, amended, so as to extend to other rifles, and ordered to a third reading by yeas 16, nays 12.

A message was received from the President of the United States, with a report from the Commissioner on Indian Affairs, in pursuance of a Senate resolution, relating to the purchases of Indian lands since the establishment of the Government. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted a resolution, calling on the Secretary of the Navy for information as to the protection afforded and intended to be afforded to the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. WRIGHT objected, and observed that if the resolution proposed only to inquire into what had been actually done by the Navy Department, he would agree to it; but he could not consent to call on the Secretary to inform the Senate what order was contemplated by the Department.

Mr. HUBBARD observed that if the gentleman would address a letter himself to the Secretary of the Navy, he would answer for it that he would get a satisfactory answer.

So the resolution was laid over for one day.

The bill for the support of the army for the year 1840, was received from the House of Representatives, stating that the House had agreed to all the amendments of the Senate, with the exception of the second and fifth, viz: the appropriation of six thousand dollars for an outfit to the resident Minister at Constantinople, and the appropriation of twelve thousand dollars for the purchase of an island at the confluence of the St. Peters and Mississippi rivers.

Mr. WRIGHT reported back this bill from the Committee on Finance, observing that the nature of these amendments had been understood by the Senate, having been debated at some length on the previous evening. He felt constrained to move that the Senate recede from the amendments; they were not pertinent to the bill, and had been stricken out by the House, after a long and animated debate. He hoped, therefore, the Senate would recede from its amendments, and suffer the bill to become a law.

Mr. WALKER hoped the Senate would not recede. He thought not to comply with the contract for the purchase of the island might be attended with consequences injurious to our interests and our relations with the Sioux Indians. Important, however, as was this amendment, yet it was not as much so, in his estimation, as the outfit to Commodore Porter. The services of that gallant and distinguished man were known to every Senator, and was the American Senate prepared to make him the only exception to an outfit? He hoped not, and that the Senate would not recede. He thought there was nothing to be apprehended for the bill, and, in any event, a conference might be had as the last resort.

Mr. WRIGHT was not aware that there was any ground of compromise by the conference. Where could they point out a middle ground on which to stand? The amendments must be passed or rejected—and one or the other House must yield! The simple question was, whether the Senate should recede from its amendments, or, by adhering to them, send the bill back to the House at this late hour. He could see no good object likely to follow a disagreement with the other branch, as he thought it would not be likely to yield.

Mr. DAVIS agreed with the Senator from New York that the Senate ought to recede from its amendments. Neither of them were matters of such great moment, as should induce them to run the risk of delaying or defeating the bill. He presumed a delay of a few months could work no great injury to Commodore Porter, and as there appeared a general feeling on the part of the Senate to vote the appropriation, he thought the matter could then be postponed until the next session, and the Senate at once recede from its amendment. There was no ground for compromise on which committees of conference could act.

Mr. HUBBARD said, by the rules of the Senate, if the bill was not signed by 12 o'clock, it could not become a law: the rule was positive that no bill should receive the sanction of the President on the last day of the session: and who could suppose that the bill could go back to the other House and be received here by that time? Besides, there was no sort of probability that the matter could be compromised, and it was safer and better at once for the Senate to yield.

Mr. WALKER insisted there was ground of compromise, and he would suggest a very fair one at once: they could abandon one, appropriate and retain the other: this would be giving the House one item, and the Senate one; and he was disposed to abandon the island and adhere to the outfit. [Mr. WRIGHT, in an under tone, "I am for the island."] Mr. W. then spoke of the justice of placing Com. P. on the same footing with other diplomatic agents, and the vast expense to which he has been subjected when acting as Charge. Mr. W. thought there was no occasion to abandon either of the appropriations—the Senate ought to adhere to both.

Mr. HUBBARD read the vote in the House to show that it was decisive, and that there was little chance that that body would yield: the vote on the outfit was 54 ayes, 84 noes, and on the purchase of the island 44 ayes, 99 noes.

Mr. WALKER then contended that the outfit stood on the strongest ground, and that the island was voted down by two to one.

Mr. BUCHANAN would not rob Peter to pay Paul. He had introduced the amendment granting the outfit; but, if there was to be any sacrifice, he would prefer that the appropriation for the island should be retained. And he declared in his place that very serious consequences might grow out of the refusal to conform to the contract as made by the Secretary of War.

Mr. PRESTON said, when the subject was discussed at a prior session, he had suggested an outfit, but that suggestion did not seem to have been backed at the time by the friends of the measure. It was said that Commodore Porter came here for the purpose of being made a resident Minister. It was then said by some of the friends of the movement that he only desired advanced rank, by which he could approach the person of the Sultan, as other ministers had the privilege of doing. The advanced rank was given, and with it the additional salary, and nothing further was said. With regard to the island, there was some doubt about the title, and the compensation for it was four times too much; nay, he might say, ten times too much.

Mr. BUCHANAN said the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] was much mistaken in his estimate of the value of this island; and if he had examined the documents on the subject which had been presented to the Senate when he was absent from his seat, his opinions of its value would have been very different.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana gave his reasons for voting in favor of receding. It was not from any objection to the outfit, for which he had voted on another occasion.

The vote was then taken on receding, and decided in the affirmative as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Henderson, Hubbard, Huntington, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Porter, Preston, Robinson, Smith of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tappan, Wall, White, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Linn, Norvell, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Walker, and Young—9.

The question was then taken on receding from the other amendment, and carried without a count.

Mr. SOUTHARD submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to publish monthly the number and date of all Treasury notes issued or redeemable in pursuance of any of the provisions of the laws now in force, and also the number and amount of all drafts upon the agents of the Treasury, and the amount outstanding and unsatisfied, specifying, in regard to both notes and drafts, the number and amount of each under the sum of $100; also under $200, and for every additional hundred.

Mr. SOUTHARD asked to have it considered, but it having been objected to, it was ordered to lie over one day.

Mr. MERRICK submitted the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate at the next session, a statement showing what portion of the public lands have been subject to entry at private sale for 5 years and less than 10 years; for 10 and less than 15; for 15 and less than 20; for 20 and less than 25; for 25 and less than 30; for 30 and less than 35; and for 35 and upwards, designating the States and Territories and land districts in which said lands are situate; and what quantity of land has been entered after it had been subject to entry at private sale 35 years and upwards, and within what years, and within what land district said land was entered.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared and transmitted to the Senate, in the first week of the next session of Congress, a statement of the number and value of the public lots in the city of Washington given by Congress to citizens and charitable institutions, and what rule was adopted in selecting and valuing such lots; also, of such as have been sold and otherwise disposed of since the passage of the act to enlarge the powers of the several corporations of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, showing the authority under which sales and dispositions of the public lots have been made, the means of making such sale, the number of lots and squares disposed of, the time of sale, the price per foot at which, and the name of the person or persons to whom, each lot was sold, the amount of proceeds arising from such sales, to what purpose applied, the authority for such application, and the amount, if any, remaining in hand.

Several other bills of a private nature were voted on, and the Senate, after taking an Executive session, adjourned at twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, July 20, 1840.

After the journal had been read,

Mr. RAMSEY, on leave, offered a resolution making extra allowance to sundry officers of the House, and demanded the previous question upon it, which was seconded, put, and carried. And the main question being on the adoption of the resolution, the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 38, nays 141. So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. TOLAND moved to reconsider the vote just taken, in order that the resolution might be modified so as not to include in the extra allowances the salaried officers of the House.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to lay the motion on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted as follows: Yeas 91, nays 62.

So the motion to reconsider the resolution was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the House took up the Senate's amendments to the Navy appropriation bill.

Mr. EVANS moved that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, (viz: for the survey of the Apalachicola bay, in reference to the establishment of a naval station,) and appoint a committee of conference. Mr. ADAMS moved that the House adhere. Mr. JAMESON, that the House recede from its disagreement; and he demanded the previous question; which was seconded, put, and carried, and the question being on receding, it was decided by yeas and nays as follows, viz: Yeas 80, nays 91.

So the House refused to recede.

Mr. ADAMS withdrawing his motion to adhere, and the question recurring on the motion to insist upon the disagreement, it was agreed to; and a committee of conference was ordered to be appointed.

The following private bills on the Speaker's table having been returned from the Senate with sundry amendments, were taken up, and the amendments were concurred in, viz:

An act for the relief of Thompson and Boggs, and Robert and Thomas Hutcherson, and others;

An act for the relief of Gilbert A. Smith and Nathan Stark;

An act for the relief of William Marbury, of Louisiana;

An act for the relief of the sureties and heirs of Melancton W. Bostwick, deceased, &c.;

An act granting a pension to the heirs of Leonard Smith;

An act for the relief of Thomas Latham;

An act for the relief of Thomas Bennett;

The following bill was then then taken up, the question being on concurring in an amendment of the Senate:

An act to continue in force the first section of an act entitled "An act to extend the time of fulfilling Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office."

Mr. CRAIG, who was entitled to the floor, moved the previous question on coucurring in the Senate's amendment.

Mr. L. WILLIAMS objected to the consideration of this bill out of its order; the consequence was, that the bill failed.

Mr. JONES moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the Senate's amendments to the army appropriation bill at half past two o'clock, (unless sooner reported.)

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 120, nays 44.

Mr. JONES afterwards modified his motion so as to take up the bill in the House at 4 o'clock. On the resolution thus modified, he demanded the previous question, which was seconded, put, and carried, and the main question being on adopting the resolution, the yeas and nays were demanded, but the House refused to order them. The resolution was then carried—ayes 111, noes 31.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLIFFORD in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question pending was on the amendment of Mr. EVERETT to the amendment of the Senate, restricting the action of the President in suspending certain appropriations in the bill, so as to require him to pursue the order in which the appropriation stands in the bill.

After some brief explanations by Messrs. PROFFIT, and SMITH of Indiana, in relation to some remarks by the latter on Saturday,

Mr. STANLY took the floor, and made some remarks in relation to the state of the Treasury.

He was followed by Messrs. BELL, WISE, CUSHING, TILLINGHAST, DAVIS of Kentucky, and BARNARD, when the question being taken on the amendment of Mr. EVERETT, it was rejected—ayes 32, noes 57.

No quorum having voted, tellers were demanded, and the vote being taken, stood as follows: ayes 55, noes 76.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to amend the amendment of the Senate by striking out so much of it as authorized the suspension of appropriations for the Springfield and Harper's Ferry armories.

Mr. COST JOHNSON made some brief remarks in support of the amendment.

The question then being put on the amendment of Mr. CALHOUN, resulted—ayes 33, noes 64; no quorum; and the hour of 2½ o'clock having arrived,

The House took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After the recess, there being no quorum present,

Mr. LINCOLN suggested that, until a quorum appeared, the standing committees should be permitted to report Senate bills referred to them.

Some desultory conversation arose, when Mr. L. said he would not press the subject.

A quorum having soon arrived,

On motion of Mr. JONES, the House proceeded to execute the order by which it had been directed that, at 4 o'clock, the House should resume the consideration of the

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question pending was on concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. JONES moved the previous question; which was seconded, put and carried.

The main question on agreeing with the amendments was then divided, and put successively on the several amendments separately.

On that allowing an outfit of $6,000 to the Minister resident at Constantinople, the yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, were—yeas 54, nays 84. So the House refused to concur.

On the next amendment for the purchase of an island in the Mississippi, at the confluence of the St. Peters, near Fort Snelling, the yeas and nays were ordered, and were—yeas 49, nays 100. So the amendment was not concurred in.

On the last amendment (which empowers the President to suspend a certain amount of the appropriations, in case of a deficiency of receipts from customs, lands, etc. or a failure on the part of the United States Bank and the late deposite banks to pay the debts due from them,) the yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted as follows—yeas 102, nays 76. So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee of Conference on the part of the House, relating to the disagreement of the two Houses on the appropriation of $30,000 for a survey of the coast at Apalachicola bay, made a report. The report recommended a new appropriation of $10,000, in a shape different from the proposition in the bill, but for the same object.

The report was agreed to.

After some debate as to what business should next be considered,

On motion of Mr. JONES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. UNDERWOOD in the Chair,) and took up the bill making appropriation for the support of the WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The bill was read, and being considered by sections,

Mr. KEMBLE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported an amendment, making some slight alteration in the internal relations of the academy. Mr. K. explained that the amendment would make no increase in the expense, and therefore hoped there would be no objection.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committeee on Commerce, moved to add an amendment, re-enacting a provision regulating the salaries of collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and the custom-house officers.

Mr. HOPKINS contended that the amendment, under the rule of the House, was not in order, it having no connection with the bill.

The CHAIR ruled the amendment out of order.

Mr. CURTIS appealed.

The appeal was debated by Messrs. CURTIS, HOPKINS, EVANS, DAVIS of Indiana, SALTONSTALL, and ADAMS, when the decision of the CHAIR was sustained, and the amendment declared to be out of order.

Mr. C. H. WILLIAMS of Tennessee then moved to amend, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and substituting a new bill, proposing a different arrangement for the military instruction of cadets and officers, and providing that military students shall be taken from the ranks of the army, etc. etc.

Mr. WILLIAMS then advocated his substitute with much earnestness, and contended that by its adoption the army would be supplied with a greater number of good officers, and the President be enabled to make a selection from the whole country, instead of from a single institution. He contended that the country required a system of free instruction in military science, and that the present institution ought to be abolished.

Mr. MONROE replied with ardor in defence of the Military Academy, insisting on the necessity of scientific cultivation to ensure success in war to the highest gallantry. He presumed no gentleman would vote for the substitute; but if the gentleman from Kentucky would bring forward his plan next session in time to have it discussed, Mr. M. would be happy to meet him.

Mr. POPE followed on the same side, and remonstrated against such an attempt to destroy an institution which had existed nearly half a century, and which was an ornament to the country. The substitute, strictly considered, was not in order; but, it were, he must protest against such a scheme.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Tennessee expressed himself as decidedly opposed to the school, and would vote against the whole bill. He approved of the substitute, and so did many others, and so gentlemen would find. Mr. C. then went into a speech of considerable length, and much earnestness against the Academy.

Mr. REYNOLDS of Illinois denounced the institution as establishing a distinct order in the community. He was in favor of a reasonable and strict construction of the Constitution, and this school, viewed in that light, was unconstitutional. Besides, on the same principle, the judges of our courts and members of Congress ought to be educated at the public expense; and, said Mr. R. if we look at some of their speeches, they want education bad enough, Heaven knows.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. HUBBARD, COOPER of Georgia, W. B. CAMPBELL of Tennessee, and C. H. WILLIAMS, against the continuance of the present institution, and by Messrs. DAWSON, EVANS, MUNROE, and POPE, in favor of its continuance on the same plan as heretofore.

In the House, the amendments were read and agreed to. The bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 176, nays 41.

It was then passed and sent to the Senate.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON moved to suspend the rules, in order to receive a joint resolution from the Senate on the District banks, and demanded the yeas and nays; which being ordered, were taken, and resulted as follows—yeas 73, nays 53.

There not being two-thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. JONES then moved to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which motion prevailed, and the House went into committee accordingly, (Mr. CAVE JOHNSON in the chair,) and took up the FORTIFICATION BILL.

The bill was read through, and then considered by sections.

The sections having been read, and some inquiries having been answered,

Mr. JONES moved, as an additional section, a provision empowering the President, in case of a deficit in the Treasury, to postpone until the close of next Congress, unless Congress shall sooner act on the subject, such of the works provided for in the bill as he might deem the state of the Treasury to require.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

26TH CONG.....1ST SESS. TUESDAY, JULY 21, 1840. VOLUME 8.....No. 35.

Mr. WISE, in a speech of some length, contended that there could be no fear of any disappointment as to the payment of the bond of the United States Bank.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania followed on the same side, attacking the amendment, and lauding the United States Bank to the skies. He called it "a patriotic" institution, which had never failed to meet its engagements with the Government. He said the amendment was an unjust attack on that Bank, and charged Mr. JONES with acting unworthily of himself in becoming the instrument of such a design.

Mr. SMITH of Maine replied, and spoke in vindication of the amendment and of the chairman who introduced it. He was astonished at the hardihood of any man who would stand up here in defence of an institution guilty of a violation of law, and Constitution, and every principle of right and justice, and even common honesty. Was it sacrilege to doubt the solvency or the integrity of such an institution? Though a man might always have paid his notes, yet it was unreasonable to doubt he would continue to pay, if, in the mean time, he had failed? It might be that the Bank would pay the Government: all Mr. S. knew was, that the stock was greatly below par.

Mr. JONES said the amendment was the result of the deliberations of the committee, and not his own individual proposition. In reply to Mr. COOPER, he observed that there were members on that committee who would at least compare with that gentleman in intelligence, honor, truth, dignity, and every quality that adorns the character of man. As to the remarks personal to himself which that gentleman had, rudely, thought fit to make, he held them in contempt, and disdained further to notice them. Mr. J. then spoke in reply to the remarks of Mr. WISE. The estimates on which the appropriations in this bill were founded, had been made when the revenue was expected to reach twenty millions, but now there had been a falling off, and it appeared possible that it might fall short to the amount of four and a half millions. But if the appropriations should be kept within the estimates, and if the State banks and the Bank of the United States should pay what they owed the Government, there would be no deficiency, and consequently the whole amount appropriated might be applied, and the discretion granted to the amendment need not be exercised. As to the so much dreaded power of the President, the former practice of the Government appropriated a gross sum for the fortifications in general, and the President had then the discretionary power to apply the whole sum.

Mr. COOPER made a brief rejoinder, which proved how deeply he felt the rebuke of Mr. JONES.

Mr. GRINNELL inquired of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether the Bank of the United States had not already paid in advance a great portion of the bond which was said to be due on the first of September next.

Mr. JONES was understood to say that he had no information which would enable him to reply in the affirmative, beyond what he had heard from members.

Mr. GRINNELL then said that as Mr. J. was unable to reply in the negative, he, [Mr. G.] would undertake to say that such was the fact. He then went on to denounce the Administration for coming before Congress and speaking of a debt as doubtful, when a great portion of that debt had already been paid. He concluded by denouncing the document of the Secretary as a manifest design to deceive.

Mr. HOLLEMAN desired to say a word. He denied that the payment referred to had been made before or at the time when the document was issued by the Secretary. Mr. H. proceeded to say that, about ten days ago, he was at the Treasury Department, when he understood that arrangements were in contemplation to pay a portion of the bond. He understood, merely, that gentlemen were making arrangements to pay, but did not know that a single dollar had been paid.

Mr. GRINNELL resumed, and, notwithstanding the explicit avowal of Mr. H. that he did not know of the actual payment of a dollar, proceeded to denounce the Administration party with double deceit, in suffering a paper to be printed which spoke of this debt as doubtful and contingent. For his part, he had always been brought up to tell the truth, and fear no man.

Mr. JONES here rose and said, does the gentleman intend to charge that I have spoken any thing other than the truth?

Mr. GRINNELL disclaimed any such charge, but he did charge the Secretary with sending false and disingenuous documents, and he was surprised that the Committee of Ways and Means should place any reliance upon its assertions.

Mr. EVANS then took the floor, and canvassed at large the whole fiscal affairs of the country, and in defence of the United States Bank.

Messrs. CLARK and LEET made some brief remarks, but chiefly relating to local matters in Pennsylvania.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia spoke with much severity in reply to the attack of Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania, on the character of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means.

After some remarks from Messrs. WADDY THOMPSON and WISE, in further opposition to the amendment, and in which the latter moved further to amend by striking out that portion of the amendment in relation to the non-payment of bank debts,

Mr. WICK said he had often been much puzzled to comprehend the drift and object of debate in this House; but never more so than on the present occasion. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (said he) has proposed an amendment to the bill under consideration, plain, simple, explanatory, and precautionary, and in no respect dangerous, or obnoxious to objection; and lo! it has been made an occasion to get up a regular set-to upon the old party theme—the United States Bank—and of a last, a final Congressional charge upon the Administration. At first, said he, I did not know—as it is now the witching hour of night—but that my friends of the Administration party were dreaming, and had seen the ghost of the defunct monster stalking through the hall, accompanied by witches and warlocks, and long nebbed things. But a moment's reflection satisfied me that, in stopping at this conclusion, I was more smart than WISE, (bowing to Mr. WISE of Virginia,) for I remembered that the United States Bank was not only dead and buried, but that my Administration friends have, by the passage of the Independent Treasury bill, turfed over its grave, and laid its ghost in the Red sea. Then, sir, said he, why, at this late hour of the session, have we been called upon to sit here patiently under the infliction of a regular attack, and defence of that old concern—to as dull prosy details about it as we have ever heard, here or elsewhere—to another and another attack upon Martin Van Buren and Levi Woodbury? Why have we witnessed sundry manifestations of what must here, I suppose, be called chivalry, but which, in the hoosier State, the boys would call gostration?

Is not the Administration yet demolished? Have we not heard it proclaimed in this House, at our lodgings, and in every street, by the gentlemen of the Opposition, that the Administration is bodaciously used up, tetotaciously exfluctified? That in a few weeks Levi Woodbury is to absquatulate to New Hampshire, Martin Van Buren to go to Kinderhook, to trundle cabbages, and that the friends of old Hickory will find him smoking his pipe in the deserts of Arabia? Why, then, tomahawk the slain? Why bring declamation to bear upon the Administration? Why pummel and beat over again that which is already beaten to a jelly, jelly, jammed into a cocked hat, and flung into the middle of next week? Surely the gentlemen of the Opposition do not wish to labor in vain. Sir, I have thought of two reasons for all this flourish First, it has occurred to me that the Opposition party, being a little scant of doctrine, a personage, called General Mum, has seen proper, at the precise close of the session, when the new issue cannot be met and exposed, to let it leak out, through his friends here, in a modest kind of way, so that it may be understood by the knowing ones, but not by the farmers, or the honest hearted old Jackson men, who stood by the old chief in his battle with the monster, that he (Gen. Mum) is not hostile to a United States Bank.

But as this does not fully account for the tone of this evening's debate, I have looked around the hall for its exciting cause. I could surely find no cause in an attentive audience on this floor, for scarce a member has paid any attention to a word which has been said. Every one has been talking at the top of his voice. The din has been such, that one has had to think by feeling, like one walking in a dungeon.

But, sir, I have looked further and higher, and there! and there! and there! (pointing to the galleries, crowded with ladies,) I find fifty or an hundred good and beautiful reasons for making a splash on this floor. Sir, it is time to quit speaking; voting will be more appropriate.

Mr. JONES here rose and stated that, pending the debate, he had despatched a messenger to the Secretary of the Treasury for information as to whether any portion of the United States Bank bond had been paid or not. The messenger had just returned, and he (Mr. J.) conceived it his duty to state that the letter from the Secretary, in reply, apprised him that the United States Bank had paid the Government $400,000 on its bonds due in September. Also, that the money was paid a week or ten days after the communication had been sent in.

The question then being taken on the amendment of Mr. WISE, it was rejected.

The amendment of Mr. JONES was then agreed to.

Mr. DELLET moved to amend by inserting an appropriation for the improvement of the Mobile harbor.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. DELLET took an appeal; but the decision of the CHAIR was sustained.

Mr. HAND wished to offer an amendment, making an appropriation for the erection of a fort at the outlet of Lake Champlain, but the CHAIR said it would not be in order.

Mr. HAND said, he supposed the amendment was not strictly in order, as there was no existing law. But as the bill came from the Committee of Ways and Means, all the members of which admitted the importance of the works, and as he found that the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs would not be reached, he earnestly entreated the committee to allow this amendment to be appended to the bill then under consideration.

Objections being made, the amendment was not received.

The committee now rose, and reported the bill to the House, with the amendment.

In the House, the amendment having been read,

Mr. SMITH of Maine demanded the previous question, which was seconded, put, and carried; and on the main question, being on concurring with the amendment, the yeas and nays were demanded, but the House refused to order them. The amendment was concurred in, the bill ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSSELL of New York now moved that the calender of Senate bills, which had been referred to a Committee of the Whole, be transferred to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

Mr. STEENROD moved an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows—yeas 79, nays 63.

So the House, at a quarter past 12 o'clock, Adjourned.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, July 21, 1840.

The residue of the standing committees were discharged from the further consideration of the subjects remaining before them, and leave granted to certain individuals to withdraw their papers.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the year 1840, was received from the House, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance; reported from the committee without amendment, considered by consent, ordered to a third reading, and read a third time, and passed.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Navy for statements as to the number of seamen and marines in the United States navy; distinguishing American citizens from foreigners, and those that had not been from those that had been bred in the fisheries. Objection being made, the resolution was lost.

The bill from the House making appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point, for the year 1840, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate concurred with the House in suspending the 16th joint rule, so as to allow the final passage of the bill for the relief of Chastelain and Ponvert, and for other purposes, and the joint resolution providing for the remuneration of the workmen on the Treasury building for loss of time.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the resolution offered by Mr. SOUTHARD was taken up, amended on motion of Mr. H. (assented to by Mr. SOUTHARD,) so as to exclude information already possessed by the Senate; and in this form it was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, reported the bill making appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point, for the year 1840, without amendment.

The bill was then taken up, considered as in committee of the whole, and ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

The Senate concurred in the joint resolution from the House for appointing a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress, unless he had some further communication to make, were now ready to adjourn; and the President pro tem. was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HUBBARD, from the joint committee on the part of the Senate, reported that it had waited on the President to receive any further communications he might be pleased to make, was informed by the President that he had no further business to communicate, and wished each Senator a happy return to his home.

Mr. PHELPS introduced a resolution, which was carried unanimously, thanking the President pro tem. for the able and impartial manner in which he had discharged the duties of his station.

Mr. TAPPAN then moved that the Senate adjourn sine die.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. having resumed the Chair, addressed the Senate as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE: Our very protracted session has drawn to a close. Whether our time has been employed in a manner most conducive to the public interest, is not for me to determine. But I take this occasion to say, and I do it with much pleasure, that if censure attaches any where, this House is not justly liable to any portion of it. Here business has met with no improper or unusual obstruction. Every subject of a legislative character which has reached us from the other House, has been finally disposed of—our duty has been faithfully performed. The course pursued by this honorable body during this session, agitating and exciting as it has been, is well calculated to raise it still higher in the esteem and confidence of the people throughout this wide-spread land. Decorum in debate has characterized its proceedings; and a proper self-respect and dignity of deportment has marked the conduct of each honorable Senator. I must be permitted, gentlemen, to return you my sincere thanks for your unanimous expression of approbation of my official conduct. To the best of my ability I have discharged the duties; and the impartiality accorded to me by each honorable Senator, is a source of heartfelt gratification. My object has ever been to enforce the rules, to preserve order, but to inflict pain on no one. If, however, I have on any occasion wounded the feelings of any Senator, I take this public occasion to express my deep regret, and to ask his pardon.

May you return, gentlemen, in safety to your homes and families; and may prosperity and happiness be the lot of you and yours. I bid you, one and all, a kindly farewell.

The motion to adjourn was then put and carried; and

The PRESIDENT pro tem. announced that the Senate of the United States stood adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

TUESDAY, July 21, 1840.

Mr. CARR, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported the following bills; which were twice read, committed to the Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow:

A bill for the relief of John Sidman of N. Y.

A bill for the relief of Amos Hunting of Conn.

A bill for the relief of Leah Tenure of N. Y.

Also, Senate bill, No. 19, for the relief of Saml. White—recommend that it do not pass.

Mr. C. from the same committee, upon motion, was discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions:

The petition of Diana Moore of Kentucky; of Margaret Smith of Kentucky; of Julia F. Gibbs of Connecticut; of Ephraim Owen of New York; of Sarah Hall of Vermont; of Perris Morgan of Mass. of Mary Lord of Connecticut; of Barbary Moyer of Pennsylvania, of Anna Garrington of Connecticut; of John Smith of Virginia; of Lydia Moody of Massachusetts; of Polly Pratt of Tennessee; of Susan Foster of Kentucky; of Martha Dameron of Virginia; (general bill reported,) of Moses Dusenbury of New York; of E. Todd of Massachusetts; of Sally Day of Massachusetts; of Nancy Peters of Kentucky; Susanna Barker of Illinois; of Sarah ——— of Kentucky; of Prudence Windzor, Wm. Meriwether, Mary Allen, and Jane Buford.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the graduation of the price of public lands, which, after some desultory debate as to whether any reports from committees should be received at all, was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER suggested to the House the propriety of discharging all the standing committees from the consideration of the subjects before them, and that they be permitted to hand in their reports to the Clerk; but objection was made.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was read for the information of the House as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be and hereby is directed to pay to Messrs. Aycrigg, Maxwell, Halsted, Stratton, and Yorke, the same compensation per diem and mileage that is allowed to members of Congress, computing the per diem from the commencement of the session to the 16th day of July instant, inclusive; and to Mr. Charles J. Ingersoll the same compensation during the session.

Objection having been made,

Mr. SMITH moved to supend the rules to enable him to present the resolution; and, on that motion, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were—yeas , nays .

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BRIGGS asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution, which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the assistant clerks of this House, the postmaster, the chaplain, the draughtsman, the carman, the hostler, the police of the Capitol, the keeper of the western gate of the Capitol, and the lamp-lighter, be allowed the same rate of extra compensation as has been paid by the Senate to their officers and attendants, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund.

Objection having been made—

Mr. BRIGGS moved to suspend the rules, and on that motion the yeas and nays having been ordered, were—yeas 105, nays 26.

So the rules were suspended; and the question being on the adoption of the resolution—

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland called for the previous question; which received a second; and the main question was ordered.

Mr. COOPER of Georgia called for a division of the question, so as to except the chaplain, and to have a separate vote on that part.

Mr. McCLELLAN of Tennessee moved to lay the resolution on the table; and demanded the yeas and nays on that question, which having been ordered, were—yeas 32, nays 104. So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution, which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the first division of the resolution, and it was agreed to; and then on the second branch, including the compensation to the chaplain, and agreed to.

The SPEAKER, by general consent, laid before the House a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of April last, giving the names of each of the soldiers to whom patents were issued for land lying in the military bounty land district, in the State of Illinois, &c.

On motion of Mr. CASEY, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of F. R. Hassler, superintendent of the works of standard weights and measures; which was, on motion of Mr. CASEY, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, the usual extra quantity of said document was ordered to be printed for the use of the superintendent.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, in compliance with a resolution of the 26th of May last, accompanied by a statement showing the amount paid in money and scrip on account of Revolutionary claims subsequent to the year 1794. On motion of Mr. CASEY, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, a message from the President of the United States States, transmitting a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to tranfers from one head of appropriations to another, made from the commencement of the present year. On motion of Mr. BELL, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department in relation to the mode of paying members of Congress, and pointing out certain difficulties in keeping such accounts, &c. On motion of Mr. STANLY, ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BELL asked the consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, in relation to the proceedings had under the first and second clauses of the fourth article of the treaty of the 1st November, 1837, with the Winnebago Indians, with a view of having the report and evidenee printed, and the committee discharged.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON said he would have no objection to the reception of the report; but, if it was to be received, he would insist on the reading of the report, before he would consent to have it printed.

Mr. BELL moved to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated above, and on that question demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 84, nays 48.

So the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa, the last hour of the session was set apart for the consideration of territorial business.

Mr. ADAMS made an effort to get up the joint resolution authorizing the payment of the workmen on the public buildings, during the time the work on the same was suspended, previous to the last session of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana objected.

Mr. MORGAN said he rose to a privileged question. He wished to move the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives pay to the witnesses examined in the New Jersey case, $2 per day, while engaged in the examination.

Mr. CUSHING objected, on the ground that it was not a privileged question.

The CHAIR said it was not a privileged question; and the resolution was not pressed.

Mr. ADAMS said the objection of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] to the consideration of the joint resolution for the payment of the workmen on the public buildings, had been withdrawn; he therefore moved that the resolution be taken up; which motion having been agreed to, the resolution was taken up, read the third time, and passed; and subsequently the 17th joint rule, which prohibits the presentation to the President for his approbation, on the last day of the session, any bill or resolution, was so far suspended as to permit the presentation of the above.

Mr. JENIFER moved to suspend the 16th joint rules, which says that "no bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to other on either of the three last days of the session," so far as to receive from the Senate the joint resolution which passed that body, supplementary to the act extending the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

Objection having been made,

Mr. JENIFER moved to suspend the rule to enable him to make the motion.

Mr. BURKE demanded the yeas and nays, which, having been ordered, were—yeas 81, nays 51; so the rules were not suspended.

Mr. JONES of Virginia moved to suspend the 17th joint rule, so as to permit the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications to be presented to the President for his approbation.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to amend the resolution, so as to include all bills that may be passed before the adjournment; and, on the question being put on the amendment, there we—yeas 56, noes 49. No quorum having voted,

Mr. BRIGGS withdrew the motion to amend.

The original resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL asked the general consent of the House to offer a resolution from the Committee on Claims, which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House designate one member on the Committee of Claims, whose duty it shall be, during the recess of Congress, to attend at the seat of Government, and examine all petitions, memorials, bills, and resolutions committed to that committee, and not acted on at the present session, and to prepare reports thereon for the action of the Committee on Claims at the next session of Congress.

Mr. R. said it was in consequence of the bad condition of the private claims that the Committee on Claims had been induced to present this resolution to the House. It was unanimously agreed to by that committee, and he hoped it would pass.

Objection having been made to the reception of the resolution,

Mr. RUSSELL moved to suspend the rules for the purpose.

The CHAIR said there was a motion to suspend the rules now pending.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. JONES of Virginia to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and agreed to; and the House accordingly went into Committee, Mr. CASEY in the chair.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the committee took up the bill for the relief of Chastellain and Ponvort, and for other purposes, which had been returned from the Senate with numerous amendments, making appropriations for various objects; all which amendments were concurred in, except the appropriation of $20,000 for the payment of Clarke and Force, for the second and third volumes of the Documentary History of the Revolution, and after a few remarks explanatory of the amendment by Messrs. JONES of Virginia, CAVE JOHNSON, STANLY, UNDERWOOD, and EVERETT, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Indiana moved to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House, for the purpose of considering the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to confirm to the State of Indiana the land selected by her for that portion of the Wabash and Erie Canal which lies between Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, and for other purposes."

But the motion was objected to by several; and

The question was taken on the motion to report the omnibus bill to the House, and agreed to.

The bill having been reported to the House, and the question being on concurring with the committee in the amendments of the Senate,

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendments were concurred in; and, on motion of Mr. EVANS, the seventeenth joint rule was so far suspended as to permit the bill to be presented to the President for his signature.

Mr. DUNCAN gave notice that he would, some day during the next session of Congress, ask leave to introduce a bill to authorize and require the President of the United States to make a present to the King of Muscat of a sloop of war, for reasons which he would then name in a preamble to the bill.

Mr. HOLLEMAN asked the House to take up Senate bill regulating the pay of the pursers in the navy. The bill was of great importance.

Objection having been made,

Mr. H. moved to suspend the rules for the purpose, which the House refused to do.

Mr. RUSSELL again asked the consent of the House to enable him to report from the Committee of Claims the resolution in relation to claims, reported above; but objection being made,

Mr. R. moved to suspend the rules for the purpose; on which motion the yeas and nays having been ordered, were—yeas 40, nays 106.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. STANLY moved to take up the bill regulating the pay of pursers.

Mr. WISE objected. He wished that bill to lay over till the next session. It was too important to be passed upon at that late period.

Mr. GENTRY asked the House to take up the bill regulating the mileage of members of Congress.

The CHAIR said it would require a vote of two thirds to accomplish that object. Consequently, Mr. G. did not press his motion.

The bill on the SPEAKER'S table, returned from the Senate with amendments, entitled an act for the relief of Hyacinth Lasselle, was taken up, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. JAMESON moved to take up the bill from the Senate, entitled an act creating a new land district in the State of Missouri, and for changing the boundaries of the southwestern and western land districts in said State. Objection having been made,

Mr. JAMESON moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays, which having been ordered, were—yeas 72, nays 51.

So the rules were not suspended.

On motion of Mr. HAND, it was resolved, that a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States to notify him that unless he may have other communications to the two Houses of Congress, that they are ready to adjourn.

Mr. HAND, from the joint committee appointed as above, subsequently reported that that committee had performed their duty, and received for answer that the President had no further communi- to make to the House, except to express his wishes for their health, and safe return to their constituents.

Mr. JENIFER gave notice that if by the 1st of January next, the duties and restrictions upon our tobacco in Europe are not modified, he should ask leave to introduce a bill laying countervailing duties.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS PRIOR TO 1800.

Mr. CUSHING gave notice that at the beginning of the next session of Congress he should call up the bill making indemnity to claimants for spoliations committed by France, prior to 1800, and solicit the action of the House thereon, there not being any opportunity to act on the bill at the present session of Congress.

Mr. R. GARLAND asked the consent of the House as a last request to take up a bill, which he said had passed seven years in succession, the title of which the reporters did not distinctly hear. The request was refused.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa, the hour of one o'clock having arrived, the House proceeded to execute the special order, by resolving itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY in the chair,) for the purpose of considering territorial business.

Mr. DOWNING moved that the committee take up Senate bill entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to raise one thousand five hundred men to serve against the Florida Indians."

Mr. L. WILLIAMS objected, on the ground that it did not come within the special order.

The CHAIR so decided that it did not.

Mr. DOWNING appealed from the decision of the CHAIR; and the question was put, "Shall the decision of the CHAIR stand as the judgment of the committee?" and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CRABB moved to take up the bill to admit Florida into the Union; which motion was disagreed to without a count.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa, Senate bill (220) entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'an act for laying off the town of Fort Madison and Burlington, in the county of Des Moines, and the towns of Belleview, Dubuque, and Peru, in the county of Dubuque, Territory of Wiskonsin, and for other purposes,'" approved March the 3d, 1837, was taken up, read, and there being no motion to amend, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. DOTY, the bill for the protection of the commerce on Lake Michigan was taken up, and there being no motion to amend, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN, Senate bill entitled an act to cause the reserved lead mines belonging to the United States in the several States and Territories to be sold as other public lands, was next taken up; and the bill having been read through,

Mr. JOHNSON of Maryland moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; and after a few remarks by Mr. J. in favor of that motion, and Mr. CHAPMAN in opposition to it, the question was put, and the motion was agreed to—ayes 68, noes 53.

House bill to establish post routes in the Territory of Iowa was next taken up, and there being no motion to amend the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. DOTY, the bill in relation to the Neenah and Wiskonsin rivers was next taken up, and there being no motion to amend the bill, was laid aside to be reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa, the bill to authorize the Legislative Council of Iowa to increase the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in said Territory, was next taken up, and there being no motion to amend the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. DOTY moved that the committee rise, and report the bills to the House.

Mr. CHAPMAN of Iowa protested against that motion, and complained that the mover had not acted honorably in making the motion before the bills were acted on.

The question was put on the motion, and agreed to; and the committee rose and reported the bills to the House.

The question being on concurring with the amendment of the committee, striking out the enacting clause of the bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause the lead mines to be sold, the question was put, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CHAPMAN made some remarks in opposition to the amendment before the question was put.

Senate bill (220, as noticed above,) which was reported from the committee, was then read the third time and passed; but the joint rule was not suspended which prohibited its presentation to the President for his signature, and the bill was in consequence lost, notwithstanding it passed both Houses.

The bill appropriating $55,000 for the protection of commerce on Lake Michigan, [by the construction of harbors on that portion of the lake bordering on Wiskonsin,] came up on its engrossment for a third reading.

Mr. TURNEY demanded the yeas and nays on that question; which, having been ordered, were—yeas 70, nays 55.

The bill was then read the third time, and the question being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi spoke of the profession of economy of the Whig party, the most of whom belonging to it had just voted in favor of this enormous measure. He hoped it would not pass.

Mr. MARVIN moved the previous question on its passage; which, having received a second, and the question being, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi demanded the yeas and nays; which, having been ordered, were —yeas 70, nays 70. The SPEAKER voted in the negative, and the House determined that the main question on its passage should not be put.

The hour of two o'clock, the time fixed by the joint resolution for the closing of the present session having expired before the roll was called through on the question above,

The SPEAKER announced that the House was adjourned till the first Monday in December next.

APPENDIX

TO THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

IN SENATE,

TUESDAY, December 24, 1839.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by A. VAN BUREN, esq. his private secretary.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The annual message of the President to the two Houses of Congress was then read by the Secretary of the Senate, and was as follows:

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

I regret that I cannot on this occasion congratulate you that the past year has been one of unalloyed prosperity. The ravages of fire and disease have painfully afflicted otherwise flourishing portions of our country; and serious embarrassments yet derange the trade of many of our cities. But, notwithstanding these adverse circumstances, that general prosperity which has been heretofore so bountifully bestowed upon us by the Author of all good, still continues to call for our warmest gratitude. Especially have we reason to rejoice in the exuberant harvests which have lavishly recompensed well directed industry, and given to it that sure reward which is vainly sought in visionary speculations. I cannot indeed view without peculiar satisfaction, the evidences afforded by the past season of the benefits that spring from the steady devotion of the husbandman to his honorable pursuit. No means of individual comfort is more certain, and no source of national prosperity is so sure. Nothing can compensate a people for a dependence upon others for the bread they eat; and that cheerful abundance on which the happiness of every one so much depends, is to be looked for nowhere with such sure reliance as in the industry of the agriculturist and the bounties of the earth.

With foreign countries, our relations exhibit the same favorable aspect which was presented in my last annual message, and afford continued proof of the wisdom of the pacific, just, and forbearing policy adopted by the first Administration of the Federal Government, and pursued by its successors. The extraordinary powers vested in me by an act of Congress, for the defence of the country in an emergency, considered so far probable as to require that the Executive should possess ample means to meet it, have not been exerted. They have, therefore, been attended with no other result than to increase, by the confidence thus reposed in me, my obligations to maintain, with religious exactness, the cardinal principles that govern our intercourse with other nations. Happily, in our pending quesuons with Great Britain, out of which this unusual grant of authority arose, nothing has occurred to require its exertion; and as it is about to return to the Legislature, I trust that no future necessity may call for its exercise by them, or its delegation to another department of the Government.

For the settlement of our Northeastern boundary, the proposition promised by Great Britain for a commission of exploration and survey, has been received, and a counter project, including also a provision for the certain and final adjustment of the limits in dispute, is now before the British Government for its consideration. A just regard to the delicate state of this question, and a proper respect for the natural impatience of the State of Maine, not less than a conviction that the negotiation has been already protracted longer than is prudent on the part of either Government, have led me to believe that the present favorable moment should on no account be suffered to pass without putting the question forever at rest. I feel confident that the Government of her Britannic Majesty will take the same view of this subject, as I am persuaded it is governed by desires equally strong and sincere for the amicable termination of the controversy.

To the intrinsic difficulties of questions of boundary lines, especially those described in regions unoccupied, and but partially known, is to be added in our country the embarrassment necessarily arising out of our Constitution, by which the General Government is made the organ of negotiating, and deciding upon the particular interests of the States on whose frontiers these lines are to be traced. To avoid another controversy in which a State Government might rightfully claim to have her wishes consulted, previously to the conclusion of conventional arrangements concerning her rights of jurisdiction or territory, I have thought it necessary to call the attention of the Government of Great Britain to another portion of our conterminous dominion, of which the division still remains to be adjusted. I refer to the line from the entrance of Lake Superior to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, stipulations for the settlement of which are to be found in the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent. The commissioners appointed under that article by the two Governments having differed in their opinions, made separate reports, according to its stipulations, upon the points of disagreement, and these differences are now to be submitted to the arbitration of some friendly sovereign or State. The disputed points should be settled, and the line designated, before the Territorial Government, of which it is one of the boundaries, takes its place in the Union as a State; and I rely upon the cordial co-operation of the British Government to effect that object.

There is every reason to believe that disturbances like those which lately agitated the neighboring British Provinces will not again prove the sources of border contentions, or interpose obstacles to the continuance of that good understanding which it is the mutual interest of Great Britain and the United States to preserve and maintain.

Within the Provinces themselves tranquillity is restored, and on our frontier that misguided sympathy in favor of what was presumed to be a general effort in behalf of popular rights, and which in some instances misled a few of our more inexperienced citizens, has subsided into a rational conviction strongly opposed to all intermeddling with the internal affairs of our neighbors. The people of the United States feel, as it is hoped they always will, a warm solicitude for the success of all who are sincerely endeavoring to improve the political condition of mankind. This generous feeling they cherish towards the most distant nations; and it was natural, therefore, that it should be awakened with more than common warmth in behalf of their immediate neighbors. But it does not belong to their character, as a community, to seek the gratification of those feelings in acts which violate their duty as citizens, endanger the peace of their country, and tend to bring upon it the stain of a violated faith towards foreign nations. If, zealous to confer benefits on others, they appear for a moment to lose sight of the permanent obligations imposed upon them as citizens, they are seldom long misled. From all the information I receive, confirmed to some extent by personal observation, I am satisfied that no one can now hope to engage in such enterprises without encountering public indignation, in addition to the severest penalties of the law.

Recent information also leads me to hope that the emigrants from her Majesty's Provinces, who have sought refuge within our boundaries, are disposed to become peaceable residents, and to abstain from all attempts to endanger the peace of that country which has afforded them an asylum. On a review of the occurrences on both sides of the line, it is satisfactory to reflect, that in almost every complaint against our country, the offence may be traced to emigrants from the Provinces who have sought refuge here. In the few instances in which they were aided by citizens of the United States, the acts of these misguided men were not only in direct contravention of the laws and well known wishes of their own Government, but met with the decided disapprobation of the people of the United States.

I regret to state the appearance of a different spirit among her Majesty's subjects in the Canadas. The sentiments of hostility to our people and institutions, which have been so frequently expressed there, and the disregard of our rights which have been manifested on some occasions, have, I am sorry to say, been applauded and encouraged by the people, and even by some of the subordinate local authorities, of the Provinces. The chief officers in Canada fortunately have not entertained the same feeling, and have probably prevented excesses that must have been fatal to the peace of the two countries.

I look forward anxiously to a period when all the transactions which have grown out of this condition of our affairs, and which have been made the subjects of complaint and remonstrance by the two Governments respectively, shall be fully examined, and the proper satisfaction given where it is due from either side.

Nothing has occurred to disturb the harmony of our intercourse with Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Naples, Portugal, Prussia, Russia, or Sweden. The internal state of Spain has sensibly improved, and a well grounded hope exists that the return of peace will restore to the people of that country their former prosperity, and enable the Government to fulfil all its obligations at home and abroad. The Government of Portugal, I have the satisfaction to state, has paid in full the eleventh and last instalment due to our citizens for the claims embraced in the settlement made with it on the third of March, 1837.

I lay before you treaties of commerce negotiated with the Kings of Sardinia and of the Netherlands, the ratifications of which have been exchanged since the adjournment of Congress. The liberal principles of these treaties will recommend them to your approbation. That with Sardinia is the first treaty of commerce formed by that kingdom, and it will, I trust, answer the expectations of the present sovereign, by aiding the development of the resources of his country, and stimulating the enterprise of his people. That with the Netherlands happily terminates a long existing subject of dispute, and removes from our future commercial intercourse all apprehension of embarrassment. The King of the Netherlands has also, in further illustration of his character for justice, and of his desire to remove every cause of dissatisfaction, made compensation for an American vessel captured in 1800 by a French privateer, and carried into Curaçoa, where the proceeds were appropriated to the use of the colony, then, and for a short time after, under the dominion of Holland.

The death of the late Sultan has produced no alteration in our relations with Turkey. Our newly appointed Minister Resident has reached Constantinople, and I have received assurances from the present Ruler that the obligations of our treaty, and those of friendship, will be fulfilled by himself in the same spirit that actuated his illustrious father.

I regret to be obliged to inform you that no convention for the settlement of the claims of our citizens upon Mexico has yet been ratified by the Government of that country. The first convention formed for that purpose was not presented by the President of Mexico for the approbation of its Congress, from a belief that the King of Prussia, the arbitrator in case of disagreement in the joint commission to be appointed by the United States and Mexico, would not consent to take upon himself that friendly office. Although not entirely satisfied with the course pursued by Mexico, I felt no hesitation in receiving in the most conciliatory spirit the explanation offered, and also cheerfully consented to a new convention, in order to arrange the payments proposed to be made to our citizens, in a manner which, while equally just to them, was deemed less onerous and inconvenient to the Mexican Government. Relying confidently upon the intentions of that Government, Mr. Ellis was directed to repair to Mexico, and diplomatic intercourse has been resumed between the two countries. The new convention has, he informs us, been recently submitted by the President of that Republic to its Congress, under circumstances which promise a speedy ratification; a result which I cannot allow myself to doubt.

Instructions have been given to the Commissioner of the United States under our Convention with Texas, for the demarcation of the line which separates us from that Republic. The commissioners of both Governments met in New Orleans in August last. The joint commission was organized, and adjourned to convene at the same place on the twelfth of October. It is presumed to be now in the performance of its duties.

The new Government of Texas has shown its desire to cultivate friendly relations with us, by a prompt reparation for injuries complained of in the cases of two vessels of the United States.

With Central America a convention has been concluded for the renewal of its former treaty with he United States. This was not ratified before the departure of our late Chargé d'Affaires from that country, and the copy of it brought by him was not received before the adjournment of the Senate at the last session. In the mean while, the period limited for the exchange of ratifications having expired, I deemed it expedient, in consequence of the death of the Chargé d'Affaires, to send a special agent to Central America, to close the affairs of our mission there, and to arrange with the Government an extension of the time for the exchange of ratifications.

The commission created by the States which formerly composed the Republic of Colombia, for adjusting the claims against that Government, has, by a very unexpected construction of the treaty under which it acts, decided that no provision was made for those claims of citizens of the United States which arose from captures by Colombian privateers, and were adjudged against the claimants in the judicial tribunals. This decision will compel the United States to apply to the several Governments formerly united for redress. With all these—New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador, a perfectly good understanding exists. Our treaty with Venezuela is faithfully carried into execution, and that country, in the enjoyment of tranquillity, is gradually advancing in prosperity under the guidance of its present distinguished President, General Paez. With Ecuador, a liberal commercial convention has lately been concluded, which will be transmitted to the Senate at an early day.

With the great American Empire of Brazil our relations continue unchanged, as does our friendly intercourse with the other Governments of South America—the Argentine Republic, and the Republics of Uruguay, Chili, Peru and Bolivia. The dissolution of the Peru-Bolivian Confederation may occasion some temporary inconvenience to our citizens in that quarter, but the obligations on the new Governments which have arisen out of that Confederation to observe its treaty stipulations, will no doubt be soon understood, and it is presumed that no indisposition will exist to fulfil those which it contracted with the United States.

The financial operations of the Government during the present year have, I am happy to say, been very successful. The difficulties under which the Treasury Department has labored from known defects in the existing laws relative to the safe keeping of the public moneys, aggravated by the suspension of specie payments by several of the banks holding public deposites, or indebted to public officers for notes received in payment of public dues, have been surmounted to a very gratifying extent. The large current expenditures have been punctually met, and the faith of the Government in all its pecuniary concerns has been scrupulously maintained.

The nineteen millions of Treasury notes authorized by the act of Congress of 1837, and the modifications thereof, with a view to the indulgence of merchants on their duty bonds, and of the deposite banks in the payment of public moneys held by them, have been so punctually redeemed as to leave less than the original ten millions outstanding at any one time, and the whole amount unredeemed now falls short of three millions. Of these the chief portion is not due till next year, and the whole would have been already extinguished could the Treasury have realized the payments due to it from the banks. If those due from them during the next year shall be punctually made, and if Congress shall keep the appropriations within the estimates, there is every reason to believe that all the outstanding Treasury notes can be redeemed, and the ordinary expenses defrayed, without imposing on the people any additional burden, either of loans or increased taxes.

To avoid this, and to keep the expenditures within reasonable bounds, is a duty, second only in importance to the preservation of our national character, and the protection of our citizens in their civil and political rights. The creation, in time of peace, of a debt likely to become permanent, is an evil for which there is no equivalent. The rapidity with which many of the States are apparently approaching to this condition, admonishes us of our own duties, in a manner too impressive to be disregarded. One, not the least important, is to keep the Federal Government always in a condition to discharge, with ease and vigor, its highest functions, should their exercise be required by any sudden conjuncture of public affairs—a condition to which we are always exposed, and which may occur when it is least expected. To this end, it is indispensable that its finances should be untrammelled, and its resources, as far as practicable, unincumbered. No circumstance could present greater obstacles to the accomplishment of these vitally important objects, than the creation of an onerous national debt. Our own experience, and also that of other nations, have demonstrated the unavoidable and fearful rapidity with which a public debt is increased, when the Government has once surrendered itself to the ruinous practice of supplying its supposed necessities by new loans. The struggle, therefore, on our part, to be successful, must be made at the threshold. To make our efforts effective, severe economy is necessary. This is the surest provision for the national welfare; and it is, at the same time, the best preservative of the principles on which our institutions rest. Simplicity and economy in the affairs of State have never failed to chasten and invigorate Republican principles, while these have been as surely subverted by national prodigality, under whatever specious pretexts it may have been introduced or fostered.

These considerations cannot be lost upon a people who have never been inattentive to the effect of their policy upon the institutions they have created for themselves; but at the present moment their force is augmented by the necessity which a decreasing revenue must impose. The check lately given to importations of articles subject to duties, the derangements in the operations of internal trade, and especially the reduction gradually taking place in our tariff of duties, all tend materially to lessen our receipts; indeed it is probable that the diminution resulting from the last cause alone, will not fall short of five millions of dollars in the year 1842, as the final reduction of all duties to twenty per cent. then takes effect. The whole revenue then accruing from the customs, and from the sales of public lands, if not more, will undoubtedly be wanted to defray the necessary expenses of the Government under the most prudent administration of its affairs. These are circumstances that impose the necessity of rigid economy, and require its prompt and constant exercise. With the Legislature rest the power and duty of so adjusting the public expenditure as to promote this end. By the provisions of the Constitution, it is only in consequence of appropriations made by law, that money can be drawn from the Treasury; no instance has occurred since the establishment of the Government in which the Executive, though a component part of the Legislative power, has interposed an objection to an appropriation bill on the sole ground of its extravagance. His duty in this respect has been considered fulfilled by requesting such appropriations only as the public service may be reasonably expected to require. In the present earnest direction of the public mind towards this subject, both the Executive and the Legislature have evidence of the strict responsibility to which they will be held; and while I am conscious of my own anxious efforts to perform with fidelity this portion of my public functions, it is a satisfaction to me to be able to count on a cordial co-operation from you.

At the time I entered upon my present duties, our ordinary disbursements—without including those on account of the public debt, the post office, and the trust funds in charge of the Government—had been largely increased by appropriations for the removal of the Indians, for repelling Indian hostilities, and for other less urgent expenses which grew out of an overflowing Treasury. Independent of the redemption of the public debt and trusts, the gross expenditures of seventeen and eighteen millions in 1834 and 1835 had, by these causes, swelled to twenty-nine millions in 1836; and the appropriations for 1837, made previously to the fourth of March, caused the expenditure to rise to the very large amount of thirty-three millions. We were enabled during the year 1838, notwithstanding the continuance of our Indian embarrassments, somewhat to reduce this amount; and that for the present year, 1839, will not in all probability exceed twenty-six millions—or six millions less than it was last year. With a determination so far as depends on me to continue this reduction, I have directed the estimates for 1840 to be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and to be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service. They will be found less than the expenditures of 1839 by over five millions of dollars.

The precautionary measures which will be recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, to protect faithfully the public credit under the fluctuations and contingencies to which our receipts and expenditures are exposed, and especially in a commercial crisis like the present, are commended to your early attention.

On a former occasion your attention was invited to various considerations in support of a pre-emption law in behalf of the settlers on the public lands; and also of a law graduating the prices for such lands as had long been in the market unsold, in consequence of their inferior quality. The execution of the act which was passed on the first subject has been attended with the happiest consequences, in quieting titles, and securing improvements to the industrious; and it has also, to a very gratifying extent, been exempt from the frauds which were practised under previous pre-emption laws. It has, at the same time, as was anticipated, contributed liberally during the present year to the receipts of the Treasury.

The passage of a graduation law, with the guards before recommended, would also, I am persuaded, add considerably to the revenue for several years, and prove in other respects just and beneficial.

Your early consideration of the subject is, therefore, once more earnestly requested.

The present condition of the defences of our principal seaports and navy yards, as represented by the accompanying report of the Secretary of War, calls for the early and serious attention of Congress; and, as connecting itself intimately with this subject, I cannot recommend too strongly to your consideration the plan submitted by that officer for the organization of the militia of the United States.

In conformity with the expressed wishes of Congress, an attempt was made in the spring to terminate the Florida war by negotiation. It is to be regretted that these humane intentions should have been frustrated, and that the effort to bring these unhappy difficulties to a satisfactory conclusion should have failed. But, after entering into solemn engagements with the Commanding General, the Indians, without any provocation, recommenced their acts of treachery and murder. The renewal of hostilities in that Territory renders it necessary that I should recommend to your favorable consideration the plan which will be submitted to you by the Secretary of War, in order to enable that department to conduct them to a successful issue.

Having had an opportunity of personally inspecting a portion of the troops during the last summer, it gives me pleasure to bear testimony to the success of the effort to improve their discipline, by keeping them together in as large bodies as the nature of our service will permit. I recommend, therefore, that commodious and permanent barracks be constructed at the several posts designated by the Secretary of War. Notwithstanding the high state of their discipline and excellent police, the evils resulting to the service from the deficiency of company officers, were very apparent, and I recommend that the staff officers be permanently separated from the line.

The navy has been usefully and honorably employed in protecting the rights and property of our citizens, wherever the condition of affairs seemed to require its presence. With the exception of one instance, where an outrage, accompanied by murder, was committed on a vessel of the United States while engaged in a lawful commerce, nothing is known to have occurred to impede or molest the enterprise of our citizens on that element where it is so signally displayed. On learning this daring act of piracy, Commodore Reed proceeded immediately to the spot, and receiving no satisfaction, either in the surrender of the murderers or the restoration of the plundered property, inflicted severe and merited chastisement on the barbarians.

It will be seen by the report of the Secretary of the Navy respecting the disposition of our ships of war, that it has been deemed necessary to station a competent force on the coast of Africa, to prevent a fraudulent use of our flag by foreigners.

Recent experience has shown that the provisions in our existing laws which relate to the sale and transfer of American vessels while abroad, are extremely defective. Advantage has been taken of these defects to give to vessels wholly belonging to foreigners, and navigating the ocean, an apparent American ownership. This character has been so well simulated as to afford them comparative security in prosecuting the slave trade, a traffic emphatically denounced in our statutes, regarded with abhorrence by our citizens, and of which the effectual suppression is nowhere more sincerely desired than in the United States. These circumstances make it proper to recommend to your early attention a careful revision of these laws, so that, without impeding the freedom and facilities of our navigation, or impairing an important branch of our industry connected with it, the integrity and honor of our flag may be carefully preserved. Information derived from our Consul at Havana, showing the necessity of this, was communicated to a committee of the Senate near the close of the last session, but too late, as it appeared, to be acted upon. It will be brought to your notice by the proper department, with additional communications from other sources.

The latest accounts from the Exploring Expedition represent it as proceeding successfully in its objects, and promising results no less useful to trade and navigation than to science.

The extent of post roads covered by mail service on the first of July last, was about 133,999 miles, and the rate of annual transportation upon them 34,496,878 miles. The number of post offices on that day was twelve thousand seven hundred and eighty, and on the thirtieth ultimo, thirteen thousand and twenty-eight.

The revenue of the Post Office Department for the year ending with the 30th of June last, was four million four hundred and seventy-six thousand six hundred and thirty-eight dollars—exhibiting an increase over the preceding year of two hundred and forty-one thousand five hundred and sixty dollars. The engagements and liabilities of the Department for the same period are four million six hundred and twenty-four thousand one hundred and seventeen dollars.

The excess of liabilities over the revenue for the last two years has been met out of the surplus which had previously accumulated. The cash on hand on the thirtieth ultimo, was about $206,701 95, and the current income of the Department varies very little from the rate of current expenditures. Most of the service suspended last year has been restored, and most of the new routes established by the act of 7th July, 1838, have been set in operation at an annual cost of $136,963. Notwithstanding the pecuniary difficulties of the country, the revenue of the Department appears to be increasing; and unless it shall be seriously checked by the recent suspension of payment by so many of the banks, it will be able not only to maintain the present mail service, but in a short time to extend it. It is gratifying to witness the promptitude and fidelity with which the agents of this Department in general perform their public duties.

Some difficulties have arisen in relation to contracts for the transportation of the mails by railroad and steamboat companies. It appears that the maximum of compensation provided by Congress for the transportation of the mails upon railroads is not sufficient to induce some of the companies to convey them at such hours as are required for the accommodation of the public. It is one of the most important duties of the General Government to provide and maintain for the use of the people of the States the best practicable mail establishment. To arrive at that end it is indispensable that the Post Office Department shall be enabled to control the hours at which the mails shall be carried over railroads, as it now does over all other roads. Should serious inconveniences arise from the inadequacy of the compensation now provided by law, or from unreasonable demands by any of the railroad companies, the subject is of such general importance as to require the prompt attention of Congress.

In relation to steamboat lines, the most efficient remedy is obvious, and has been suggested by the Postmaster General. The War and Navy Departments already employ steamboats in their service, and although it is by no means desirable that the Government should undertake the transportation of passengers or freight as a business, there can be no reasonable objection to running boats, temporarily, whenever it may be necessary to put down attempts at extortion, to be discontinued as soon as reasonable contracts can be obtained.

The suggestions of the Postmaster General relative to the inadequacy of the legal allowance to witnesses in cases of prosecutions for mail depredations, merit your serious consideration. The safety of the mails requires that such prosecutions shall be efficient, and justice to the citizen whose time is required to be given to the public, demands not only that his expenses shall be paid, but that he shall receive a reasonable compensation.

The Reports from the War, Navy and Post Office Departments will accompany this communication, and one from the Treasury Department will be presented to Congress in a few days.

For various details in respect to the matters in charge of these departments, I would refer you to those important documents, satisfied that you will find in them many valuable suggestions, which will be found well deserving the attention of the Legislature.

From a report made in December of last year by the Secretary of State, to the Senate, showing the trial docket of each of the Circuit Courts, and the number of miles each judge has to travel in the performance of his duties, a great inequality appears in the amount of labor assigned to each judge. The number of terms to be held in each of the courts composing the ninth circuit, the distances between the places at which they sit, and from thence to the seat of Government, are represented to be such as to render it impossible for the judge of that circuit to perform, in a manner corresponding with the public exigencies, his term and circuit duties. A revision, therefore, of the present arrangement of the circuits seems to be called for, and is recommended to your notice.

I think it proper to call your attention to the power assumed by Territorial Legislatures to authorize the issue of bonds by corporate companies on the guarantee of the Territory. Congress passed a law in 1836, providing that no act of a Territorial Legislature incorporating banks should have the force of law until approved by Congress, but acts of a very exceptionable character previously passed by the Legislature of Florida, were suffered to remain in force, by virtue of which bonds may be issued to a very large amount by those institutions, upon the faith of the Territory. A resolution intending to be a joint one passed the Senate at the same session, expressing the sense of Congress that the laws in question ought not to be permitted to remain in force unless amended in many material respects, but it failed in the House of Representatives for want of time, and the desired amendments have not been made. The interests involved are of great importance, and the subject deserves your early and careful attention.

The continued agitation of the question relative to the best mode of keeping and disbursing the public money, still injuriously affects the business of the country. The suspension of specie payments in 1837, rendered the use of deposite banks, as prescribed by the act of 1836, a source rather of embarrassment than aid, and of necessity placed the custody of most of the public money afterwards collected in charge of the public officers. The new securities for its safety, which this required, were a principal cause of my convening an extra session of Congress; but in consequence of a disagreement between the two Houses, neither then, nor at any subsequent period, has there been any legislation on the subject. The effort made at the last session to obtain the authority of Congress to punish the use of public money for private purposes as a crime, a measure attended under other Governments with signal advantage, was also unsuccessful, from diversities of opinion in that body, notwithstanding the anxiety doubtless felt by it to afford every practicable security. The result of this is still to leave the custody of the public money without those safeguards which have been for several years earnestly desired by the Executive; and as the remedy is only to be found in the action of the Legislature, it imposes on me the duty of again submitting to you the propriety of passing a law, providing for the safe keeping of the public moneys, and especially to ask that its use for private purposes by any officers entrusted with it, may be declared to be a felony, punishable with penalties proportioned to the magnitude of the offence.

These circumstances, added to known defects in the existing laws, and unusual derangement in the general operations of trade, have, during the last three years, much increased the difficulties attendant on the collection, keeping, and disbursement of the revenue, and called forth corresponding exertions from those having them in charge. Happily these have been successful beyond expectation. Vast sums have been collected and disbursed by the several Departments with unexpected cheapness and ease; transfers have been readily made to every part of the Union, however distant; and defalcations have been far less than might have been anticipated, from the absence of adequate legal restraints. Since the officers of the Treasury and Post Office Departments were charged with the custody of most of the public moneys received by them, there have been collected sixty-six millions of dollars, and, excluding the case of the late collector at New York, the aggregate amount of losses sustained in the collection cannot, it is believed, exceed sixty thousand dollars. The defalcation of the late collector at that city, of the extent and circumstances of which Congress has been fully informed, ran through all the modes of keeping the public money that have been hitherto in use, and was distinguished by an aggravated disregard of duty, that broke through the restraints of every system, and cannot, therefore, be usefully referred to as a test of the comparative safety of either. Additional information will also be furnished by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a call made upon that officer by the House of Representatives at the last session, requiring detailed information on the subject of defaults by public officers or agents under each Administration, from 1789 to 1837. This document will be submitted to you in a few days. The general results, (independent of the Post Office, which is kept separately, and will be stated by itself,) so far as they bear upon this subject, are, that the losses which have been, and are likely to be, sustained, by any class of agents, have been—the greatest by banks, including, as required in the resolution, their depreciated paper received for public dues; that the next largest have been by disbursing officers, and the least by collectors and receivers. If the losses on duty bonds are included, they alone will be threefold those by both collectors and receivers. Our whole experience, therefore, furnishes the strongest evidence that the desired legislation of Congress is alone wanting to insure in those operations the highest degree of security and facility. Such also appears to have been the experience of other nations. From the results of inquiries made by the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the practice among them, I am enabled to state that in twenty-two out of twenty-seven foreign Governments, from which undoubted information has been obtained, the public moneys are kept in charge of public officers. This concurrence of opinion in favor of that system is perhaps as great as exists on any question of internal administration.

In the modes of business and official restraints on disbursing officers, no legal change was produced by the suspension of specie payments. The report last referred to will be found to contain also much useful information in relation to this subject.

I have heretofore assigned to Congress my reasons for believing that the establishment of an Independent National Treasury, as contemplated by the Constitution, is necessary to the safe action of the Federal Government. The suspension of specie payments in 1837, by the banks having the custody of the public money, showed in so alarming a degree our dependence on those institutions for the performance of duties required by law, that I then recommended the entire dissolution of that connection. This recommendation has been subjected, as I desired it should be, to severe scrutiny and animated discussion; and I allow myself to believe that, notwithstanding the natural diversities of opinion which may be anticipated on all subjects involving such important considerations, it has secured in its favor as general a concurrence of public sentiment as could be expected on one of such magnitude.

Recent events have also continued to develope new objections to such a connection. Seldom is any bank, under the existing system and practice, able to meet, on demand, all its liabilities for deposites and notes in circulation. It maintains specie payments, and transacts a profitable business, only by the confidence of the public in its solvency; and whenever this is destroyed, the demands of its depositors and noteholders—pressed more rapidly than it can make collections from its debtors—force it to stop payment. This loss of confidence with its consequences occurred in 1837, and afforded the apology of the banks for their suspension. The public then acquiesced in the validity of the excuse; and, while the State Legislatures did not exact from them their forfeited charters, Congress, in accordance with the recommendation of the Executive, allowed them time to pay over the public money they held, although compelled to issue Treasury notes to supply the deficiency thus created.

It now appears that there are other motives than a want of public confidence under which the banks seek to justify themselves in a refusal to meet their obligations. Scarcely were the country and Government relieved, in a degree, from the difficulties occasioned by the general suspension of 1837, when a partial one, occurring within thirty months of the former, produced new and serious embarrassments, though it had no palliation in such circumstances as were alleged in justification of that which had previously taken place. There was nothing in the condition of the country to endanger a well managed banking institution; commerce was deranged by no foreign war; every branch of manufacturing industry was crowned with rich rewards; and the more than usual abundance of our harvests, after supplying our domestic wants, had left our granaries and storehouses filled with a surplus for exportation. It is in the midst of this, that an irredeemable and depreciated paper currency is entailed upon the people by a large portion of the banks. They are not driven to it by the exhibition of a loss of public confidence, or of a sudden pressure from their depositors or note-holders, but they excuse themselves by alleging that the current of business, and exchange with foreign countries, which draws the precious metals from their vaults, would require, in order to meet it, a larger curtailment of their loans to a comparatively small portion of the community, than it will be convenient for them to bear, or perhaps safe for the banks to exact. The plea has ceased to be one of necessity. Convenience and policy are now deemed sufficient to warrant these institutions in disregarding their solemn obligations. Such conduct is not merely an injury to individual creditors, but it is a wrong to the whole community, from whose liberality they hold most valuable privileges—whose rights they violate, whose business they derange, and the value of whose property they render unstable and insecure. It must be evident that this new ground for bank suspensions, in reference to which their action is not only disconnected with, but wholly independent of, that of the public, gives a character to their suspensions more alarming than any which they exhibited before, and greatly increases the impropriety of relying on the banks in the transactions of the Government.

A large and highly respectable portion of our banking institutions are, it affords me unfeigned pleasure to state, exempted from all blame on account of this second delinquency. They have, to their great credit, not only continued to meet their engagements, but have even repudiated the grounds of suspension now resorted to. It is only by such a course that the confidence and good will of the community can be preserved, and, in the sequel, the best interests of the institutions themselves promoted.

New dangers to the banks are also daily disclosed from the extension of that system of extravagant credit of which they are the pillars. Formerly our foreign commerce was principally founded on an exchange of commodities, including the precious metals, and leaving in its transactions but little foreign debt. Such is not now the case. Aided by the facilities afforded by the banks, mere credit has become too commonly the basis of trade. Many of the banks themselves, not content with largely stimulating this system among others, have usurped the business, while they impair the stability, of the mercantile community: they have become borrowers instead of lenders; they establish their agencies abroad; they deal largely in stocks and merchandise; they encourage the issue of State securities until the foreign market is glutted with them; and, unsatisfied with the legitimate use of their own capital and the exercise of their lawful privileges, they raise, by large loans, additional means for every variety of speculation. The disasters attendant on this deviation from the former course of business in this country, are now shared alike by banks and individuals, to an extent of which there is perhaps no previous example in the annals of our country. So long as a willingness of the foreign lender, and a sufficient export of our productions to meet any necessary partial payments, leave the flow of credit undisturbed, all appears to be prosperous; but as soon as it is checked by any hesitation abroad, or by an inability to make payment there in our productions, the evils of the system are disclosed. The paper currency which might serve for domestic purposes, is useless to pay the debt due in Europe. Gold and silver are therefore drawn, in exchange for their notes, from the banks. To keep up their supply of coin, these institutions are obliged to call upon their own debtors, who pay them principally in their own notes, which are as unavailable to them as they are to the merchants to meet the foreign demand. The calls of the banks, therefore, in such emergencies, of necessity, exceed that demand, and produce a corresponding curtailment of their accommodations and of the currency, at the very moment when the state of trade renders it most inconvenient to be borne. The intensity of this pressure on the community is in proportion to the previous liberality of credit and consequent expansion of the currency; forced sales of property are made at the time when the means of purchasing are most reduced, and the worst calamities to individuals are only at last arrested, by an open violation of their obligations by the banks, a refusal to pay specie for their notes, and an imposition upon the community of a fluctuating and depreciated currency.

These consequences are inherent in the present system. They are not influenced by the banks being large or small, created by National or State Governments. They are the results of the irresistible laws of trade and credit. In the recent events which have so strikingly illustrated the certain effects of these laws, we have seen the bank of the largest capital in the Union, established under a National charter, and lately strengthened, as we were authoritatively informed, by exchanging that for a State charter, with new and unusual privileges—in a condition too, as it was said, of entire soundness and great prosperity—not merely unable to resist these effects, but the first to yield to them.

Nor is it to be overlooked that there exists a chain of necessary dependence among these institutions which obliges them, to a great extent, to follow the course of others, notwithstanding its injustice to their own immediate creditors, or injury to the particular community in which they are placed. This dependence of a bank, which is in proportion to the extent of its debts for circulation and deposites, is not merely on others in its own vicinity, but on all those which connect it with the centre of trade. Distant banks may fail, without seriously affecting those in our principal commercial cities; but the failure of the latter is felt at the extremities of the Union. The suspension at New York, in 1837, was every where, with very few exceptions, followed, as soon as it was known; that recently at Philadelphia immediately affected the banks of the South and West in a similar manner. This dependence of our whole banking system on the institutions in a few large cities, is not found in the laws of their organization, but in those of trade and exchange. The banks at that centre to which currency flows, and where it is required in payments for merchandise, hold the power of controlling those in regions whence it comes, while the latter possess no means of restraining them; so that the value of individual property, and the prosperity of trade, through the whole interior of the country, are made to depend on the good or bad management of the banking institutions in the great seats of trade on the seaboard.

But this chain of dependence does not stop here. It does not terminate at Philadelphia or New York. It reaches across the ocean, and ends in London, the centre of the credit system. The same laws of trade, which give to the banks in our principal cities power over the whole banking system of the United States, subject the former, in their turn, to the money power in Great Britain. It is not denied that the suspension of the New York banks in 1837, which was followed in quick succession throughout the Union, was produced by an application of that power; and it is now alleged, in extenuation of the present condition of so large a portion of our banks, that their embarrassments have arisen from the same cause.

From this influence they cannot now entirely escape, for it has its origin in the credit currencies of the two countries; it is strengthened by the current of trade and exchange, which centres in London, and is rendered almost irresistible by the large debts contracted there by our merchants, our banks, and our States. It is thus that an introduction of a new bank into the most distant of our villages, places the business of that village within the influence of the money power in England. It is thus that every new debt which we contract in that country, seriously affects our own currency, and extends over the pursuits of our citizens its powerful influence. We cannot escape from this by making new banks, great or small, State or National. The same chains which bind those now existing to the centre of this system of paper credit, must equally fetter every similar institution we create. It is only by the extent to which this system has been pushed of late, that we have been made fully aware of its irresistible tendency to subject our own banks and currency to a vast controlling power in a foreign land; and it adds a new argument to those which illustrate their precarious situation. Endangered in the first place by their own mismanagement, and again by the conduct of every institution which connects them with the centre of trade in our own country, they are yet subjected, beyond all this, to the effect of whatever measures policy, necessity, or caprice, may induce those who control the credits of England to resort to. I mean not to comment upon these measures present or past, and much less to discourage the prosecution of fair commercial dealing between the two countries, based on reciprocal benefits; but it having now been made manifest that the power of inflicting these and similar injuries, is, by the resistless law of a credit currency and credit trade, equally capable of extending their consequences through all the ramifications of our banking system, and by that means indirectly obtaining, particularly when our banks are used as depositories of the public moneys, a dangerous political influence in the United States, I have deemed it my duty to bring the subject to your notice, and ask for it your serious consideration.

Is an argument required beyond the exposition of these facts, to show the impropriety of using our banking institutions as depositories of the public money? Can we venture not only to encounter the risk of their individual and mutual mismanagement, but, at the same time, to place our foreign and domestic policy entirely under the control of a foreign moneyed interest? To do so is to impair the independence of our Government, as the present credit system has already impaired the independence of our banks. It is to submit all its important operations, whether of peace or war, to be controlled or thwarted at first by our own banks, and then by a power abroad greater than themselves. I cannot bring myself to depict the humiliation to which this Government and people might be sooner or later reduced, if the means for defending their rights are to be made dependent upon those who may have the most powerful of motives to impair them.

Nor is it only in reference to the effect of this state of things on the independence of our Government or of our banks, that the subject presents itself for consideration; it is to be viewed also in its relations to the general trade of our country. The time is not long past when a deficiency of foreign crops was thought to afford a profitable market for the surplus of our industry; but now we await with feverish anxiety the news of the English harvest, not so much from motives of commendable sympathy, but fearful lest its anticipated failure should narrow the field of credit there. Does not this speak volumes to the patriot? Can a system be beneficent, wise, or just, which creates greater anxiety for interests dependent on foreign credit, than for the general prosperity of our own country, and the profitable exportation of the surplus produce of our labor?

The circumstances to which I have thus adverted appear to me to afford weighty reasons, developed by late events, to be added to those which I have on former occasions offered, when submitting to your better knowledge and discernment the propriety of separating the custody of the public money from banking institutions. Nor has any thing occurred to lessen, in my opinion, the force of what has been heretofore urged. The only ground on which that custody can be desired by the banks, is the profitable use which they may make of the money. Such use would be regarded in individuals as a breach of trust, or a crime of great magnitude, and yet it may be reasonably doubted whether, first and last, it is not attended with more mischievous consequences, when permitted to the former than to the latter. The practice of permitting the public money to be used by its keepers as here, is believed to be peculiar to this country, and to exist scarcely any where else. To procure it here, improper influences are appealed to; unwise connections are established between the Government and vast numbers of powerful State institutions; other motives than the public good are brought to bear both on the Executive and Legislative departments, and selfish combinations, leading to special legislation, are formed. It is made the interest of banking institutions and their stockholders throughout the Union to use their exertions for the increase of taxation and the accumulation of a surplus revenue; and, while an excuse is afforded, the means are furnished for those excessive issues which lead to extravagant trading and speculation, and are the forerunners of a vast debt abroad, and a suspension of the banks at home.

Impressed, therefore, as I am, with the propriety of the funds of the Government being withdrawn from the private use of either banks or individuals, and the public money kept by duly appointed public agents; and believing, as I do, that such also is the judgment which discussion, reflection and experience have produced on the public mind, I leave the subject with you. It is, at all events, essential to the interests of the community and the business of the Government, that a decision should be made.

Most of the arguments that dissuade us from employing banks, in the custody and disbursement of the public money, apply with equal force to the receipt of their notes for public dues. The difference is only in form. In one instance, the Government is a creditor for its deposites, and in the other for the notes it holds. They afford the same opportunity for using the public moneys, and equally lead to all the evils attendant upon it, since a bank can as safely extend its discounts on a deposite of its notes in the hands of a public officer, as on one made in its own vaults. On the other hand, it would give to the Government no greater security, for, in case of failure, the claim of the noteholder would be no better than that of a depositor.

I am aware that the danger of inconvenience to the public, and unreasonable pressure upon sound banks, have been urged as objections to requiring the payment of the revenue in gold and silver. These objections have been greatly exaggerated. From the best estimates we may safely fix the amount of specie in the country at eighty-five millions of dollars, and the portion of that which would be employed at any one time in the receipts and disbursements of the Government, even if the proposed change were made at once, would not, it is now, after fuller investigation, believed, exceed four or five millions. If the change were gradual, several years would elapse before that sum would be required, with annual opportunities in the mean time to alter the law, should experience prove it to be oppressive or inconvenient. The portions of the community on whose business the change would immediately operate, are comparatively small, nor is it believed that its effect would be in the least unjust or injurious to them.

In the payment of duties, which constitute by far the greater portion of the revenue, a very large proportion is derived from foreign commission houses and agents of foreign manufacturers, who sell the goods consigned to them, generally, at auction, and after paying the duties out of the avails, remit the rest abroad in specie or its equivalent. That the amount of duties should, in such cases, be also retained in specie, can hardly be made a matter of complaint. Our own importing merchants, by whom the residue of the duties is paid, are not only peculiarly interested in maintaining a sound currency, which the measure in question will especially promote, but are, from the nature of their dealings, best able to know when specie will be needed, and to procure it with the least difficulty or sacrifice. Residing, too, almost universally in places where the revenue is received, and where the drafts used by the Government for its disbursements must concentrate, they have every opportunity to obtain and use them in place of specie, should it be for their interest or convenience. Of the number of these drafts, and the facilities they may afford, as well as of the rapidity with which the public funds are drawn and disbursed, an idea may be formed from the fact that, of nearly twenty millions of dollars paid to collectors and receivers during the present year, the average amount in their hands at any one time has not exceeded a million and a half; and of the fifteen millions received by the collector of New York alone during the present year, the average amount held by him, subject to draft during each week, has been less than half a million.

The ease and safety of the operations of the Treasury in keeping the public money, are promoted by the application of its own drafts to the public dues. The objection arising from having them too long outstanding, might be obviated, and they yet made to afford to merchants and banks holding them an equivalent for specie, and in that way greatly lessen the amount actually required. Still less inconvenience will attend the requirement of specie in purchases of public lands. Such purchases, except when made on speculation, are, in general, but single transactions, rarely repeated by the same person; and it is a fact, that for the last year and a half, during which the notes of sound banks have been received, more than a moiety of these payments has been voluntarily made in specie, being a larger proportion than would have been required in three years under the graduation proposed.

It is moreover a principle than which none is better settled by experience, that the supply of the precious metals will always be found adequate to the uses for which they are required. They abound in countries where no other currency is allowed. In our own States, where small notes are excluded, gold and silver supply their place. When driven to their hiding places by bank suspensions, a little firmness in the community soon restores them in a sufficient quantity for ordinary purposes. Postage and other public dues have been collected in coin, without serious inconvenience, even in States where a depreciated paper currency has existed for years, and this, with the aid of Treasury notes for a part of the time, was done without interruption during the suspension of 1837. At the present moment, the receipts and disbursements of the Government are made in legal currency in the largest portion of the Union—no one suggests a departure from this rule; and if it can now be successfully carried out, it will be surely attended with even less difficulty when bank notes are again redeemed in specie.

Indeed I cannot think that a serious objection would any where be raised to the receipt and payment of gold and silver in all public transactions, were it not from an apprehension that a surplus in the Treasury might withdraw a large portion of it from circulation, and lock it up unprofitably in the public vaults. It would not, in my opinion, be difficult to prevent such an inconvenience from occurring; but the authentic statements which I have already submitted to you in regard to the actual amount in the public Treasury at any one time during the period embraced in them, and the little probability of a different state of the Treasury for at least some years to come, seem to render it unnecessary to dwell upon it. Congress, moreover, as I have before observed, will in every year have an opportunity to guard against it, should the occurrence of any circumstances lead us to apprehend injury from this source. Viewing the subject in all its aspects, I cannot believe that any period will be more auspicious than the present for the adoption of all measures necessary to maintain the sanctity of our own engagements, and to aid in securing to the community that abundant supply of the precious metals which adds so much to their prosperity, and gives such increased stability to all their dealings.

In a country so commercial as ours, banks in some form will probably always exist; but this serves only to render it the more incumbent on us, notwithstanding the discouragements of the past, to strive in our respective stations to mitigate the evils they produce: to take from them as rapidly as the obligations of public faith and a careful consideration of the immediate interests of the community will permit, the unjust character of monopolies: to check so far as may be practicable by prudent legislation, those temptation of interest and those opportunities for their dangerous indulgence, which beset them on every side, and to confine them strictly to the performance of their paramount duty, that of aiding the operations of commerce, rather than consulting their own exclusive advantage. These and other salutary reforms may, it is believed, be accomplished without the violation of any of the great principles of the social compact, the observance of which is indispensable to its existence, or interfering in any way with the useful and profitable employment of real capital.

Institutions so framed have existed and still exist elsewhere, giving to commercial intercourse all necessary facilities, without inflating or depreciating the currency, or stimulating speculation. Thus accomplishing their legitimate ends, they have gained the surest guarantee for their protection and encouragement in the good will of the community. Among a people so just as ours the same results could not fail to attend a similar course. The direct supervision of the banks belongs, from the nature of our Government, to the States who authorize them. It is to their Legislatures that the people must mainly look for action on that subject. But as the conduct of the Federal Government in the management of its revenue has also a powerful though less immediate influence upon them, it becomes our duty to see that a proper direction is given to it. While the keeping of the public revenue in a separate and Independent Treasury, and of collecting it in gold and silver, will have a salutary influence on the system of paper credit with which all banks are connected, and thus aid those that are sound and well managed, it will at the same time sensibly check such as are otherwise, by at once withholding the means of extravagance afforded by the public funds, and restraining them from excessive issues of notes which they would be constantly called upon to redeem.

I am aware it has been urged that this control may be best attained and exerted by means of a National Bank. The constitutional objections, which I am well known to entertain, would prevent me in any event from proposing or assenting to that remedy; but in addition to this, I cannot, after past experience, bring myself to think that it can any longer be extensively regarded as effective for such a purpose. The history of the late National Bank through all its mutations shows that it was not so. On the contrary, it may, after a careful consideration of the subject, be, I think, safely stated, that at every period of banking excess it took the lead; that in 1817, and 1818, in 1823, in 1831, and in 1834, its vast expansions, followed by distressing contractions, led to those of the State institutions. It swelled and maddened the tides of the banking system, but seldom allayed, or safely directed them. At a few periods only was a salutary control exercised, but an eager desire, on the contrary, exhibited for profit in the first place; and if, afterwards, its measures were severe towards other institutions, it was because its own safety compelled it to adopt them. It did not differ from them in principle or in form; its measures emanated from the same spirit of gain; it felt the same temptation to overissues; it suffered from, and was totally unable to avert, those inevitable laws of trade, by which it was itself affected equally with them; and at least on one occasion, at an early day, it was saved only by extraordinary exertions from the same fate that attended the weakest institution it professed to supervise. In 1837 it failed, equally with others, in redeeming its notes, though the two years allowed by its charter for that purpose had not expired, a large amount of which remains to the present time outstanding. It is true, that having so vast a capital, and strengthened by the use of all the revenues of the Government, it possessed more power; but while it was itself, by that circumstance, freed from the control which all banks require, its paramount object and inducement were left the same—to make the most for its stockholders, not to regulate the currency of the country. Nor has it, as far as we are advised, been found to be greatly otherwise elsewhere. The national character given to the Bank of England, has not prevented excessive fluctuations in their currency, and it proved unable to keep off a suspension of specie payments, which lasted for nearly a quarter of a century. And why should we expect it to be otherwise? A national institution, though deriving its charter from a different source than the State banks, is yet constituted upon the same principles; is conducted by men equally exposed to temptation; and is liable to the same disasters; with the additional disadvantage that its magnitude occasions an extent of confusion and distress which the mismanagement of smaller institutions could not produce. It can scarcely be doubted that the recent suspension of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania—of which the effects are felt not in that State alone, but over half the Union—had its origin in a course of business commenced while it was a national institution; and there is no good reason for supposing that the same consequences would not have followed, had it still derived its powers from the General Government. It is in vain, when the influences and impulses are the same, to look for a difference in conduct or results. By such creations, we do therefore but increase the mass of paper credit and paper currency, without checking their attendant evils and fluctuations. The extent of power and the efficiency of organization which we give, so far from being beneficial, are in practice positively injurious. They strengthen the chain of dependence throughout the Union, subject all parts more certainly to common disaster, and bind every bank more effectually, in the first instance, to those of our commercial cities, and, in the end, to a foreign power. In a word, I cannot but believe that, with the full understanding of the operations of our banking system which experience has produced, public sentiment is not less opposed to the creation of a National Bank for purposes connected with currency and commerce, than for those connected with the fiscal operations of the Government.

Yet the commerce and currency of the country are suffering evils from the operations of the State banks which can not and ought not to be overlooked. By their means, we have been flooded with a depreciated paper, which it was evidently the design of the framers of the Constitution to prevent, when they required Congress to "coin money and regulate the value of foreign coins," and when they forbade the States "to coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts," or "pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." If they did not guard more explicitly against the present state of things, it was because they could not have anticipated that the few banks then existing were to swell to an extent which would expel to so great a degree the gold and silver, for which they had provided, from the channels of circulation, and fill them with a currency that defeats the objects they had in view. The remedy for this must chiefly rest with the States from whose legislation it has sprung. No good that might accrue in a particular case from the exercise of powers, not obviously conferred on the General Government, would authorize its interference, or justify a course that might, in the slightest degree, increase, at the expense of the States, the power of the Federal authorities—nor do I doubt that the States will apply the remedy. Within the last few years, events have appealed to them too strongly to be disregarded. They have seen that the Constitution, though theoretically adhered to, is subverted in practice; that while on the statute books there is no legal tender but gold and silver, no law impairing the obligations of contracts, yet that, in point of fact, the privileges conferred on banking corporations have made their notes the currency of the country; that the obligations imposed by these notes are violated under the impulses of interest or convenience; and that the number and power of the persons connected with these corporations, or placed under their influence, give them a fearful weight when their interest is in opposition to the spirit of the Constitution and laws. To the people it is immaterial whether these results are produced by open violations of the latter, or by the workings of a system of which the result is the same. An inflexible execution even of the existing statutes of most of the States, would redress many evils now endured; would effectually show the banks the dangers of mismanagement which impunity encourages them to repeat; and would teach all corporations the useful lesson that they are the subjects of the law and the servants of the people. What is still wanting to effect these objects must be sought in additional legislation; or, if that be inadequate, in such further constitutional grants or restrictions as may bring us back into the path from which we have so widely wandered.

In the meantime, it is the duty of the General Government to co-operate with the States, by a wise exercise of its constitutional powers, and the enforcement of its existing laws. The extent to which it may do so by further enactments, I have already adverted to, and the wisdom of Congress may yet enlarge them. But, above all, it is incumbent upon us to hold erect the principles of morality and law, constantly executing our own contracts in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, and thus serving as a rallying point by which our whole country may be brought back to that safe and honored standard.

Our people will not long be insensible to the extent of the burdens entailed upon them by the false system that has been operating on their sanguine, energetic, and industrious character; nor to the means necessary to extricate themselves from these embarrassments. The weight which presses upon a large portion of the people and the States, is an enormous debt, foreign and domestic. The foreign debt of our States, corporations, and men of business, can scarcely be less than two hundred millions of dollars, requiring more than ten millions of dollars a year to pay the interest. This sum has to be paid out of the exports of the country, and must of necessity cut off imports to that extent, or plunge the country more deeply in debt from year to year. It is easy to see that the increase of this foreign debt must augment the annual demand on the exports to pay the interest, and to the same extent diminish the imports; and in proportion to the enlargement of the foreign debt, and the consequent increase of interest, must be the decrease of the import trade. In lieu of the comforts which it now brings us, we might have our gigantic banking institutions, and splendid, but, in many instances, profitless, railroads and canals, absorbing to a great extent, in interest upon the capital borrowed to construct them, the surplus fruits of national industry for years to come, and securing to posterity no adequate return for the comforts which the labors of their hands might otherwise have secured. It is not by the increase of this debt that relief is to be sought, but in its diminution. Upon this point, there is, I am happy to say, hope before us; not so much in the return of confidence abroad, which will enable the States to borrow more money, as in a change of public feeling at home, which prompts our people to pause in their career, and think of the means by which debts are to be paid before they are contracted. If we would escape embarrassment, public and private, we must cease to run in debt, except for objects of necessity, or such as will yield a certain return. Let the faith of the States, corporations, and individuals, already pledged, be kept with the most punctilious regard. It is due to our national character, as well as to justice, that this should on the part of each be a fixed principle of conduct. But it behooves us all to be more chary in pledging it hereafter. By ceasing to run in debt, and applying the surplus of our crops and incomes to the discharge of existing obligations, buying less and selling more, and managing all affairs, public and private, with strict economy and frugality, we shall see our country soon recover from a temporary depression, arising not from natural and permanent causes, but from those I have enumerated, and advance with renewed vigor in her career of prosperity.

Fortunately for us, at this moment, when the balance of trade is greatly against us, and the difficulty of meeting it enhanced by the disturbed state of our money affairs, the bounties of Providence have come to relieve us from the consequences of past errors. A faithful application of the immense results of the labors of the last season will afford partial relief for the present, and perseverance in the same course will, in due season, accomplish the rest. We have had full experience, in times past, of the extraordinary results which can, in this respect, be brought about in a short period, by the united and well directed efforts of a community like ours. Our surplus profits, the energy and industry of our population, and the wonderful advantages which Providence has bestowed upon our country, in its climate, its various productions, indispensable to other nations, will, in due time, afford abundant means to perfect the most useful of those objects, for which the States have been plunging themselves of late in embarrassment and debt, without imposing on ourselves or our children such fearful burdens.

But let it be indelibly engraved on our minds that relief is not to be found in expedients. Indebtedness cannot be lessened by borrowing more money, or by changing the form of the debt. The balance of trade is not to be turned in our favor by creating new demands upon us abroad. Our currency cannot be improved by the creation of new banks, or more issues from those which now exist. Although these devices sometimes appear to give temporary relief, they almost invariably aggravate the evil in the end. It is only by retrenchment and reform, by curtailing public and private expenditures, by paying our debts, and by reforming our banking system, that we are to expect effectual relief, security for the future, and an enduring prosperity. In shaping the institutions and policy of the General Government so as to promote, as far as it can with its limited powers, these important ends, you may rely on my most cordial co-operation.

That there should have been, in the progress of recent events, doubts in many quarters, and in some a heated opposition to every change, cannot surprise us. Doubts are properly attendant on all reform; and it is peculiarly in the nature of such abuses as we are now encountering, to seek to perpetuate their power by means of the influence they have been permitted to acquire. It is their result, if not their object, to gain for the few an ascendency over the many, by securing to them a monopoly of the currency, the medium through which most of the wants of mankind are supplied—to produce throughout society a chain of dependence which leads all classes to look to privileged associations for the means of speculation and extravagance,—to nourish, in preference to the manly virtues that give dignity to human nature, a craving desire for luxurious enjoyment and sudden wealth, which renders those who seek them dependent on those who supply them—to substitute for Republican simplicity and economical habits a sickly appetite for effeminate indulgence, and an imitation of that reckless extravagance which impoverished and enslaved the industrious people of foreign lands; and at last, to fix upon us, instead of those equal political rights, the acquisition of which was alike the object and supposed reward of our Revolutionary struggle, a system of exclusive privileges conferred by partial legislation. To remove the influences which had thus gradually grown up among us—to deprive them of their deceptive advantages—to test them by the light of wisdom and truth—to oppose the force which they concentrate in their support—all this was necessarily the work of time, even among a people so enlightened and pure as that of the United States. In most other countries, perhaps, it could only be accomplished through that series of revolutionary movements, which are too often found necessary to effect any great and radical reform; but it is the crowning merit of our institutions, that they create and nourish in the vast majority of our people, a disposition and a power peaceably to remedy abuses which have elsewhere caused the effusion of rivers of blood, and the sacrifice of thousands of the human race. The result thus far is most honorable to the self denial, the intelligence, and the patriotism of our citizens; it justifies the confident hope that they will carry through the reform which has been so well begun, and that they will go still farther than they have yet gone in illustrating the important truth, that a people as free and enlightened as ours, will, whenever it becomes necessary, show themselves to be indeed capable of self-government by voluntarily adopting appropriate remedies for every abuse, and submitting to temporary sacrifices, however great, to insure their permanent welfare.

My own exertions or the furtherance of these desirable objects have been bestowed throughout my official career with a zeal that is nourished by ardent wishes for the welfare of my country, and by an unlimited reliance on the wisdom that marks its ultimate decision on all great and controverted questions. Impressed with the solemn obligations imposed upon me by the Constitution, desirous also of laying before my fellow citizens, with whose confidence and support I have been so highly honored, such measures as appear to me conducive to their prosperity—and anxious to submit to their fullest consideration the grounds upon which my opinions are formed, I have on this, as on preceding occasions, freely offered my views on those points of domestic policy that seem, at the present time, most prominently to require the action of the Government. I know that they will receive from Congress that full and able consideration which the importance of the subjects merit and I can repeat the assurance heretofore made, that I shall cheerfully and readily co-operate with you in every measure that will tend to promote the welfare of the Union.

DECEMBER 2, 1839. M. VAN BUREN.

When the message was read, Mr. ALLEN rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Courtesy has, I am aware, made it the custom for a Senator representing the State from which the President comes, and agreeing with him in political sentiments, to move the printing of his annual message; yet the Senator from New York will, I believe, excuse the deep feeling which prompts me thus to rise, and in the exultation of renewed hope, excited by this paper, for the future security of our institutions and welfare of the people, submit that motion myself.

If, standing in this place, the friend of all, the enemy of none, I may be allowed to address a single request to the whole body of my countrymen, it is, that each man of them will deliberately consider this message, and that part of it, especially, which relates to corporations, banks, and the currency.

To guaranty forever the rights, the happiness of individual man—to protect the feeble against the rapacity of the strong—the whole against the combinations of the parts, by an equal distribution of burdens and of blessings among all—was the cardinal object of our civil institutions. But, notwithstanding this these rights have been violated—this happiness perilled—this rapacity allowed—these combinations formed—and this equality destroyed. These things have been done, and that, too, under the authority of law. Corporations innumerable freckle the face of the land. Corporations which, not content with absolute power over the currency—over the property—over the labor of the entire people, now seek to render themselves immortal, and their dominion complete, by political associations. Hence has arisen the paper system, with all its complexity of fraud and oppression; hence the pending strife between man and monopoly; and hence it is that the world now beholds this nation struggling, like the fabled Laocoon, to disengage its own body, and the bodies of its sons, from the fatal coil of a serpent, whose convulsive energies have compressed those bodies well nigh unto death.

When, in 1837, after the universal crash of the banking system, the President recommended its severance from the Government, and the Government's restoration to its ancient policy, the people, unprepared alike for the ruin around them, or the remedy proposed, remained, for a moment, equally confounded by both. State after State reeled from its perpendicular and slid from his support; politician after politician fled for safety or for succor to the arms of his foes; yet he, almost alone, amidst the general consternation, amidst the desertions of the venal and the shrieks of the timid, stood unappalled—confiding, as he ever has, does, and ever will, in that "sober second thought" of his countrymen, which is "never wrong, and always efficient." And now, sir, sustained by the matured judgment of a grateful people—grateful to him, because he was faithful to them—faithful, even at a time when that very fidelity was at the hazard of their displeasure—the President presents again to his fellow-citizens a chart of principles, by which, if with skill we steer this our political ark, freighted as it is with our hopes and our destinies, it will bear us onward in safety and in peace, however violent the storm of exasperated passions.

Mr. A. concluded by moving that fifteen hundred copies of the message and documents, and five thousand additional copies of the message, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

DEBATE ON THE NEW JERSEY QUESTION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

MONDAY, December 9—In continuation.

The House having under consideration the appeal of Mr. VANDERPOEL from the decision of the CHAIR touching the votes to be counted from New Jersey, and the immediate question pending being as to permitting Mr. DUNCAN to read certain documents—after several gentlemen had addressed the House, as heretofore published—

Mr. COLQUITT of Georgia said, although he did not flatter himself that, at this advanced stage of the debate, he should have it in his power to say any thing new or interesting, he had concluded that, if the process of organization must here be arrested, and their time be occupied by speech making, they had as well at least have variety. Talented gentlemen had time and again addressed this body, and, unless they had been unfortunate in their positions and arguments, from their frequent reiterations of the same sentiments, they certainly, by this time, understood their opinions. If, therefore, said Mr. C. the House is not to be organized, and our time is to be occupied in debate, I trust every gentleman who has not spoken will induct himself in his seat by making a speech. I have a few remarks to make, which I hope will be received with indulgence. In these remarks I have here no party friends to propitiate; I have no political enemies to abuse. I stand here untrammelled by the bonds of party organization—uncontrolled by any consideration, save such as may best comport with the credit and respectability of this body and the honor of our common country. It is surely time that some definite step should be taken. This discussion has continued long enough for the naked purposes of party. An honorable gentleman has said, matter is here to be served up for the people. I protest against the continuance of this discussion, at this time, for any such purpose; and, if enough has not been done and said to excite popular prejudice, and satisfy party management, let gentlemen resort to their party presses, whose managers are ever ready, able, and willing to be the channels of communication to the country; but let it not be done at public cost, and at the expense of our characters as Representatives. It is a pity that this controversy could not have been settled by the contending members from New Jersey among themselves; they ought best to know what should be the ultimate determination. Not having done so, and still unwilling to do so, it is to be met by us. I would ask gentlemen, in all candor, whether, in our present unorganized condition, we possess any powers, either legislative, executive, or judicial? Are we now prepared to pass laws? No member sworn, no quorum formed, no House organized? And can you exercise a still more solemn and important function of a legislative body, by hearing, judging, and determining questions? Surely not. No tribunal has yet been organized competent to pass upon the rights of these claimants. Suppose that you proceed now with the testimony; that you give it a patient and impartial hearing—scrutinize the law of the case—hear attentively every argument—arrive at a just conclusion, and then pronounce your judgment. To what will it all amount? Sir, it will amount emphatically to nothing. You have no power to enforce your decision but by the sword. We have no more right, in our present situation, to adjudicate this question, than any other body of citizens who might assemble on the Capitol Hill. Why, then, read the testimony? Why play off a farce, by going through the form of a trial? We have not taken the oath under the Constitution; we are not yet in office, empowered to decide judicially. Is it assumed that, because we have been elected in our respective States, and have our commissions in our pockets, therefore we have the right to decide that our evidence is good as to our eligibility, while other gentlemen, presenting the same evidence, we declare to be bad? The argument is preposterous—the assumption unjust and arbitrary. Present this question in as many different aspects as you please, and at last, the only sound solution is, by recognising prima facie all who exhibit the testimonials of their States, under the laws of their States, that they are their Representatives. It had never occurred to the framers of the Constitution that party spirit would ever be so excited as to question, before organizing the House, such commission as the State should by law give its members. Such certificates of membership, in accordance with the laws of the States respectively, place all who possess them upon equality. But is is said that it is proper that such as have their seats contested, should stand aside until this question is determined. This opinion frees us from none of the difficulties which now embarrass this meeting. The mere contesting a member's seat cannot, surely, lessen prima facie the validity of the commission which he has received under the law. The certificate or commission which he holds by the law of his State is certainly valid and of force under the Constitution, until, by legal process, it shall be vacated or set aside. And how can this be done until a constitutional tribunal shall be organized? Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. But, by virtue of our elections, and having assembled at the place appointed for the meeting of Congress, are we, before taking the oath of office, constituted judges, with power to vacate and set aside the commissions which are held by State authority? As well might a judge of one of your courts, who had received his appointment, undertake to determine a cause at law before he had taken the oath of office. I regret to hear gentlemen, whose professed sentiments are in accordance with my own on constitutional questions, and with whom, on many subjects, I have expected to act, advance doctrines equally at war with precedent and law, and declare in favor of tearing loose from their trammels, in order to carry out their notions of the popular will.

We must arrive at our rights by legal means, and any assumption or usurpation of power is dangerous, and should be discarded, although it may sometimes happen that we suffer a temporary loss by delay. In the case now before us, if you establish the principle contended for by those who oppose the New Jersey members in taking their seats, the practical result will be that the next Congress must recede and abandon the principle, or this will be the last Congress that will ever be held. High excitement may induce the minority party, chagrined and maddened by defeat, by concert of action, to prepare the means, concoct the plan, and execute their purpose of having the returns of every election in the Union contested; whether well founded or capricious, no judgment could be made, for, as the seats of all would be contested, no judges would be left to decide, and consequently no House could be formed. The necessity exists of recognising such members as are commissioned by the authorities of their respective States, as primarily entitled to their seats. Organize the House, and you have then formed a tribunal competent to collect testimony, examine witnesses, and decide such seats as may be contested; and every such judgment and decision would be the law of that particular case, and capable of being executed and enforced. Until these regular steps are taken, no body or assemblage of men can tear a member's commission from his hands, or deny him the privileges granted to others. Such a contest as the present may not often arise. The equal division of parties, connected with the members gained or lost by the decision now to be made, arrays gentlemen under their party banners, resolving to fight over every inch of ground which may be made available in the contest. As I belong to neither of the great parties that divide the Hall, I am prepared to aid either in carrying out such principles and measures as I may think consistent with the laws and the Constitution. But it is urged that permitting gentlemen to take their seats who, after examination, shall be found to have been rejected by the people, may do great injustice by participating in some of its most important business. This is true, and against which I would raise my voice by way of caution, and beg of gentlemen for their own sake, for the sake of the House, and for the sake of the party of which they are members, to make no feigned issue, to exercise no technical advantage, claim no honors of which investigation will strip them, take no seat of which they may be ultimately deprived to their mortification and disgrace. No party should be so anxious for power as to press the claims of those who are not the choice of their constituents, and such advantage now would of necessity result to its injury in the end.

This fear of injury from a false step or improper position is ordinarily of sufficient force to prevent imposition, and it is all that is recognised under our form of Government. The adoption of any other principle or organization than the receiving such as were commissioned under authority of law, would leave us without a guide. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] insisted upon the propriety of reading other testimony, of introducing the polls, and then stopping the inquiry. He asserts that the clerks held back the returns for fraudulent purposes, and that the returns give a majority of the votes to the contesting members. Examine the position that he occupies, and see the result. We must take his word that the clerks, the Governor, and the commissioned delegates are all of the same politics—into this matter we can make no inquiry. We must take his word that the clerks fraudulently held back the returns, in order to defeat the election of the contesting members, and no testimony can be introduced, if any such exists, to show that they added to the polls after the election, that the returns were held back for the aid and benefit of the contesting members. The gentleman desires to go behind the commission by producing the poll book, and yet granted we could not purge the ballot boxes. Do you not perceive, sir, that this system would be unjust? If we commence the trial, we should go through with the trial; which, for the reasons I have already given, we are incompetent to do in our present condition. If the clerks and the Governor have practised a fraud upon the people, and by trick and management have commissioned delegates against their will, the party whose members are thus defeated may console themselves by knowing that the people know it, and will speak a language to those public servants that they will be compelled to understand. Go on with organizing the House; let the constitutional tribunal be erected; then exhibit the proofs, and if it be such a case as has been represented, I will, by pen, vote, and speech, aid in their expulsion. But shall it be that, regardless of precedent, regardless of the Constitution, and regardless of law, the mere force of numbers shall march on to the accomplishment of their wishes, determine questions important in their bearing, upon ex parte and garbled testimony, and by superior force have their determinations executed? If this be what is understood by Democracy, I, for one, desire to be saved from it. These are not the published opinions of the Democratic party; this is not the faith they profess to believe. Majorities, in no Government, need any protection; laws are in their way; forms, technicalities, and special pleadings, are but cobweb restraints to the arm of power. But they afford the only protection to minorities—their safety consists in holding on to the moral force of the law, in fighting behind the bulwarks of the Constitution, and shielding themselves by all the fixed principles of Government. A majority can move on to the attainment of its purpose, disregarding all these little restraints, and ever and anon, as in their strides they trample down the laws and the Constitution, cry out the people, we are elected by the people, we are the people's friends. It is one of the reasons why majorities are usually the most corrupt—they substitute their wills for the law, and scorn the few and feeble, who urge barriers to interrupt their success. Honorable gentlemen have said that necessity imposes upon us a law. Agreed. But are not the precedents of the House the results of this law of necessity ever since the formation of the Government? And when any body of men urge the law of necessity as a rule of action, they will surely grant that the law ceases with the necessity. This House is in the process of organization. What then is necessary for the completion of this purpose? No more than simply to examine the credentials presented, and see that they are in due form of law; that they have the testimony recognised by the laws of the respective States.

The power necessary to organize surely does not warrant the examination of witnesses and a mock trial before we ourselves have been sworn. The calling the names by the CLERK, commencing at Maine, was for the sake of order, and to prevent confusion. In point of legal right one State had no preference over another; nor one gentleman a greater right to demand that he should first be sworn than another. It is true that, in the rush to the CLERK's desk for qualifications, stronger competitors might crowd me from the aisle—some man more muscular than myself might trample me down; but none would have the right, by virtue of his commission, to say, Stand back; I am worthier than thou. But, in whatever condition as to position I might be found, I could hold up the commission—the authority of my State—and none could dare deny but my authority was as valid as his. It has been said that the certificate of election under the authorities of the State is not prima facie evidence of election, but that "we must go to the polls." If this doctrine be recognised as true, how many gentlemen here can exhibit prima facie evidence that they are entitled to occupy seats on this floor? Sir, have you the polls? Have you? or you? Who has the ballot boxes in his pocket? None; and yet, to suit the New Jersey case, it is insisted that this alone is prima facie evidence. The Governor of New Jersey has been abused. And why? Because he has felt himself constrained to carry out the law of his State. As to the facts in this case I am not yet informed, nor do I intend to be, until I am constituted a judge under the law. It is extremely indelicate, if not unjust, for those before whom a case is to be tried to prejudge its merits, and approve or condemn before hearing all the proofs. The Governor may strictly have discharged his duty under the law, notwithstanding the contesting members may have received a majority of the votes polled at the election. I will mention a case that occurred a few years ago under the laws of the State of Georgia; and I mention it because those gentlemen who are inclined to speak harshly of the Governor of New Jersey will not, dare not, question either the ability or integrity of him who filled the Executive chair at the time of its occurrence. The Hon. John Forsyth was the Governor of Georgia. When, among others, George R. Gilmer was elected a member of Congress, no doubt existed as to his election—it was officially proclaimed; and yet, by the law of Georgia, it was necessary that the member elect should signify his acceptance within —— days. Mr. Gilmer was absent from the State, and, deeming this requisition a mere matter of form, neglected to comply. The Governor, in pursuance of the law, declared the seat vacant, and ordered a new election. This House was not troubled with a contest; a new election took place, when Col. Henry G. Lamar was elected. The Governor, owing his allegiance to his State, and sworn to execute her laws, in the discharge of his duty may thwart the wishes of partisans and excite their ire, when he must receive the approbation of the calm and reflecting. I repeat, sir, that, first of all, let the House be organized in the usual way; then ferret out and expose fraud, if it exists. And should it turn out that the Governor of the State of New Jersey has loaned his high trust to effect the dirty work of party, and prostituted his office to accomplish selfish purposes, the decision that we make and the verdict that we render will tell out, in language that shall burn, our feelings of contempt and indignation.

Mr. NISBET of Georgia said that the importance of the principles involved in this debate was his apology for the remarks he was about to present to the consideration of the House. In the unorganized state of the body, (said Mr. N.) it appears to be necessary that those who address you, Mr. Chairman, should exhibit unquestioned authority to speak. I am one of the delegation from Georgia, sir. I mention this fact, not because I claim for my State any paramount excellence, but because I am solicitous that she should declare here the position she occupies. Strangers as are most of her members in this Hall, it would seem well enough that she be announced. I speak, then, by authority of one of the sovereign States of the Confederacy. I exhibit to you, sir, as my colleague did a few days since, the evidence of her will. I hold in my hand the commission of her Governor, with the great seal of State appended. That seal speaks of her sovereignty—it announces me one of her Representatives. Upon its face is the escutcheon of the State. Her motto is Wisdom, Justice, and Moderation. And, although what I may say, sir, may not be stamped with much of wisdom, yet I trust it will be characterized by justice and moderation.

An honorable gentleman asked, the other day, "Where will the State of Georgia stand upon this question?" He was pleased to say the mangnanimous State of Georgia. He made the inquiry with pride, as I thought, in the character of the State. I am sure I felt an honest pride in hearing my noble State thus designated. The inquiry, sir, thrilled through my spirit. I will tell you, sir; I will tell the gentleman from Maryland where she stands. She stands where her State Rights politicians have planted her in times gone by—she stands upon the ramparts of the Constitution. She stands where she stood when you, sir, administered the Federal Government; when her own great Troup resisted successfully Federal bayonets bristling upon her borders, and Federal usurpation assailing her rights. She stands where she stood when one of her most eloquent sons, now a high officer in the Government, announced upon this floor that "he was ready for trial." She stands now, and I trust will ever stand, the defender of the rights of the States guarantied to them under the Federal Constitution.

Passing over the merely incidental question now more immediately before the House, I shall proceed to consider those points of controversy which have been so much canvassed. From the State of New Jersey, then, it has been announced to us by the CLERK that there are two sets of applicants for the right and honor of representing her in the Congress of the United States. Ten claimants for five seats in this Hall. Both of these contending New Jersey delegations have laid upon the table of the CLERK evidence of elections. One of them exhibit the commission of the Governor of New Jersey, under the seal of the State; the other has evidence, which has not been read, but which, we are told, establishes the fact that they did receive the majority of votes polled by the freemen of New Jersey. This state of facts, sir, involves, to my mind, two inquiries.

First, what is the legal and constitutional rule by which, in this stage of the House, the rights of those conflicting claimants to the honor of representing New Jersey shall be determined?

Second, what is the mode of action to be adopted in making that rule operative? Upon an inquiry made of you, sir, the other day, you, as Chairman of this body, determined that those delegates from New Jersey, holding the evidences of election according to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of New Jersey, should vote upon a question then depending. You thus pronounced a rule by which not only the right of the claimants to seats in this Hall should be ascertained; but also one by which this House should regulate its action. I agree with you, sir, that this is the only safe rule. The proposition is true—legally, constitutionally true, and is in accordance with the principles of Government which I have been taught to honor and revere. In the mode of applying this rule, I shall differ with you. The Constitution of the Union is in this case paramount, authoritative, and commanding; it speaks in the voice of injunction. By that instrument it is provided that the States shall by law prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections for members of the Congress of the United States. It also provides for a power in the Congress of the United States to alter by its own legislation the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives. And in all cases where the laws of a State, prescribing the time, place, and manner of electing her Representatives, have not been repealed by Congress, those laws are as obligatory upon all the departments of the State and Federal Governments as the Constitution itself. By failing to exercise the repealing power, Congress and the Constitution do actually confirm, adopt, and ratify those laws. The right of the State to enact them and to have them enforced, becomes thus as perfect as any other right secured to her by constitutional grant or prohibition. The right of selecting her own Representatives, and that, too, in her own way, is a sovereign right, which you, sir, and I, and all others, are bound by all the sanctions of the Federal compact to respect. You will observe, sir, that the States are clothed with power to determine the manner of electing. The manner of electing, sir, must mean the form of certifying and commissioning the elect when the polls are closed, as well as other things. If, then, the laws of New Jersey do declare that the result of her Congressional elections shall be declared, published, and ascertained by the commission of her Governor, under the great seal of the State, such commission, so authenticated, is as obligatory upon us, upon all, as any provision whatever of the Federal Constitution. It, therefore, follows to my mind demonstrably true, that you were right when you announced to the House that those who have the evidence of election according to the Constitution and laws of New Jersey are entitled to sit and vote upon this floor until the House is fully organized, and the equity of the polls of New Jersey have been ascertained by the committee of the House.

But, Mr. Chairman, this rule being conceded, there must be some plan of action by which it may become practically available; otherwise, it is but an ideal abstraction—a name without power—a judgment without a process or a ministerial agent. We are not men, sir, spell-bound with constitutional fatalicisms. We are practical men. Our system of Government is eminently practical; its provisions are designed for use—not for admiration—for deification. The system must work, and thus far, sir, in the main, it has worked well. It was contended in the outset of this debate that the CLERK, the then agent, was bound to respect the Governor's commission, and proceed at once to the call of those men who held it. So thought I. But it will not surely be asserted that he had then the power and authoritative control over this matter, and that there was no power in the House to object to the judgment he might pronounce. You, sir, it seems to me, occupy to the House the same relative position that the CLERK occupied before your nomination to the Chair. You are both but the mere agents of the body who chose to use you, acting only by derived authority—having in yourselves, by virtue of your appointments, no inherent or legal ability to determine conclusively any thing. Would it be contended for a moment that the agent has a power greater than his principal—that, sitting as you do in the very presence of those who appointed you, you can bind them irreversibly by your determinations? Surely not. The CLERK did make a decision, or rather he declined to call any of the claimants from New Jersey—thus in fact rejecting the whole.

It was said that he was bound imperiously, by his oath of office, by the Constitution and laws, to proceed with the call of the Jersey Whigs. He thought differently, and upon that thought he acted. What, then, sir, was to be done? Stand still? We did stand still, and rather ignominiously still. We presented a strange spectacle—the vast machinery of Government of this great empire blocked by the decision of an anomalous officer, for whom no powers have been claimed but those merely ministerial. What not this the time at which the voice of the Constitution became but a creature of the mind? According to the opinion of those who deny to the House the power of acting, were not the Constitution and laws then silent—not in arms, but in peace, silent? The CLERK refused even to put a vote, and by this refusal all the departments of the Government were at rest, for there is in fact no Government whilst a co-ordinate department denies to itself even the power of preliminary organization. So, sir, you determined that those who hold the Governor's commissions should vote. Was your decision imperatively controlling? You pronounced, as I believe, a constitutional truth. But, sir, under your decision, you yourself, with a power above and beyond the House, pronounced judgment under the Constitution and laws; or you clothed your tellers, upon a division of the House, with authority to determine who did in fact hold the evidence of election from New Jersey. From your decision an appeal was taken, and the House, as I believe rightfully, took this matter into its own hands.

But the power to determine at all in the case before us is denied. It is asserted that no man has a right to question here the commission of the Governor of a sovereign State given in conformity with her laws. Sir, I admit the latter proposition, but I contend that there must rest somewhere a power to judge and determine who does, in fact, hold the commission of New Jersey's Governor, given in conformity with New Jersey's laws. And I hold that those who present themselves here as the uncontested Representatives of the States are clothed with that power; and that, so far as this election is concerned, this is the only power with which they are clothed. This is the tribunal to judge of that one fact—to declare and record its judgment, and, when pronounced, the judgment is final. What, sir, if the tribunal determine wrongfully? Suppose it does not pronounce in favor of right and law? Why, sir, those who thus wrongfully determine—who infract the Constitution, and disfranchise a sovereign State, are amenable to conscience, to God, to the Union, and to mankind. Such, sir, I understood your opinion to be the other day, when you so earnestly exhorted the House to organize. Such seems to have been your opinion when, at the last session of Congress, you offered a resolution to meet the contingency which has now occurred. This opinion came to us with the sanction of your great age and great character. You spake as one having authority. It is the opinion of one, around whose venerable head cluster thickly the laurels of politics and of literature. For one, I believed the opinion correct.

I do not claim for the House, in its inorganic state, plenary powers over this contested election. It cannot go behind the evidence upon your table. It cannot purge the New Jersey polls. When organized, by the Constitution it is made the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Then, sir, it can sift the polls, rectify all mistakes, and enforce, in fact, the voice of the voting power. This has been demonstrated by several gentlemen, but by none with more conclusive force than by my friend and colleague [Mr. COOPER.] Who are we? The Representatives of the people, elected under the Constitution of the Union and the laws of the States from whence we come. By State and constitutional mandate we are here, and, when our rights to seats are not questioned, we are, in truth, the House of Representatives, clothed with all powers necessary to full and final organization. The Constitution declares that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected by the several States, &c. And, by constitutional presumption, we are elected when no one questions it. Think you that the Constitution, or, rather, its framers, contemplated for one moment the assemblage of a mob, claiming to be the House of Representatives? No more so than it contemplated any other act of rebellion or of usurpation. The Constitution further provides that the Congress shall assemble, &c. Its language is mandatory. Its command is to assemble, and ex vi termini to organize. How, assemble as an organized body? No, for that is an impracticability. That would be to assume, most absurdly, that to be done, which we are commanded to assemble for the purpose of doing. In all the sessions of both Houses of Congress there is a point of time intervening between the assembling and the organizing of the body—that is the time being. There is also a state of political being, in which we live, and are vital for certain purposes, but are still the inorganic embryo of full maturity. Such is our present state. In this state we must proceed to throw off our chrysalis attributes. Otherwise, we are doomed to perpetual embryo—else we shall remain forever inchoate, and shall continue throughout all time in transitu. The truth is, sir, disguise it as we may, unless we have the power of organization, the Government is dissolved. One of the things to be done, and which is necessary to organization, is to determine who, in case of conflicting claims, are entitled to sit; or, in other words, who, in fact, have the highest and best prima facie evidence of being elected, according to the Constitution and laws of the State from which they come. Do you not perceive, sir, inasmuch as we can do nothing—can discharge none of our appropriate duties until organization—that, therefore, we are necessarily clothed with power to organize? It seems to follow as a matter of course. The law being silent as to the manner of organization, we are left to take such course as enlightened reason, drawing her conclusion from the Constitution by necessary inference, may suggest. We are not yet a House for the asual and great objects of our assembling. We can receive no message from the Executive. We can hold no intercourse with the Senate. We can organize no committees, and cannot perform a single act of legislation. At the threshold stands the obligation to organize. We must do so by electing an officer described in the Constitution as Speaker. We dare not, sir, deprive the State of New Jersey of her right, coequal with that of Georgia, or any other State, to vote in the election of that officer. We have no power thus to disfranchise her. Hence, before that officer is elected, we must determine that somebody does, in fact, for the time being, represent her. From the State of Pennsylvania, I understand, there are two gentlemen claiming seats in this Hall, both bringing with them the commission of a Governor of that State, under her great seal. This is a case not of fancy, but of fact. Upon this case we shall be compelled to act, and that, too, before the House is organized. Upon the assumption of gentlemen, that no vote, no act can be had by us, when the commission of a Governor with the seal of the State appended is presented, both these gentlemen must come in. It is a requirement of the Constitution, say they. Now the Constitution in the case put, commands as much in favor of the one as the other of these gentlemen. What shall be done? Exclude both? No, for then the key-stone of the arch is disfranchised. Admit both? No, for then that great State will have one more Representative than the Constitution gives her. The alternative left is for the members present, constituting a quorum of the whole House, whose seats are uncontested, to determine which of these commissions, and which of their seals is, in truth, according to the laws of Pennsylvania. What I demand is, that the very same determination be made in relation to the contested seats of the New Jersey delegation. Which, sir, of these claimants, has the evidence, prima facie in its character, of election? This is the only inquiry which we have now the power to make, and that we have this power I have endeavored to show.

The most plausible objection which I have heard made to this view of the subject is, that it will always be in the power of parties, by capricious objections to the seats of a quorum of the whole House, to prevent its organization. It has, sir, more of speciousness than of force. In answer, I say, that an extreme possibility is no well founded objection to any course of reasoning. The supposition presents a case when the Government would be in the act of revolution. Against such a possibility neither law, constitutions, nor religion, can wholly guard. The case might occur; so also, then, might arise a Cromwell in our midst, to dissolve the Congress of the Union by military force. But that such a case will occur, both the restraints of law—the moral sense of the people—the love of liberty, the strongest passion of the American people—and the holy sanctions of Christianity, do, and will, I trust, through the ages that are to come, forbid.

Then, sir, the mode of action is for this House to declare and register the judgment of the Constitution and the law. When pronounced, it needs no further enforcement. It stands self-executed. For who shall deny—who modify—who reverse it? Upon this House falls the stern mandate of the Constitution. Upon this House falls the sovereign requirement of New Jersey. Upon this House State Rights principles make their equitable requisitions. Is the Constitution mandatory to you, sir, to admit the Whig delegation from New Jersey? So is it to the House. Are its requirements obligatory, according to the reasoning of the gentleman, upon the CLERK? So are they upon this House. And, whilst I maintain the positions here assumed, I at the same time assert and enforce the principles which my colleagues and others have promulgated.

Mr. Chairman, whilst I assert the right of New Jersey to be heard by her vote in this House, I do not mean to be understood as admitting that either set of applicants can vote in their own case. This is the only question upon which New Jersey cannot be heard. To me, common sense, which is an instinct of our nature, denies to all persons the privilege of voting in a case where their personal or representative rights are concerned. The question is as to the right of A and B to vote. And does it not involve an absurdity upon that question to permit A and B to vote, and thus adjudicate their own privileges? It surely does.

The rules of the House which we have adopted, and all parliamentary usage, so far as I am informed, exclude them. It matters not that they present themselves in a representative character, for it is their rights as such that are to be determined.

Much, sir, has been said in this debate about the sovereign rights of the people. It is claimed that the will of the people of New Jersey shall prevail. Yes, sir, let it prevail. How prevail? Through the agency of her organic law—and here no otherwise. They have spoken through no other voice. They have not spoken in their primary elementary character. They have held no convention. I listen, but I hear not the rattling thunders of popular sovereignty. The Jews of old heard the artillery which pealed around the summit of Sinai, and the sound of a trumpet waxing louder and louder; but in all this they heard not the Godhead; it spake in the still small voice.

So, sir, it is only in the still small, yet clear and steady voice of the law, that I can hear upon this floor the speaking of New Jersey. The organized forms of Government do express the popular will; the people have made them their organs. The laws of the State and the Constitution of the Union are the restraints which the people themselves have placed upon their elementary sovereignty, and are so to be respected until they are repealed or modified. I do not assert that the great seal of New Jersey is the depository of her sovereignty—that the acts of her Governor make him sovereign—but these acts and that seal are the evidence and the expression of the sovereign will. Suppose, sir, that he who, with unsurpassed ability, represents in the Senate of the United States the descendants of your own heroic pilgrim ancestry, should there exhibit the authoritative seal of Massachusetts and the commission of her Governor, who would there venture to assert that he came not in the name of a sovereign State? Or, if he who in that body represents alike the genius, and virtue, and sovereignty of Carolina, should at her bar exhibit the seal of that State, "always prepared, in mind and means," adorned with its chivalric palmetto blazonry, would there be one there so bold as to deny him entrance? So no one here, I trust, will deny those delegates having the highest evidence to enter and sit as the Representatives of New Jersey.

Mr. Chairman, I am unlike the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, who addressed you the other day, born insensible to fear. I fear many things. I fear to do wrong; but I do not fear the trammels of party, or the vengeance of the popular will. In the discharge of duty, the people will scarcely hold me a fit subject for their wrath. Should this House fail to accord seats to the regularly authenticated members from New Jersey, there will have occurred a case of nullification reversed. This has been held a remedy for the States against the Government, but if we abrogate the laws of New Jersey, then does nullification appear in its most odious form. She will then start, in her forays upon the Constitution, from the citadel of the enemy; and an unorganized branch of the Congress of the United States, itself but a co-ordinate department of the Government, will have abrogated, in the House of the people, the laws enacted by the people.

I could but remark, Mr. Chairman, when you addressed us on yesterday, how studiously you avoided recognising the States in their sovereign character—insisting on the rights of the people. And I thought that, contrary to the law which obtains both in morals and physics, extremes had for once met; and that the nationalism of your day was much the same as the dogmas of this.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia begged leave to occupy the attention of the House for a short time, and, before he proceeded, he owed perhaps an apology to the House and the gentleman from Maryland for the manner in which he had for the first time presented himself to its notice. He meant no disrespect to any one here; he had only claimed the right for his colleague [Mr. COLQUITT] to be heard, when other gentlemen, who had spoken repeatedly, were wandering from the incidental question before them, and addressing themselves to the merits of the main proposition. He again asserted the position had had assumed in his claim to the floor, upon the ground that, although the question immediately before the House might be new in its mere form, yet that it was substantially the same that then had been debated for seven days before that body, in proof of which, he referred to the speech just delivered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] and to the reply thereto by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] both of which had been addressed to the merits of the original question. In continuation of that debate, the gentleman from Maryland had risen, and, although there could be doubt but that he believed himself rightfully entitled to the floor, as speaking to a new question, yet (said Mr. BLACK) the gentleman be mistaken—innocently so, without doubt—but not the less so on that account, as he thought he had conclusively shown by reference to the character of the present discussion.

Mr. BLACK said that he, like his honorable colleague [Mr. COLQUITT,] begged leave to exhibit to the House the commission by virtue of which he stood here. It so happens that my credentials of election, and my rights consequent upon that election, are not disputed. So far as he was informed, no man was prepared to dispute them; but, if the rule which has been attempted to be enforced here is ultimately established, he did not know how soon he may be arrested in his Representative capacity, and compelled to go back to Georgia, to gather up the poll books, to ascertain the competency of the presiding officers of election, and the qualifications of every man who had presented himself at the polls and participated in the election, before he would be permitted to take his seat.

The ostensible question now before the House is, whether the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] shall be allowed to proceed with the testimony in behalf of those gentlemen from New Jersey who are claiming their seats here in opposition to the members elect from the State, who have in their possession the commission of the Governor. To such a proposition he must answer in the negative. A grave and important question—one involving the rights of the States and the people of the States in the high and momentous privilege of the elective franchise—is now submitted. To whom it is submitted? To a mere assembly of citizens—to men who, although they may be ultimately entitled to their seats upon this floor, have not as yet produced even the prima facie evidence of their election! State the case as you may, turn it and twist it as you will, "to this complexion it must come at last" Shall we (said Mr. B.) hear testimony, either on one side or the other, before we are constitutionally qualified to act on it? Will you hear the merits of the case before you are in a condition to decide upon it? Who and what are we? (asked Mr. B.) Admit, sir, for the sake of argument, that we are the Representatives of the people. To whom can that fact, at this stage of our existence, be known, save to those gentlemen alone who have their credentials in their pockets: admit that we have no other contest here but that to the seats of the members from New Jersey. I put it to your wisdom, sir, to say whether we are yet organized in accordance with the Constitution and the law? And whether we can take cognizance of any matter, either in our judicial or legislative capacity, until we are organized? Will you try a case of such high concern before you empannel and swear your jury? By virtue of what authority and under what solemn sanction do we appear here as judges in a matter of such interest to the parties? By virtue of our commissions; by virtue of the authority of the sovereign States we represent; and the sanction under which we should act is to be found alone in the oath which, under the Constitution, we are imperitatively required to take. Let us, then, who are thus delegated as State Representatives, and by virtue of State authority, proceed to ORGANIZE ourselves, in order that we may be constitutionally qualified to hear and decide this question. If we are to arrive at that point of our legislative existence at which our powers as members of the General Government begin, we must take the only practical course, and that is, the usual and ordinary one heretofore pursued by the House. Let your CLERK call the roll of members, beginning, if he pleases, with the State of Maine, and going on in geographical order until the whole roll is completed, and then let the members thus called take the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution. Until we do this, we have no power to do any act in our representative capacity.

Mr. Chairman, to the "House of Representatives" alone belongs the exclusive right to adjudge and determine this question. That House is made by the law paramount of the land, "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications, of its own members." Of what, then, is the House of Representatives composed? Of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; not only so, sir, but a majority of the members so chosen must be sworn into office before they can "do business" as a body recognised by the Constitution of this country. The only practical way in which this organization can be effected is, as I suggested before, to call the roll of members, and to swear them, or a majority of them, if no more present themselves, into office, upon the prima facie evidence alone of the commission issued by the States which they may severally represent. This is the only way in which we may hope to put an end to this most disgraceful state of things. Upon this prima facie evidence of my election—my commission under the great seal of the State of Georgia—you permit me to take my seat; and when the gentleman from New Jersey, who hold in their hands precisely similar evidences of their election, present themselves to be sworn, reason, justice, the Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, require that you should extend to them also the same privileges you accord to me.

We have been here now seven days, wasting the time and money of the people, and have not yet arrived at the only material point—that of organization. All the debate that has hitherto occurred was idle and unprofitable. He, himself, was then speaking by the mere courtesy of the House; every member who had spoken had been listened to only by the same courtesy; and (said Mr. BLACK) until we can organize, and place ourselves in a condition to act definitely, all our debate will be mere talk. In order that we may arrive at that point, permit me to address myself to the majority—the numerical majority—on this floor. It is said that one of the great political parties that now divide the country has that majority here; if that be the truth, the whole responsibility for the waste of the time and money of the people will ultimately fall upon them. The minority here, as elsewhere, can do nothing; the majority—which is said to be an Administration majority—are all powerful. If they refuse to act—to organize the House upon proper principles, and to dispose of this question—they, and they alone, will be responsible to the great body of the constituency. Go on, therefore, I beseech you, gentlemen of the majority—relieve us from the extraordinary position in which we are—terminate the scenes of disorder and confusion which have been constantly occurring here since we first assembled—and place us in such a state of constitutional existence as will enable us to decide upon this question thus prematurely thrown before us.

If the friends of the Administration can thus command and direct the action of this House, and they are disposed to be governed in their course by motives of policy, I put it to them to say whether the odds will not be fearfully against them if they continue to stand out doggedly against the organization of this House? Reflect what may be the opinion entertained of you if you arbitrarily exclude these five New Jersey members from their seats from fear that, if they are admitted, you may not be able to elect an Administration Speaker. If, on the other hand, the Whigs are admitted to their seats in order to form a House, and upon subsequent investigation they are ousted, you may then well claim the merit of having sacrificed your political predilections and party interests for the purpose of removing obstructions which otherwise would have clogged the wheels of Government, and threatened the existence of the Union itself. And, if the Whig votes from New Jersey, thus admitted, should be made the instrument of placing an Opposition Speaker in the Chair, his tenure of office would rest solely on the validity of the votes that elected him, and the House, if the Whigs from New Jersey are ultimately rejected, would vacate the CHAIR which had been filled by the instrumentality of spurious votes, and instantly proceed to a new election. Such a course would secure to you, not only the enviable consciousness of having done your duty to the country, but will ensure your success in the election of a Speaker upon the only grounds on which any party ought to succeed—upon the strength of the legitimate and majority members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLACK said he had as yet only spoken on the preliminary question; and as to what might be his opinions, and what his votes, in regard to the ultimate right of these claimants to the seats from New Jersey, when that question should come properly before him, he was prepared to do what law and justice required. After the House should be organized, he was willing to open that case; he would be willing to hear the evidence on both sides, to examine the facts as to who had the majority of legal votes, and then finally decide who are the rightful Representatives of the State of New Jersey. But before we can achieve "a consummation so devoutly to be wished," we must form ourselves into a "House of Representatives."

In conclusion, said Mr. B. permit me to say, we have heard much during this wide and desultory debate, of the rights of the people—the voice of the people—the potential voice of the people—and the great Democracy of the country, as contradistinguished from the regularly organized and constitutional authorities of the STATE GOVERNMENTS. I know nothing of such a distinction. The people of Georgia are democratic, republican, sovereign; but the potential voice of the sovereign people of Georgia is always heard through the regularly constituted organs of the Government which the people themselves have instituted. Any other expression of that voice, except when the people are in their original convention, would be but the ravings of a mob, and the howlings of anarchy.

He hoped that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] would see that, until the House had organized itself, and placed itself in a constitutional attitude, he could not be permitted to go into the merits of the case.

REMARKS OF MR. RHETT,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, Thursday, December 12, 1839—The New Jersey question being still under consideration in the House—

Mr. RHETT of South Carolina, rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It has become personally important to me, although it may be of no consequence to the House, that I should express my views on the subject now before it for consideration. Always uttering frankly and freely my opinions to all who desire to know them, it is not surprising that, in conversations with different individuals—viewing only detached portions of this subject at a time, and those tinged with the hue of previously formed opinions, or feelings strongly entertained—I should be misapprehended or misrepresented. Whatever the cause, however, an equivocal position on this or any subject deeply affecting the rights and interests of any member of the Confederacy is one which, neither as a member of Congress, nor as an individual, I can ever consent to occupy. Briefly, but freely, then, I propose to express my opinions.

There are but two sets of papers on your table, with respect to the seats claimed in behalf of the State of New Jersey. The claimants on the one side rest on the commission from the Governor of New Jersey, under the great seal of that State. The claimants on the other side rest on the proofs contained in certain documents, showing that they received a majority of the votes cast, by some hundred and forty votes. It will not be necessary, in the views I shall take of this subject, to consider the character of these documents; as, for instance, whether the Secretary of State had any right to take the returns of the elections, of which it is alleged he received the custody merely as clerk of the Privy Council, and, by putting them into the State office of New Jersey, give them the character of official records under the seal of State. I take the papers according to their purport; and they raise the question, which of those two sets of documents, in this our inchoate transition state, shall we recognise as best entitling the claimants under them to participate in the organization of the House? It is not a question of final right; for all concede that in the House, after it is organized, that right must be ultimately considered and determined. Far short, then, of a full investigation, of any investigation, beyond the papers on your table, whom shall we recognise as members of Congress for the purposes of organization?

On the one hand, it has been contended that the Governor's commission is conclusive, and ought to be unquestioned and unquestionable as to membership on this floor. To this proposition I cannot assent. The commission of the Governor is impugnable, and ought to be impugned and set aside, in many cases which can be supposed. Forgery, for instance, or the case of the two contestants from Pennsylvania, which we considered and adjudicated but yesterday. We ought to hear, I think, any impeachment of the Governor's commission presented to us in good faith, and pass judgment on its validity; but, with the House before us, where we can alone, in almost every case, fully and properly ascertain the facts, we should be very slow in discrediting the commission; and, on the other hand, it has been contended that the Governor's commission is a mere return of the election, and that we ought, therefore, to put it on a parity with any other returns made by other officers or agents of the elections; and if, from a comparison of testimony, we find the Governor in error, we ought forthwith to rectify his return, and give the seats to those who seem to have the majority of votes in the election. Neither to this proposition do I assent.

It is always necessary, Mr. Chairman, if we intend to have any precision in our reasoning, to understand the terms we use. What is a return, and what is a commission? A return is a statement of what has been done; it is nothing but an account rendered, and is usually from an inferior to a superior, as in the very case before you is required by the laws of New Jersey, from the judges of elections to the clerk of the county court, and from the clerk of the county court to the Governor and Privy Council. What now, on the other hand, is a commission, signed by a Governor, with the great seal of the State attached? Sir, it is a title, and nothing less than a title, either to property or a franchise, as the case may be. It is a title to property, when conveying away any portion of the State's domain. It is a title to a franchise, when inducting into an office, or establishing an agency. Can gentlemen make it less? It is by signature and seal, according to the common law of the whole land, inherited from our wise and free progenitors, that property passes from one man to another, from a corporation to an individual, from a State to a citizen. The paper, it is true, is rags, and the seal a bit of wax; but beneath these sneered at, but powerful emblems, rest in security, in the hands of individuals, the vast territory of this vast Confederacy, and all the offices of trust, emolument, or honor, by which the whole machinery of our free Government is so happily carried on. Their power is in the law; their omnipotence as great as the sovereignty which created those laws, and can only be slighted and disesteemed by those who are ignorant of our forms of Government, or who are prepared to overthrow them.

But it is objected, if the Governor's commission gives a title to a seat in Congress, then the Governor makes the member of Congress, and not the people. The answer is plain. The Governor is a mere agent of the people, and, when acting in obedience to the Constitution and laws of the people, his acts are their acts. What are all our systems of Government, State and General, but vast agencies established by the people for their government? The sovereignty is with the people. Sovereignty is the supreme ultimate authority and power in a State. In Great Britain it is said to be in the King, Lords, and Commons: in Russia, in the Autocrat. But with us, it is in the people of the States; and all our systems of representative Governments are only agencies by which they rule themselves. All legislative, judicial, and executive acts, performed by their agents in pursuance to the Constitution and laws they have established, are emanations of their sovereign will; and to defy or deny them is to outrage their supremacy. When, therefore, the Governor of New Jersey, in pursuance to the laws of New Jersey, gave a commission to certain gentlemen as members of Congress to represent that State, his act was the act of the people of New Jersey; and it comes to us with all the power and solemnity sovereignty can confer. It is no answer to this position to affirm that the majority of votes cast at the polls was against those commissioned. If the laws of New Jersey are defective, or her agents faithless, let her reform them. The people went to the polls, not in an elementary capacity, but in the ordinary course of an election, in obedience to the laws and constitution they had previously established for their self-government. By these laws their election was held, their votes received, the returns made, and the members of Congress commissioned. In all of these acts, and in one not more than another, the sovereignty of New Jersey was in actual operation; and when the final result is communicated to us by the only official organ designated by her laws, in the form of a positive commission, under the seal of State and the signature of the Governor, we are bound, as we respect one of the sovereign members of the Confederacy, to regard it with the highest consideration.

Mr. Chairman, there is but one way by which gentlemen can obviate the effect of these positions; and that is, by maintaining, as has been done, that the laws of New Jersey, by which the Governor is directed and empowered to commission members of Congress, are unconstitutional, and therefore void. This is taking the subject up to high principles worthy the attention of statesmen. If a member of Congress be an agent of this Government and not of the State he represents, then, undoubtedly, the State cannot commission him; or if he be the agent of all the people of the Union in the aggregate, it is equally clear that a State cannot commission him. Whose agent is he?

I turn to the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and I find it ordained that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." And further on, in the same article, prescribing the number of Representatives, it says: "The State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight," &c. Now, here a member of Congress is to be chosen "by the people of the several States:" "the State of New Hampshire" chooses him. Is he not the agent of those who choose him—the States? If not, whose agent is he? That the Representative is an agent—that he is the agent of those who choose him—no hardihood of construction has yet denied. And, if he is the agent of the several States, how can the conclusion be avoided that the States have a right to commission him? Has a man a right to act by an agent, and can he not give him a power of attorney? Has a nation a right to treat with other nations, and may she not commission her ministers to make treaties? To state such propositions is to show their fallacy. Members of Congress are agents of the States, responsible to them alone, and ought to be commissioned by them in their most imposing sovereign form; and such has been the practice of the States, with but few exceptions, from the origin of the Government to the present day. The commission is the title of a member of Congress to his agency—the evidence of the high authority by which he claims his seat.

I go, sir, one step further. With the Constitution in my hand, I maintain that the Governors of the States are the proper designated organs through whom this House communicates to the several States concerning its members; and they ought, therefore, to be the only organs through whom the States communicate to this House. When a vacancy occurs, from death or any other cause, in a seat on this floor, by whose instrumentality is it filled? The answer is made in the first article of the Constitution. "When vacancies happen in the representation of any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." Now, why should the Executive authority of a State be called into requisition to fill a vacancy in this House? Because a member of Congress is an agent of the State, representing her highest interests; and the same organ and authority which put him in his seat should be invoked to supply the vacancy. It is far otherwise when a vacancy occurs in any of our State Legislatures, or in the Parliament of Great Britain. There, the Speaker issues the writ of election immediately to the people. Why? Because there is no sovereign power, like the States, interposing between the House and the people. In these instances, the House and the people are in immediate relation. A member of Parliament represents the whole realm. A Representative in our State Legislatures represents directly the people of the State. The Speaker of the House, therefore, issues the writ. But the Speaker of the Congress of the United States is elected to his chair by the agents of sovereign States. When a vacancy, therefore, occurs, he cannot order an election; he can only acquaint the States who filled the seats, and to whom they belong, that a vacancy has occurred in this body; and the Governor of the State, representing her high Executive sovereignty, issues the writ, and is the organ employed by the Constitution to supply the vacancy.

This argument gathers redoubled force when we turn to the manner in which vacancies in the Senate of the United States are supplied. There, the whole State is represented but by two agents; and, when a vacancy occurs, the Governor is not only the organ for communicating the fact of the vacancy, and the agent through whom the people send up the representative, but he has, in certain emergencies, the power, representing the whole sovereignty of the State, of filling the vacancy himself. Whenever the State Legislature is not in session when the vacancy occurs, (which is the case in by far the greater number of instances,) the Governor appoints and places the Senator in his seat. Now, under all these instances of express constitutional regulation, by which the Governors of the States are not only recognised, but ordained to be the sole organ of communication between the House and the States, by whom seats are to be filled on this floor—under the long and unbroken practice of the States, from the first origin of this Government—with the powerful constitutional reasons by which this practice has been maintained—it does appear to me amazing that any man, much less a State Rights man, should gravely assert that it is a violation of the Constitution for a State to order, or a Governor of a State to give, a commission by which a member of Congress should be entitled to his seat on this floor.

An argument has been brought forward from the fourth article of the Constitution. By that article it is ordained that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators." The argument from this section is this: that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections" is a grant of power to the States; and the States, therefore, have no right to go beyond this grant, in their legislation, and require their Governors to give commissions to members of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I am a State Rights man; and, however few in numbers and humble in power, upon the doctrines these statesmen maintain I believe the existence of the Union and the happiness of the Confederacy mainly depend. According to these doctrines, the Constitution is to be construed strictly, and all the powers not granted by the Constitution are reserved to the States. Now, no one will doubt, upon these principles, that if this clause had not been inserted in the Constitution, as the States were to elect the Representatives to Congress, "the times, places, and manner of holding the elections" would have been amongst the powers reserved to the States. How, then, can this clause be said to grant a power which the States had before, and would now have, if it did not exist? The truth is, it is no grant of power to the States, but is a grant of power to be exercised if deemed necessary to the General Government. It contains a mere injunction on the States to do that which they had the power to do so; whilst the power is granted to Congress, in case the States should decline prescribing "the times, places, and manner of holding elections," to make such provisions for bringing the people to the polls as may be necessary for its existence and perpetuity. If, then, this clause contains no grant of power to the States, of course the argument deduced from it, that the States are restricted to the grant, falls to the ground. The States have not only the power to prescribe "the time, place, and manner of holding elections" for members of Congress, but they hold, by virtue of their reserved rights, all other powers and privileges, with respect to these high agents, not taken from them. Those who contend that the States have no right to commission members of Congress by their Governor, must show that this power has been taken away. Who has ventured to show this?

Another argument is deduced from the first clause of the fifth article of the Constitution. As "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," it is contended that neither the Governor of a State, nor any other officers of the State, have any right to judge at all, under any circumstances, of the votes, or the qualifications of voters, after their votes are received. Again, sir, I must refer to fundamental State Rights principles. What is not granted is retained to the States. The clause does not say that Congress shall be the sole judge. It only gives the House the power of judging of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members—a power absolutely necessary to its independent existence. It is a revisory power, by which it can review the polls, the acts of the election officers, and go behind and set aside the commissioner of a Governor himself. But is this revisory power inconsistent with the exercise of the same power, in conformity with State laws, by the officers of the States? On the contrary, as a member of Congress is the agent of the States, does it not necessarily follow that the States, through their officers, must, in the first instance, determine who this agent is to be; and does not this involve the right of judging and rejecting votes—of judging of returns and qualifications? Without such a power, it would be impossible for the States to ascertain their own agent; whilst the exercise of such a power does not at all infringe on the power of this House to cor-ject any errors or frauds in the elections or returns It has been conceded in the argument that the managers of elections might reject the vote of one disqualified by the State laws before it is put into the ballot or taken viva voce. Well, is not this an act of judging? But it is contended that the managers cannot reject the vote if it is once received, however fraudulent or illegal. Here, then, is a great constitutional power resting on a matter of time. If the fraud is detected before the vote is received, it is constitutionally condemned; if after, it is constitutionally above repudiation. Suppose, sir, that, in counting out the votes, three of them are found rolled up together, or more votes are received than voters: must not the judges of the election judge of such frauds upon the polls? Suppose the name equivocal or illegible, or the vote is a blank: must they not determine whether it shall be counted? And in many of the cities where the names of the voters are registered, and those for whom they vote are recorded, a fraudulent or illegal vote can as well be determined after as before an election. I am surrounded by members of Congress from every part of the Confederacy, and I ask them whether, in every State in the Union, the managers and judges of elections have not, from the organ of our Government, exercised the power of purging the polls in all cases of discovered frauds? Whilst, therefore, I maintain, in its broadest latitude, the power of this House to judge of "the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members," and to revise the conduct of all the election officers, I do not think that these powers are, in the first instance, denied to the State authorities.

Some gentlemen, however, unable to deny that the Governor had a right, under the laws of a State, to give a commission to a member of Congress, nevertheless contend that the commission is nothing but a return of the election, and that, for that purpose, the Governor is a returning officer of this House. I think, if the commission is a mere return, the argument is not far from being right. But in what a degrading position does it place the sovereign States of this Confederacy! If the commission is a return of the elections, and the Governor of a State is an officer of this House, of course he must be amenable and responsible to this House. May he not be dragged here, and punished for any imputed fraud in his returns? And where would be the pride and sovereignty of the States in the operation of so monstrous a position? If a law were passed by Congress making the Governors of the States our returning officers, under the pretext of the power of "prescribing the time, place, and manner of holding elections," what State in this Union, from the largest to the smallest—from New York to Delaware—would submit to it? Sir, I hold in my hand the commission of my membership to represent the State of South Carolina on this floor, under her seal of State, and the signature of her Governor. Do you think I hold it to be on a parity with the returns of the inferior agents of the elections, and to carry with it no more dignity and power than the certificates of such ignoble and contemptible instruments (if reputation does not belie them) as figured at Millville and South Amboy? Is this commission, with its proud motto blazoned upon it, a usurpation—a mere nullity—or worse than a nullity—a foul instrument, by which the high Executive of South Carolina is made amenable to this House? Would life itself be worth such dishonor?

I will now, Mr. Chairman, briefly recur to the conduct I have pursued in carrying out the principles I have here supported. I did not vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] declaring that the roll should be called in the usual order of States, and that the gentlemen from New Jersey, who hold the commission from the Governor, should take their seats, for three reasons, which were covered by the resolution I had given notice I should present as a substitute. In the first place, if this course had been pursued, these gentlemen would have been inducted into their seats; and thus have been empowered to vote in their own cases, on any subsequent investigation. The House will bear in mind that so soon as you, sir, were installed in that chair, the question arose whether these gentlemen had a right to vote on the matter of these contested seats, in which they were interested. I called to your attention the rule of the House which I thought disqualified them from voting. You determined, however, that they had a right to vote, and that their interest in their seats was not personal, but representative—the interest of their constituents. From this decision there was an appeal, and I voted against their right. I could not, with the least consistency, vote for a resolution which, without any change of circumstances, overruled what had been done, and gave the very right of voting I had denied. In the second place, the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia is in direct conflict with a principle I have avowed, and which I deem exceedingly important in this controversy. It is that principle, so ably exposed and advocated by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that we have a right to recognise, and a right to refuse to recognise, each other as members of Congress; and upon a refusal to recognise any member of Congress, he should stand aside until all who recognise each other had taken their seats. A judicial tribunal would thus be organized of those whose seats are uncontested, to determine upon those whose seats are contested. Now, the resolution from the gentleman from Virginia, if adopted, would have been a denial of this important principle. Without any tribunal organized from the members whose seats were uncontested—without the right of setting aside those whose seats were contested—in direct conflict with the right of members to refuse to recognise any claimant as a member of Congress, it proposed at once to induct the gentlemen from New Jersey, who had the Governor's commission, into their seats. Having already voted against such a course, I had no alternative but to act so still. The third reason for my voting against the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia was, that it did not affirm the power of the House, at this stage of its organization, "to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its members." The whole case—all the testimony on your table, was not laid before us; and to give a judgment short of the broadest exposition of facts before us might give the inference that we did not think we had a right to have them exposed for our judicial determination. Maintaining, as I do, that this House is the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States—as fully competent now as at any future time to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members," I did not deem it consistent with such a position to vote for a proposition which did not distinctly affirm this right. To settle and establish right principles is far more important than to do justice to any man; because in such a case justice to the individual may be the precedent for the grossest wrong to others.

I have thus, Mr. Chairman, briefly assigned my reasons for voting against the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia. The propositions which these reasons establish are all contained in the resolution I proposed as a substitute; which has been adopted by the House. Whilst agreeing in the result with those who maintain that those who hold the Governor's commission should have the contested seats, I could not, consistently with my previously expressed opinions and conduct, go with them in their manner of obtaining it.

I voted for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NAYLOR] taking his seat, because, from the terms of the law of Pennsylvania, the proclamation of the Governor, declaring who were members of Congress to represent that State, was to be issued within a certain number of days (twenty days, I think) after the election. The Governor of Pennsylvania (at that time Governor Ritner) did, within the time prescribed by law, issue his proclamation, declaring Mr. NAYLOR a member of Congress. The subsequent proclamation of Governor Porter, declaring Mr. INGERSOLL elected, was without the time prescribed by law, and was, therefore, wholly unauthorized. In the New Jersey cases, now before us, we have the commission of the Governor. We have this commission impugned upon grounds of fact; and we have these facts denied by those holding the commission. We cannot, now, sir, in this stage of our organization, go into an elaborate consideration of these facts; and nothing short of a full and elaborate consideration of them would be dispensing justice. The Governor's commission is a title, to be set aside only upon the clearest proof of fraud in its creation; but when the alleged fraud is disputed and denied, upon what principle of justice, which has ever obtained in judicial or legislative bodies, can you stop short at the allegation of fraud, and not allow the allegation to be disproved? We have the alternative, then, presented to us, of stopping at the commission, or of going, at this stage of our organization, into the merits of the whole case. If we go into the merits of the whole case, send for persons and papers, hear testimony, and hear arguments, will gentlemen tell me when the investigation will end? I doubt not the power of the House to go into the investigation; but the argument ab inconvenienti against such a course appears to be irresistible. There are other matters before the country, of grave importance, besides the seats of these five gentlemen from New Jersey. We should admit, I think, those who have the Governor's commission, in the organization of the House; and, when the House is fully organized, refer the whole matter to the committee of privileges of elections. In the mean time, we shall have put an end to the angry and disgraceful struggle in which we are now engaged, and the business of the people will go on.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus, as briefly as the subject would permit, stated my opinions on some of the questions before you, and my reasons for the course I have pursued and shall pursue. They throw me into co-operation with those to whom I have generally been opposed; and they separate me from those with whom I have usually acted. The position is far from being agreeable; but it appears to me, after the most careful examination, to be the necessary consequence of those great principles with which I began my political life, and expect to end it. Probably, very few who hear me—not one—agrees with me in the opinions I have expressed. What then? Are we to be the mere reflectors of the opinions of others, or surrender our principles because they are opposed? or, what is baser still, abandon them, in a spirit of mean malignity, because our political opponents espouse them? I know, sir, that I am but a man, and not above the influences of party association; and amidst the fierce surges of party contention, I shall not be exempt from their spray. But, by deep retirement and careful self-examination, I trust I shall never be swept off into the dark abyss of party subserviency; and through whatever scenes of strife and difficulty I am destined to pass, I shall not be unrewarded and without consolation if I am able to preserve untainted, if not unsuspected, my political integrity.

REMARKS OF MR. SHEPARD, OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, December 18, 1839—

On the resolution submitted by Mr. WISE, that Messrs. AYCRIGG, HALSTED, MAXWELL, STRATTON, and YORK, are not entitled to be sworn as members of the House.

Mr. SHEPARD of North Carolina, observed, that this debate had been extended for two weeks, and though he did not believe that he could throw any light on a subject on which the best talents had been employed in the course of the debate, yet as the course which he had thought it his duty to take had been somewhat different from that expected by most gentlemen, he deemed it but justice to himself to make a brief explanation of it. When we assembled here, said Mr. S. some weeks ago, certain gentlemen from the State of New Jersey appeared with certificates that they had been elected as Representatives from that State, similar to the one which I possess; and on referring to the laws of New Jersey, I found that the Governor of that State was authorized to receive from the judges of the elections the returns of all the votes given, to count them up, and to give commissions to those persons who received a majority of the votes. Sir, said Mr. S. these gentlemen who claim to be admitted to their seats here, have the certificates of the Governor, stating that they were duly elected; and it seemed to him they were entitled to take their seats, and to participate in the organization of the House by the election of a Speaker. It seemed to him, then, said Mr. S. that he had no more right to refuse to associate with them as members of this House, and to impeach the validity of their credentials, than they had to refuse to associate with him, and to impeach the validity of his. The Governor of New Jersey is the officer charged with making of the returns of election, and though not appointed by the Federal Government, his statements of the returns are as binding as if he acted under our authority. The commissions which he gave were in conformity with the usage which had always prevailed in this country, and in the country from which our institutions were derived; and in both countries the act of the returning officer was always considered valid and binding until proved by good and sufficient testimony to be wrong or fraudulent. This was the view which he took at the first, and which he took now. He would not go into an argument to show the truth of this position, for it had been already so ably argued that he had too much respect for the House to consume their time with repeating arguments that had been so often used. But some gentlemen contended that fraud had been committed in giving these returns. Admit that this were the fact; yet it seemed to him that they had no right, according to parliamentary law and usage, to inquire into it at that time. The gentlemen whose seats were contested had as much right, as he believed, to inquire whether fraud had been committed with regard to his credentials, as he had to inquire with regard to theirs. Indeed fraud might be committed on all hands. The certificates of the Secretary of State of the State of New Jersey, contesting the verity of these returns, might themselves be the result of fraud; and, therefore, in the preliminary stage of their proceedings, he thought they could not go into an examination of them. These reasons, and many others, which he would not trouble the House with reciting, induced him to give his votes in favor of the right of these gentlemen to take their seats. He thought they were entitled to have their names on the roll, and he therefore voted for the first proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] which was lost. Another resolution was offered by the same gentleman, affirming that they were entitled to take their seats, and leaving the question of ultimate right to be decided by the House, after it was organized. For this resolution he also voted. On Saturday last, the gentleman from Virginia introduced his third resolution on the subject; and on the motion to lay it on the table, he voted in the affirmative; and he had now risen more for the purpose of explaining his vote on that occasion, than to enter into an argument on the present question. When the motion to which he had referred was made, it seemed to him that they had already consumed too much time on the various questions connected with the subject, and that no good could result from keeping it any longer before the House. He thought it was time to lay aside this vexed question, and proceed at once to the organization of the House, and to the despatch of the public business. There was, therefore, no inconsistency in the two votes he had thus given. He voted according to the dictates of his best judgment, and subsequent reflection had convinced him that he had acted correctly. It seemed to him that the question had been settled by the preliminary meeting, that these gentlemen should not take their seats, and participate in the organization of the House, and that it would therefore be better to have the controversy to be decided in the ordinary way by the House, upon its merits, after the action of the Committee of Elections. He must take this occasion to say that he had voted for the two resolutions of the gentleman from Virginia, with the greatest reluctance. In what he was about to say, he begged to be understood as not wishing or intending to impeach the motives of the gentlemen from New Jersey, who came here with the Governor's certificates; nor did he wish to impeach the conduct of the Governor himself. But he must say, that when he heard the evidence read at the Clerk's table, impeaching the validity of these returns, in which it was conclusively shown that the gentlemen who contested the seats had received a majority of the votes given at the elections—when he heard the evidence read that the clerks of two counties, Millville and South Amboy, had suppressed the vote given at these counties, and when he heard the evidence that the Governor himself admitted both these important facts, and, regretting that the technicalities of law prevented him from giving the returns to those who had received a majority of the votes, consoled himself with the belief that the House would do justice to all parties—when he had seen a proposal made last summer in the public papers, by the gentleman commissioned by the Governor, to throw up their commissions, and go again into a new election, thus admitting a doubt of their own rights, he could not avoid entertaining the suspicion that gross fraud had been practised. It seemed to him, Mr. S. said, that throughout the whole contest here, one party had made use of the forms and technicalities of law to cover up a mean and despicable fraud, while the other party had attempted to break down all the forms of law, in order to attain abstract justice; and being a law-loving and law-abiding man, he had voted to preserve the laws, though injustice might be the consequence. These things, Mr. S. said, were not uncommon in private life. A man often held possession of a tract of land to which he was not justly entitled, and which the law would take from him upon a legal investigation and trial of his title; but the forms of law must be preserved, and the tenant in possession must retain the land until the courts decide that another has a better title to it. He would pass over other matters, (Mr. S. said,) and come down to the proceedings of yesterday; and he confessed he never was more surprised in his life than he was when, shortly after the Speaker had taken the chair, and after his administering the oath to the members of the House, he saw these five New Jersey gentlemen walk up to the table and ask to be sworn. He did not, as he said before, mean to impeach their motives; they had a right to take their own course; but he thought that motives of delicacy, as well as of expediency, should have induced them to wait for the regular action of the House. Now, did not every man see that the contest has, all along, been for the purpose of electing a Speaker, and that these gentlemen and their friends were contending for their right to participate in that election? But (said Mr. S.) the right has been violated by decisions of the House again and again, and it is too late to rectify it. The House has been organized, and the Speaker has been elected, without the participation of these gentlemen, and they can, therefore, have no good reason for insisting on taking their seats without an investigation into their right to hold them. You, sir, [addressing the SPEAKER] have been elected as an impartial man; you and I voted to give these gentlemen their seats in the first instance, and you will doubtless deal justly and impartially in your appointment of a Committee of Elections. Then why not let this question of right be referred to that committee to be investigated on its merits, in order that the House, with a full knowledge of all the evidence connected with it, may decide on it calmly, justly, and impartially. No injury or inconvenience would result to these gentlemen or their party by the delay. No great question would probably come before the House, in which their votes might be necessary before the decision of the House on their case. He, for one, would agree that all the great questions which were expected to come before them, should be postponed until that decision was made; yes, sir, said Mr. S. the great financial question, on which I shall go with the Executive, and the fate of which will probably depend on the decision of these contested election cases, may be laid over until the House shall decide who shall take their seats as Representatives from the State of New Jersey. He had merely risen, Mr. S. said, to explain the course he had taken. If any harm has been done by preventing these gentlemen from participating in the election of a Speaker, it is too late now to apply the remedy. The act has been done, and done forever, and let the country and posterity judge of its correctness. A great deal had been said about the States Rights doctrines that were involved in this question. Sir, said Mr. S. the question has as much to do with States Rights as it has with the Egyptian hieroglyphics. No man wishes to disfranchise the State of New Jersey. The only question is, who shall take their seats as members from that State? There was no intention of depriving any one of his rights; on the contrary, the sending this matter to a committee, and bringing it to a thorough investigation upon its merits, was the surest way of doing justice to all. The argument had been used in the preliminary stage of the proceedings, that the House, in an imperfect state, and without a Speaker, could not enter into an examination of the evidence connected with the subject, nor try it on its merits. That difficulty was now removed. The House was now organized—a Speaker was elected, and the members were sworn. He hoped, therefore, there being no longer any obstacle in the way, that the House would take this course.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina here took the floor, and replied at length to Mr. DROMGOOLE, citing various precedents to show that the gentlemen who presented themselves with the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey, were entitled to take their seats without further question; and that the House had no right to go behind these returns, or, at this stage of its proceedings, to go into an examination of the testimony contesting their validity.

Mr. WISE obtained the floor and moved an adjournment.

Mr. SHEPARD asked that the gentleman would withdraw the motion, so that he might have an opportunity of saying a few words in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WISE could not withdraw the motion unless it was understood that he should have the floor afterwards.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the House would permit the gentleman from North Carolina to make an explanation.

Mr. WISE then withdrew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SHEPARD then said that he had been a humble member of the House of Representatives for the last two years, and in his course on that floor he had endeavored to be actuated by what he believed to be his duty to himself and the people he represented. He knew that, on various occasions, he had taken a course unpalatable to some gentlemen, and they had shown their disapprobation of that course by various circumstances and means. He would, however, now say to them, that he was not responsible to them, or to any body else, except the people who sent him there, and the country at large; and he hoped that, in the discharge of his duty in that House, he was as far from fear as any other member on the floor. He would neither yield to flattery on the one side, nor to bullying on the other. When he rose a few moments ago, he did not rise to make an apology for his vote—he owed no apology to any body; but he rose to put himself right before his constituents and the country at large, because he knew that the party organs, which were spread throughout the country, were always disposed to hold up a public man to odium. The people do not understand the rules of order in this House; and when gentlemen act differently from the views of partisans, it is easy for them to be misrepresented. And notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, he felt satisfied with the propriety of his course, and he believed that every person, untrammelled by party prejudice, would justify his conduct. He would now briefly state what he had said. He had said that when we first met in this House, he believed that those members from New Jersey who had the Governor's certificates were entitled to take their seats and participate in the election of a Speaker; but he stated further, that he had strong suspicion that those men had come here through a fraud. The gentleman from South Carolina himself had strong suspicion that they came here through a fraud, if he had not misunderstood him on another occasion. He thought in the first place that they had the right to participate in the election of a Speaker. They however were deprived of that right by the House, and they did not vote for a Speaker. Then, so far as the principle was concerned, it was violated by prohibiting them from voting in the election of a Speaker; and if they had at any time a right to participate in the organization of the House, that right had been trampled upon, and it was gone forever. Then, after all this was done, was it not the proper course, as a Speaker had been elected who would immediately appoint committees, to let the whole matter be brought up before a committee, and be examined, and properly decided? Last week, the argument was, that we must give faith and effect to the certificate, because the House was not organized, because there was no Speaker, no committee to examine, and collate facts. Now, sir, the case is different. You have been elected by the gentleman and his friends, because of your justice and impartiality. You can immediately appoint a committee, that will investigate the whole matter—that will bring to light the dark parts of this transaction, and do equal and full justice to all. Let the House take up the subject, and decide upon the whole question of right, now that these men have been deprived of taking seats in the first instance. Was there any inconsistency in his wishing to pursue this course? Would the gentleman from South Carolina desire to give men seats here who, upon examination, in a few days, it might be found, were not entitled to them? This was his position, and these were his views, expressed with all due respect to the great legal talents of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Sir, said Mr. S. the gentleman from South Carolina, in the conclusion of his remarks, had said that his relations with me were not such as would permit him to speak of me as he would of his honorable colleague. Although, sir, I do not fear that gentleman's lance, in any contest, I know that he is possessed of talents far superior to mine The gentleman seemed to know that he is much my superior in age, in learning, and in eloquence, but why did he not think of this before he commenced his attack? Why did he not attack his friend from South Carolina, who had voted with me on all these questions? That would have been more consistent with the gentleman's vaunted chivalry, which he is eternally talking about. [Laughter.] But the gentleman further says, that I had held that these men had a constitutional right to participate in the organization of the House, and contends that because they once had a constitutional right, I act inconsistently in not supporting their admission to seats at the present moment. In this matter, the gentleman himself is in no enviable position. The gentleman came into this House a Nullifier, opposed to a National Bank and a high tariff; still we find him always acting with that very party which goes for a National Bank, for a high tariff, and for all those measures which he has declared to be most odious to him. If it is inconsistent in me to pursue the course I have, is it not doubly inconsistent in the gentleman to pursue the course which he pursues? If I am inconsistent, he is still more so; and how can he justify himself to his constituents? How is it that he is struggling to get that party in power which would adopt all those Federal measures which he himself pretends to be absolutely opposed to?

In pursuing the course which I desire to pursue, I do not see that any harm can be done to any party, for I will be willing to postpone all the great questions which this House has to act upon, until the matter of this New Jersey election is finally decided upon, which can be done in a short time, as the House can proceed to it at once, and act upon it in a legal and constitutional manner.

REMARKS OF MR HOLMES,
OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, December 12, 1839—

The following resolution, offered by Mr. PICKENS, being under consideration, viz:

"Resolved, That the committee to be raised on the New Jersey election be confined to the question who is entitled to 'the returns' of election for the Twenty-sixth Congress."

Mr. HOLMES of South Carolina rose and addressed the House as follows:

I know not, Mr. Chairman, how you or other gentlemen upon this floor may feel, but I do confess, for my own part, that when I consider how many days have elapsed since we assembled in this Hall; how ineffectual have been our movements, save, like the fingers of that clock, to mark out the progress of time; how, in a crisis and at a period when the eyes of a whole nation and the hands of a suffering people are imploringly turned towards us, we have been vacillating instead of acting, debating instead of organizing, running a great circle and remaining still at rest—I feel that I could bow down my head in shame, and, returning to my constituents, ask of them forgiveness.

This question has been misstated throughout the whole of this debate. It is thus propounded: "Are not the gentlemen from New Jersey who have the Governor's certificate members of Congress, and are they not entitled to their seats by prima facie evidence?" This, however, is not the question; for no one doubts that the Governor's certificate, under the laws of New Jersey, was the only evidence in the first instance. The true question is: Shall this House, with the election returns and the Governor's certificate both before them, go into an examination of their distinct evidences of title, and decide upon their merits? I contend not only that you may, but that you ought to investigate this whole matter; that you are required so to do by the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution, which requires you to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of the members.

My first proposition is, that this House has the materials before it; that here are the parties litigant, and that we are bound to decide; that the evidence before us consists of the appointment by the voters, in the shape of election returns, and also of the certificate of the Governor, professing to be based upon those returns; that the appointment, and not the commission, creates the member; and that, if the appointment was evidenced by any public act other than the commission, such act will give the right to the commission, or enable the parties to perform their duties without it. Properly to test these propositions, we should consider who we are—how constituted—the mode of proceeding heretofore adopted—and then take our departure with the lights which experience throws upon the pathway before us. Let me say that we commenced in error, and that in error we progressed, until we organized this House by the selection of a chairman from amongst ourselves. It is essential that every member should be convinced of the error; for upon the proper organization of the House must depend the legality of its proceedings.

Our first error was the attempt to invest the Clerk of the House with the attributes of Speaker or Chairman; and in the perseverance of this course for four days we uselessly consumed that exact amount of time. Gentlemen on the other side were confirmed in the continuance of this error by the very ingenious speech of the member from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] whose effort, although his first upon this floor, I trust will not be his last, as it evinced much acumen, clearness in stating his premises, and logical skill in the deductions. That member contended that, inasmuch as the Clerk was elected by the last House of Representatives, and that House had terminated its existence on the 3d of March last; whilst it was admitted, both by the rules of the common law, generally applicable to officers, and the particular rule regarding this functionary, that he did not cease to exist when the life of the parent that gave him birth had expired; therefore he (the Clerk) had a separate and independent existence; was an officer of the Government, sworn to the performance of his duty, and recognised as occupying his proper place here, and, in the absence of a Speaker, invested with enlarged powers until the election of a Speaker. That, consequently, under him we might progress to a proper organization, the Clerk putting questions to the House on any matter which it was competent to entertain. Now, to all this I answer that, although the Clerk did not cease to be Clerk when the last Congress expired, yet the fact of his living over invested him with no new function, and that the deduction from the premises in a complete "non sequitur;" his being sworn, or his remaining Clerk during the recess, could give him no new title, invest him with no privileges beyond those originally acquired by his election as Clerk. He was, when first appointed, and is now, only an instrument of the House, and is no part of the House itself; his existence is the result of the action of the House—a mere consequence—and therefore cannot be a portion of the thing creating him. The Clerk is no more a constituent portion than the pen with which I write is a part of my body. He surely had functions to exercise when the members of Congress first assembled; but they were exactly those of the crier of a court; his duty was to call upon the parties to assemble, who were essential to form or constitute the House, and, when this was accomplished, he was functus officio, and his successor was to be appointed. The error in which the House suffered itself to fall was this: that it proceeded to discuss the right of the New Jersey members without any person being in the Chair competent to put questions, or to decide upon the mode of proceeding according to parliamentary rules. This error, after many days—and after many ineffectual efforts to proceed with the work of organization—was admitted, and another and proper mode was suggested: "that of organizing by the appointment of one from amongst ourselves to preside over the deliberations of the body" We are now generally admitted to be properly organized. This organization, however, is said, by the honorable member from Vermont, [Mr. SLADE,] to result, not from any law, but from necessity, in consequence of the Clerk's refusing to put questions. The gentleman is wrong. The Clerk had no right to put a question; and the House is now organized upon the only legitimate basis it could have been. The question then recurs, is that organization perfect? For, if it be merely inchoate, as gentlemen contend, then its acts are of no validity. But if it be perfect, it can forthwith proceed to pass upon the whole case, examine the returns and qualifications, and decide upon the claims of the parties contending before us for seats upon this floor. My proposition is, that the organization is perfect, and I sustain it thus: The body is constituted according to the law of its creation, and that law is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen by the people of the several States." The law of organization of the Senate is distinct. It is composed of two Senators from each State, and the Vice President of the United States. Its organization, or composition, requires something more than its own members. The organization of the House of Representatives is complete, when made up of its own members. What follows? Why, clearly this: that the "disjecta membra" being brought together, and united under a head, the body is complete—complete for all the purposes of proper organization—capable of examining into the several parts of which it is composed—of comparing the relation and fitness of the joints, and of compacting them into the best form, for long and protracted exercise. When thus properly adjusted, the whole body will be prepared to run the career set before it—to legislate, to appoint, to adjudicate. I admit that, in its present condition, it cannot perform a judicial function. The gentleman from New York seems struck with the frankness of this admission. But let me tell the gentleman it involves no inconsistency, because we are not called upon, in deciding upon the claims of the gentlemen from New Jersey, to exercise any judicial function. Let us inquire what is meant by judicial function, and the exercise thereof? I define it to be the action of one body upon another distinct body, according to some law or rule of action. Now what is it we are called upon to do? Not certainly to act upon another distinct body; neither is there any prescribed mode of action by which we shall determine upon the premises. We are called upon to do this and no more: by an inspection of the muniments of title, to determine in the first degree who shall compose the House, with a view to the action and performances of that House. This case may be likened to a contest between two militia companies for rank in line. The adjutant, in forming the regiment, is bound to decide between the contending parties; but will any one pretend that his decision upon the commissions submitted to him by the officers claiming rank creates judicial action? It is merely a previous arrangement fo the several limbs, essential to the just action of the corps; a harmonious adjustment of the parts to the completion of a system whose operations are to be fully developed when properly completed. It is thus apparent that no judicial action is intended. When the House is formed, by the election of a Speaker, its judicial function will be brought into exercise; it will then be called to determine in the last resort; it will send for persons and papers, swear its witnesses, or examine upon interrogation. At present it is only called upon to protect itself, to guard its own integrity, to prevent the abuse which might creep in under color of title, to prevent the letter of a law from destroying its spirit, by interposing between the existence of a fact and the evidence of that fact. We are not now, for the first time, to learn the awful fact that it is the letter of the law which frequently kills, whilst the spirit makes us free. Who does not know that the rights of a people have been destroyed more by the forms of the law than by the sword of the conqueror? And does it require a prophet to tell us—should the doctrine be recognised that a certificate of election is to give a title to a seat in Congress, superior to the election returns upon which it professes to be based, superior to the votes of the electors, who are the appointing power—that, in times of party excitement, certificates will be manufactured contrary to the return, and against the express will of the sovereign, which speaks through its majorities? Let us, then, not by a disregard of certificates—not by a resort to suppression of technicalities—not by a disregard to the certificate of a Governor or the broad seal of a State; but, by virtue of and in obedience unto that law, which New Jersey herself, as a sovereign State, enacted, and by which she claims to be represented, and to which she has affixed her broad seal, (the Constitution of the United States,) proceed, as commanded, to judge between the qualifications, elections, and returns of the members claiming to be Representatives of a co-ordinate State. Let us perform the task assigned us in spirit and in truth. All sovereignty enjoins it upon us—the sovereignty of the States as as expressed in the sacred instrument of our Confederation—the sovereignty of the people of New Jersey, as demanding justice at our hands against usurpation of its Executive—the sovereignty of justice, whose reign is coeval with time, and whose decrees are as eternal as the Rock of Ages. If we hesitate to proceed, we violate all these injunctions of duty; if we advance with spirit to the work set before us, we soon put the Government in motion, and perfect the great objects we were sent to execute. What hinders us? Forms and technicalities, say the gentlemen opposed to the Administration. We have the certificate, and we are entitled. I deny that any forms are in the way; and I am prepared to show that, in the present state of the case, your certificate confers no title superior or equal to the returns themselves. I further contend that the returns are before us, and that the parties contending are as much within our jurisdiction as they will ever be. Now, whom have we before us? Messrs. AYCRIGG & Co. on the one part—on the other, Messrs. DICKERSON & Co. The first set claiming by virtue of the Governor's certificate, which professes to be an exemplification of the returns—the second set claiming by virtue of those very returns as recorded in the office of the Secretary of State of New Jersey; which Secretary was the clerk of the very Council who assisted the Governor in verifying the returns and advising upon the certificate. Here, then, are before us two sets of paper titles, and here we are brought to the point of action. Let it be remembered that I concede, in the first place, priority of the Governor's certificate on the returns. That priority was granted, and it has served its purpose. It conferred upon the gentlemen the privileges, and surrounded them with the immunities of membership from the time they left the borders of their own State until this House was organized to act upon the qualifiations and returns. This House is now so organized, those qualifiations and returns are before it, and we are now called upon to decide.

Yielding as much authority to the sign-manual of the Governor—paying as much respect to the broad seal of a State as gentlemen claim for it—let us now proceed to decide upon the documents before us. The documents are in number only two; they can easily be compared, and their relative merits adjudicated. What do these documents purport to be? 1st, a Governor's certificate; 2d, an election return. The first paper gives the seats to the first class of claimants. The second paper, if true, and properly before us, will give the seats to the second class of claimants. The question arises, have you a right to decide upon the election returns, and upon the Governor's certificate? No member denies it, provided they both be properly before us, and the time contemplated by the Constitution, in the fifth section of the first article, be arrived. It is then incumbent upon me to show that these two conditions precedent have been complied with—the time arrived, and the papers properly before you. The papers are, in fact, before us. But how did they get before us? I answer, in the only mode they could properly come before us—brought by the gentlemen who contest the right to seats as conferred by the Governor's certificate. The Constitution called upon you to decide between the parties. Is it not the duty of the party contesting a title to produce into court the muniments upon which he contests and sets up his claim? If you are to judge, you must have the materials for judgment. Upon what are you to judge? The Constitution says the qualifications, elections, and returns. Is it not then the duty of the parties evoking justice to produce their qualifications and returns? It appears that they have done so. Why, then, are the papers not properly before you, as contended by the Opposition? Is there any prescribed mode of bringing them up? If so, let gentlemen show it. And if there be not, then they must show that in the nature of the case there is some defect—the onus is upon them. The fact of the papers being here, and admitted by the gentlemen from New Jersey to be genuine, throws the weight of disproving the legal admissibility upon the other side. Now, if you have not these papers legally before you, the illegality must arise either from the law of Parliament, or the Constitution, or the law of Congress. Let gentlemen point us to these laws; and when they do, I will confess the papers are not properly before us; until then, as there is nothing in the papers themselves which excludes them, I shall insist that they are properly before us. Will it be pretended that the mere sending a mandate to bring up a paper imparts to that paper, when thus brought up, a legal significance which it had not before? And if the mode of bringing up the paper does not affect its admissibility, is not the only question to be determined that of jurisdiction over the paper when before the court? But the Constitution specifies the very paper before us. It is, therefore, within our jurisdiction, and we must decide.

Gentlemen should remember, when talking about sovereign power, that this House likewise has a supreme power over this whole subject, and can be circumscribed in the mode of exercising that power by no laws but her own. In the absence of any such laws regulating the mode of bringing the papers, her jurisdiction attaches to the papers the very moment they are produced and read; otherwise, it would be guilty of the absurdity of issuing process to enforce the production of testimony already in its possession. The papers, then, being before us, and no law prescribing the mode of production, they are legally before us, and we can judge of the contents. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] says we cannot proceed to judgment until we are first sworn; but we cannot be sworn until we have a Speaker, and therefore we cannot, at this stage of the matter, proceed to judgment. The whole of this argument of the honorable gentleman was based upon the presumption that we were about to perform a judicial act. I have already shown that we are not called upon to perform a judicial act, and therefore it is not requisite for us to be sworn. Thus, the foundation of the argument being removed, the argument falls with it. Gentlemen will not pretend that an oath is essential to our organizing the House, and the Constitution recognises us as a House before the Speaker administers the oath, for it says the House shall elect a Speaker. But the Constitution does say that the House may decide this question, and it fixes no precise time for it to decide. Therefore, it follows that, as soon as we become a House, we may decide. Now, we are a House at this moment; our members are assembled, our Chairman presides, rules of the Congress are adopted for our government, our acts are recorded on the journal, and our compensation, no doubt, will be demanded. This, then, is the proper time for decision. Parties and papers are before you, and the States whose Representatives you are demand of you to decide. Gentlemen, however, say, let us send for person and papers, and decide finally on this great matter. Do gentlemen seriously intend to suspend the action of Government until this controversy is finally settled? Do they not know that if this whole matter be referred to a committee, it will occupy that committee for weeks and months? Why, sir, in the present state of parties, that committee will sit de die in diem, and the rest of us might as well return to our homes, or travel through the States. No, sir, let us decide upon the evidence before us, not finally, but upon the admission or exclusion of the members in the first instance. We have the right, and it is our duty. I have shown you that there is nothing in the nature of the work we are about to perform which requires of us an oath—nothing in the law of our being which enjoins it; that now is the time, and the appropriate time. It is due to our constituents, it is due to the dignity of this body, it is due to the nation. You are bound to examine these returns. What are these election returns? They are records in the office of the Secretary of State of New Jersey. They are evidence of a higher nature than the mere certificate of these returns given by the Governor. The difference is that between an exemplification of a record and the record itself. Will any gentleman tell me, if an exemplification of a record, with the seal of the Governor certifying its correctness, was produced in a court, and, when there, the record itself was afterwards produced, and upon comparing them they were found to differ, that the record would not prevail over the certificate? And if it would in a court of justice, is there any reason why it should not prevail in this House? Is there any difference between the cases? And, if there be none, do we not fulfil all the requisitions of sovereignty, of the Constitution, of justice, when we accord to the record a superior validity to the certificate of that record? Let gentlemen meet this argument in the spirit of candor, anxious to do right, and fearing to do wrong; let principles, and not temporary expedients, prevail. The expediency of the day passes with the sun which sinks to rest, but principles are eternal, and in their beautiful operation upon the systems of Governments shine more and more as time rolls on. And now, may I be permitted to make an appeal to this House? Who are we? Delegates assembled from every part of this great nation. Delegated for what? To decide first upon our organization, but not to remain for weeks deciding to organize for action; to put forth that energy with which we are invested; to extend that relief which is imperiously demanded. At what time and in what crisis are we called upon to administer the Government of this great Republic, this vast empire, extending over so many lands, embracing so many people, and circumscribing so many and conflicting interests? At a time and under circumstances which demand all our resources to be brought into action, all our wisdom to be put in requisition, all our firmness to be displayed, and all our virtues to be exercised. The cities are distressed; the country habitations are no longer the residence of tranquillity; commerce is paralyzed; credit it is ruined; and your finances are disordered. Around you and within you there is danger, distress, bankruptcy; in your land there is war; on your borders there are rumors of war. In the East there are portentous signs; the line is but barely marked across which the border hordes are ready to mingle in conflict. One error, one false step, a breath, a stir, may precipitate this country into the dark gulf beneath. In the South, those citizens who are peculiarly under you care—the inhabitants of your territory—are at this moment writhing beneath the merciless inflictions of savage barbarity, and loudly crying unto you to extend your arms and rescue them from death. In the West—the far West is not free from apprehension. You have driven the Indian tribes from the valley of the Mississippi to the base of the Rocky mountains. But did you first infuse into their bosoms the charity of the Gospel—good will towards men? Did you send them forth with hearts attuned to the melody of the angles' song, "Peace on earth?" Oh no! You acquired their lands by treaties which they never signed; by seals which they never made. You drove them from the homes of their fathers, from the graves of their warriors; and think you that suffering humanity will not vindicate its rights? Think you that that vengeance which is the Indian's virtue will not rouse up the several tribes, and bid them send forth the battle cry of their nation over the vast prairies and rock dells of the remotest States? The signs are much to be mistaken if they are not already concerting the scheme of a general and connected, a leagued and covenanted opposition to you and your institutions. They have learnt their strength in alliance; they are merging the hatred of each tribe in one uncompromising hostility to the whites; and unless you prepare quickly—unless you make appropriations to sustain the system you have formed for their government, the fruitful, the glorious West may become the field of slaughter for your citizens, and the encamped plains of a barbarous and triumphant foe. With such numerous, such accumulating, such fearful difficulties surrounding us, shall we stand lingering here, mocking the hopes of an expecting, a confiding people? In the name of humanity, in the name of justice, in the name of that God who wheels his throne upon the rolling spheres as He passes over the nations to call them to account, and their rulers to judgment, I invoke you to press forward to the decision of this case, to the assertion of your prerogatives, to the organization of your body, to the doing of the people's work, to the advancement of righteousness and the glory of the nation.

REPORT ON THE FINANCES.

REPORT FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ON THE FINANCES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 3, 1839.

The undersigned respectfully submits to Congress the following report on the finances, in obedience to the "Act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department."

It is gratifying to be able to state, notwithstanding the embarrassments of the present year, that the revenues of the General Government have been increased, the expenditures diminished, and most of the Treasury notes redeemed.

Revenue and means for 1839, exclusive of trusts and the Post Office.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1839, which could be considered available for general purposes, was - -	$2 466,961 95
The receipts from customs, the first three quarters, as appearing on the Register's books, are	$18,328,393 50
This includes about two millions and three-fourths collected last year in Treasury notes, but not carried on his books till 1839. From this cause the actual receipts in this year will, to that extent, appear larger than they ought.
Receipts from lands the first three quarters, including also some collected last year in Treasury notes - - - -	5,417,286 31
Miscellaneous receipts - -	125,208 78
Estimated receipts for the fourth quarter from all those sources -	5,700,000 00
Receipts on some of the debts against banks not available on 1st January, 1839, but since paid - - - -	1,322,686 60
From the third issue of Treasury notes under the act of March 2, 1839 - - - -	3,857,276 21
Aggregate means - -	$37,217,812 75

Expenditures for 1839, exclusive of the Post Office and trusts.

Civil, foreign, and miscellaneous, for the first three quarters -	$3,649,508 23
Military, for the first three quarters - - - -	10 791,799 21
Naval, for the first three quarters	4,713,701 57
Estimate for all, during the fourth quarter - - -	5,600,000 00
Funded debt for year - -	14,658 98
	24,769,667 99
Redemption of Treasury notes in the first three quarters, interest as well as principal - -	9,891,759 83
This includes two millions and three-fourths paid in for duties and lands last year, but not carried on the Register's books till 1839. From this cause the expenditures on that account will appear larger by that amount than they actually have been within those quarters.
Estimated amount of notes redeemed in the fourth quarter -	1,000,000 00
Aggregate payments -	35,661,427 82
Leaving an available balance of money in the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1839, of -	1,556,384 93
	$37 217,812 75

The funds computed to be not available, nor applicable to public purposes, at the commencement and at the close of the present year, can be seen in the table before mentioned.

Public debt and Treasury notes.

The condition of the small remains of the funded debt has not materially altered since the last annual report. A statement of it, with the several payments made within the year, is herewith exhibited.

Though incommoded by repeated pressures in the money market and suspensions of specie payment by the banks, within the last three years, the interest and all the principal due on that debt, as well as on Treasury notes, have been punctually paid in specie whenever desired.

Not more than one fourth of a million of the first and second emissions, and two millions and a half of the third, will probably remain outstanding at the close of the year. The former emissions have been for some months redeemable, but the last one does not begin to be till March, 1840, except as previously offered in payment of public dues. The aggregate of two millions and three-fourths of principal is therefore all that it is computed will be unpaid of nearly twenty millions, which were issued since October, 1837, in consequence of indulgences granted to the merchants on their bonds, and the banks on their deposite debts. At no one time has the amount of notes outstanding been allowed to exceed ten millions, and the present very reduced aggregate, unredeemed, is less than the sums still owing from the banks that suspended specie payments in 1837, and from the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States on its bond due in September next; and might with ease have been paid during the present year, had the money been received on those claims.

Exports and Imports within the commercial year 1839.

The exports during the year ending September 30, 1839, are computed to have been $118,339,004. This is $9,872,368 more than those in the year 1838.

Of the whole exports only $17,408,000 were of foreign origin, and of the excess in exports over 1838, only about five millions were domestic produce.

The imports during the same year were about $157,609 560, being the very large excess of $43,892,356 over those during the previous year. This may be a solution of a portion of the pressure in the money market. The difference between the imports and exports, being $39,250,556 in favor of the former, is larger than in any year, except three, since 1789, and is much larger than any difference in the valuation of the same articles with the profits in the foreign trade added. It must, therefore, except so far as reduced by an unusual quantity of goods consigned here from abroad, and yet in store unsold, be a very decisive evidence of an increased indebtedness by this country to other nations. And except so far as this new indebtedness may consist of stocks sold and the proceeds returned here in merchandise, it must furnish another proof of one immediate cause of the present pecuniary pressure.

The history of our commerce during the twenty years from 1818 to 1838, presents a singular change in the last half of that period, which tends strongly to illustrate the correctness of these suggestions. During the first half of it the excess of imports over exports was only about seventy-five millions of dollars, or in the proportion of near seven millions and a half annually on an average.

But during the last ten years of it the excess was near two hundred and twelve millions, or over twenty millions annually; and thus more than two hundred and fifty per cent. greater than it had been. Supposing that the seven and a half millions were composed principally of the fair profits and difference in valuation, the excess over that rate in the last ten years must constitute a debt, either mercantile, State, or corporate. It equals near one hundred and thirty-seven millions before 1839. The debt thus computed to have been created abroad, by stocks and otherwise, within that period, will, with the amount of previous indebtedness, form an aggregate quite as large as has been estimated by many from other data.

Further particulars, possessing a general interest and relating to this subject during the last six years, are exhibited in the statement annexed. Additional information of some importance concerning our exports and imports, from the commencement of the Government to 1838, inclusive, has been prepared, and is subjoined in other tables. These tables are intended to be in a form convenient for a reference, and are calculated, by easy as well as extensive comparisons, to throw new light on several subjects of commerce and other branches of industry connected with the finances. They exhibit not only the whole exports and imports in each year, but the consumption of the latter, and the changes in the whole aggregate value of each principal article, whether exported or imported, and the progress of our foreign trade to and from each State separately, as far back as is practicable, and to and from each country of much commercial importance abroad. A few of the most striking results are condensed in a note.

Estimate of the Receipts and Expenditures for 1840.

For reasons hereafter to be explained, the receipts into the Treasury, the ensuing year, cannot be estimated so high as in 1839.

From the best information possessed by this department, it is computed that the aggregate of them, available for public purposes, will not exceed $18,600,000, viz: from

Customs - - - -	$15,000,000
Lands - - - -	3,500,000
Miscellaneous - - -	100,000
Add to these the balance available and applicable to other purposes, which it is supposed will be in the Treasury on the first of January, 1840 - - - - -	1,556,385

The efficient means in that year will then amount, in the aggregate, to	20,156,385
If Congress should make appropriations to the extent desired by the different departments, the expenditures for 840, independent of the redemption of Treasury notes, are estimated at - - -	20,000,000
Including all the Treasury notes to be redeemed, the aggregate expenditure would be about - - -	22,750,000
This would leave a deficit in the Treasury at the close of the year, amounting to - - -	2,593,615
But there will be due from the United States Bank, in September next, on its fourth bond, about - -	2,526,576
The principal now due on the Treasurer's deposites in other banks, which suspended specie payments in 1837, is - - - -	1,149,904
Should all these claims be collected in 1840, they would prevent a deficiency, and leave an available balance in the Treasury of nearly -	1,082,865

It is not, however, considered prudent to rely exclusively on the collection of these debts.

One mode, then, of obviating any difficulty from that circumstance, will be to reduce the aggregate of new appropriations, by postponing some and lessening others, so that the means probably available will be sufficient to meet all calls upon the Treasury, and leave in it an average balance of about two millions.

It is believed, for reasons enumerated hereafter, that such a reduction is possible without essential injury to any useful object, and that this balance is the smallest, which is adequate to secure promptitude and good faith in public payments, so heavy in amount as ours, so unexpected at times in the demands for them, and so dispersed over a wide territory. If the appropriations are not thus reduced, it will be wise to provide seasonably in some other way for the amounts of the contingent deficiency, and of such a balance.

According to the opinions of the different departments, as to the sums of money proper for each, and which constitute the basis of the estimates submitted to Congress, the new appropriations required for the next year will equal the sum of - - - $18,280,600 55

Viz:

Civil foreign intercourse and micellaneous	$4,981,344 19
Military services, pensions, &c.	8,213,610 74
Naval service,	5,085,645 62

Besides these, the permanent appropriations, which, by existing laws and the modification of them recommended, first become chargeable on the Treasury in 1840, amount to $1,586,000. They are, in the War Department, $1,236,000; in the Navy, $340,000; and public debt, $10,000. The principal on Treasury notes falling due will be about $2,750,000 more. The appropriations already made and chargeable, which will remain uncalled for at the end of the present year, are estimated, by the different departments, at the further sum of $11,827,371, though that is considered by the undersigned as likely to be about two millions too small. Of these they compute that nearly $8,270,793 will be required, in order to accomplish the objects contemplated by them. It is proposed to apply $3,014,711 to the service of the ensuing year without re-appropriation, and the residue of about $541,866, not being required in order to accomplish these objects, will go to the surplus fund. It therefore follows, if all the new appropriations called for are made, that the whole charge upon the Treasury in 1840, exclusive of the Treasury notes outstanding, will amount at least to $31,152,106, of which, as previously observed, it is computed that $20,000,000 will be expended within that year for ordinary purposes, or two millions and three-fourths more, including the redemption of Treasury notes. From these statements, it must be perceived that our condition in relation to the deposite of another instalment of public money with the States remains much the same as at the close of the year 1838. Consequently, the views then expressed by the department have continued to govern its course.

This state of the finances renders it also unnecessary to submit any remarks upon the impolicy of providing for the additional deposite or distribution of surpluses not likely to occur, or for any donation of the proceeds of the public lands, while they are all needed to defray the ordinary expenses of the General Government.

Besides the further objection to some of these measures, arising from their apparent conflict with constitutional principles, it must be manifest, that if the proceeds of the lands should be given away when needed to discharge appropriations, the deficiency must be made up by the unpleasant alternative of a resort to loans or increased taxation.

Explanations concerning the estimates of receipts.

The estimates of receipts from duties and lands during the next year have been made lower than for 1839, for the following reasons:

A further reduction of certain duties, amounting to nearly $800,000, will take place after the close of the present year. It likewise happens that, subsequent to a large importation and a fall of prices in the articles exported, as in 1839, the amount of imports often declines for one or two years. After 1825, it declined uninterruptedly for six years.

The contractions and expansions of our paper currency have at times proved another striking indication of the reduction and increase in importations. Without dwelling here on the intimate connection between them as cause and effect, by means of the foreign exchanges, and the necessity, after overtrading and overissues by the banks, of drawing on them and adjusting large balances in specie, it may be observed that a diminution in the circulation of paper has been going on for several months. Hence a diminution in the imports has already commenced, and is confidently expected to continue for some time.

The country is also supposed to be supplied with foreign merchandise in greater abundance than it was a year ago. This will lead not only to a reduced demand for the importation of more goods, but to a greater export of what is already here, to other and better markets, and thus, by increased drawbacks, as well as diminished imports, materially lessen the net receipts from customs.

The price of some of our principal articles of exports being lower, the same quantity will likewise furnish less ability to make purchases abroad, and, where the quantity is larger, the commercial embarrassments both there and here will tend to prevent buying, on either side of the Atlantic, much beyond what is needed for early consumption. The greatly increased liabilities on the part of many corporations, and States, for the payments of interest and dividends on their stocks owned by foreigners, will still more sensibly affect the revenue. Those payments must require millions of exports either in produce or specie, which will lead to no returns in additional imports. It is believed that within a few years past an annual tax or drain on this country has thus been created, equal to twelve or thirteen millions of dollars.

This is a new and important element, besides overbanking and overtrading, to disturb the industry, the commerce and finances of the Union. Its rapid growth has been accelerated by the distribution of the surplus in deposite among the States, tempting them in several instances to new and unprofitable enterprises, and stimulating delusive hopes of still further distributions. Its influence for evil has been aggravated by a few other causes, some of them temporary in duration and limited in extent, but others diffused in a degree over considerable portions of the civilized world, and presenting some singular anomalies in credit, currency and trade. But without enlarging on the consideration of them here, the following conclusions may be regarded as inevitable.

Should the States not speedily suspend more of their undertakings, which are unproductive, but, by new loans or otherwise, find means to employ armies of laborers in consuming rather than raising crops, and should prices thus continue in many cases to be unnaturally inflated, as they have been of late years in the face of a contracting currency, the effect of it on our finances will be still more to lessen exports, and consequently the prosperity and revenue on our foreign trade. It will also impede the sale of the public lands, by diverting labor from the soil to works which, for some time, must be wholly without profit. Circumstances like those, with the scarcity of money and high rate of interest abroad produced by them and other occurrences, not necessary to be now repeated, have already diminished the income in the present year below what it otherwise would have been, and will probably manifest their power much more in the year to come.

The estimates for revenue from lands have been reduced the most in proportion, because, besides the diminution of sales, which will probably be caused by the present and prospective scarcity of money and fall of the prices of produce, the amount received from them during the present year has, as was anticipated by the department, been much increased by the temporary power of the late preemption law.

The unusual quantity of land newly advertised during the year 1839, and the consequent large receipts connected with that cause and the pre-emptions, are circumstances not likely to recur in 1840. It is believed, therefore, that the low estimates submitted as to lands will prove sufficiently high, unless a graduation bill should pass. The effect of such a bill, judging from reason and from analogy to the graduated prices, under which lands are now selling, on account of the Chickasaw Indians, at Pontitoc, much more freely than elsewhere within the same State, would be to add considerably to the revenue for a few years.

Explanations of the estimates as to expenditures and of some further reductions in them.

The estimates of expenditure for ordinary purposes in 1840 are in the aggregate about five millions less than what it is computed will be spent in 1839. This great reduction has been proposed, although the expenses of 1839 will be quite six millions less than those of 1838, and those of 1838 were somewhat less than the expenses of the previous year.

The various items of new appropriations asked for are, as usual, in the amounts requested by the different departments having charge of the different subjects. If any omissions or miscalculations occur in them, they must, therefore, happen from inadvertence by those officers best acquainted with the business within their own peculiar province.

But, in the present condition of the country and the finances, it is not expected that much necessity will arise, either in the opinion of those departments or of Congress, to make important additions to the sums now requested. On the contrary, it is confidently hoped that some reductions from them can be effected without material injury to any great national interests.

It is difficult in a young, growing, and enterprising community, to restrict public expenditures within reasonable limits. Certain exigencies also occasionally occur requiring extraordinary sacrifices. When patriotism and honor demand large pecuniary contributions, the latter are richly repaid by their tendency to impart vigor and security to the former. But, an expenditure of twenty millions of ordinary purposes, though much reduced from the aggregate during a few years past, is believed by the undersigned to be more, instead of less, than sound policy justifies, while the present unusual embarrassment in moneyed affairs shall continue. Indeed, strong doubts exist, if it be not more than the real necessities of the General Government usually require. The reasons for this conclusion are briefly these: It is true that such an expenditure, equalling only a dollar and a fourth per head of our population, is not a very large one to sustain a Confederacy with such widely extended duties as this. If reduced to the amount of imposts, which are the whole real burden, and if compared with the taxes elsewhere, equalling sometimes fifteen dollars per head, under political institutions of different forms and less frugality, the pressure from that source here would seem to be remarkably light.

But it should be remembered that the people of the United States are obliged to defray a large amount of other public expenses imposed upon them by State authorities, and, at the same time, that their forms of government, among various excellencies, have been preferred particularly for their economy. Hence the true question with them, in respect to expenditures, is, not how large burdens can be borne, but how much can be dispensed with. It is not what is splendid, but what is useful and necessary—not how much can be collected from them without suffering, but how much can be left with them, both of money and power, and insure all the benefits of the social system.

As the interests and wishes of the people formed the Government, they should control it.

Considering these circumstances, and the severe simplicity and frugality befitting a republic, what amount of public expenses is necessary?

In 1831, it was calculated that the ordinary expenses of the General Government need not exceed fifteen millions of dollars. The undersigned expressed an opinion four or five years afterwards, that sixteen or seventeen millions would then be sufficient; and he still believes that, notwithstanding the continued increase of our population and wealth, they might, with prudence, be limited to eighteen millions in 1840, and, perhaps, after the expiration of most of the present pensions, and the removal of the rest of the Indians, be for some time diminished still lower.

Indeed, in point of fact, so recently as 1834 and 1835, the whole yearly expenses were only seventeen and eighteen millions, independent of the public debt. Though the amount has since been increased by wars, pensions, Indian removals, and other peculiar causes, deemed at the time, in most cases, sufficient to justify the appropriations by large, and often unanimous votes in Congress, yet a reduction has been going on during 1838 and 1839, and all the ordinary expenditures would not in the present year, but for the pension list and Indian disbursements, exceed the smallest sum last mentioned. The whole increase, however, has not been confined to these two items, nor could the whole reduction safely be, which, in the opinion of the undersigned, sound economy appears to require.

In the inquiry as to the amount of expenditure which should be considered necessary, light may sometimes be obtained by adverting to the increase of population and wealth. Looking to those, if the expenditure, independent of the public debt, was reasonable in magnitude during the first eight years of our present Government, the sum of seventeen or eighteen millions annually would not now be greatly disproportionate, nor probably be found either much deficient or very unnecessary. It would be nearly five times the average amount about half a century ago, while our population, since that time, has undoubtedly increased more than four fold, and our wealth and resources have probably increased in a ratio still larger. The last remark, however, is a matter of inference from various data, more or less accurate in themselves; such as the average importations, which have only doubled in the last forty or fifty years; the foreign tonnage, which has increased but in a like ratio; the exports of domestic produce, which have quadrupled since 1792; and the whole tonnage, including domestic as well as foreign, which has also quadrupled, and become more than proportionally efficient by introducing into it over eight hundred steam vessels.

Other data, less accurate, but not less sure indications of a still larger increase in wealth, are to be found in the vast extension of agriculture, manufactures, the mechanic arts, and various useful applications of steam, as well as in opening roads and canals, building up flourishing cities, enlarging our territory, diffusing practical education, and multiplying, by ways too numerous for repetition, the comforts, advantages, and powers of a great and prosperous people.

But such general considerations, though beneficial in comparative examinations, are usually better tests of the ability to pay than of the propriety of the expenses themselves. A scrutiny into the principal items of the latter, and their amounts at this time, compared with those from forty to fifty years ago, will aid much, in connection with the considerations before mentioned, in forming a more accurate judgment on the propriety and necessity of most of the present expenditures. It will show what branches have since sprung into being, and what, from their character, should or should not be longer continued.

Some suggestions were submitted on this subject in the last annual report, and its importance must be the excuse for adding more on this occasion. The expenditures nominally connected with foreign intercourse have increased least. Those connected with the War Department have increased most. The civil and miscellaneous charges continue comparatively moderate. But several of our heaviest burdens, such as the navy, the pensions, Indian disbursements, and a class consisting of light-houses, fortifications, roads, and improvements in harbors and rivers, have augmented very largely since the first eight years of the Government. Some of them have increased more than fifty fold.

On a careful examination it will be seen that various vindications, more or less plausible, have been made for these additions at different periods; but they cannot be now applicable for the continuance of them all.

Thus, the enlargement of our naval expenses from less than half a million yearly before 1795, to more than six millions now, was in some degree justified, from time to time, as an efficient aid to foreign intercourse with semi-barbarous people, and for the protection of our commerce and citizens against injustice or rapine whether in remotest Asia, or nearer quarters of the globe. The increase of pensions from only forty or fifty thousand dollars yearly at first, and only eighty thousand as late as 1811, to nearly four millions now, was defended on various grounds. But in most cases it was considered less as a liberal charity than as a payment of the Revolutionary debt to a patriotic soldiery, who advanced arduous services in the field rather than money, and endured sufferings in the the establishment of our liberties, which a grateful posterity should endeavor to remunerate. The Indian expenditures, enlarged from a few thousands to three or four millions of dollars, have been regarded as the most efficacious means of improving permanently the condition of the aborigines, as wisely extending the boundaries of civilization over the new States, and, in a fiscal view, as profitable advances of money, soon to be fully repaid by the sales of lands, to which the Indian title has thus been amicably extinguished. The other group of items, for forts, light-houses, roads, harbors, and rivers, some entirely new, and the whole augmented from fifty thousand dollars to three and four millions, have, on several occasions, and to a proper extent, been considered as prudent precautions for national defence and useful aids to the extension and security of commerce. Some expenses of smaller magnitude may have swollen quite as fast as these; others with less rapidity; and others still have been wholly created since 1797. Part of them have apparently become a permanent charge on the Treasury, and part undoubtedly may be, as others have been, properly discontinued. But, without time now to go into the consideration of details as to any except those four enumerated classes, it may be added that these are, when united, nearly quadruple all the other ordinary expenditures; and either of those four classes alone amounts yearly to a sum about equal to all the other ordinary expenditures, and more than the whole of every kind except the public debt, each year, from 1789 to 1797.

The precise periods when the greatest increases happened, and the ratio of them, have not kept an uniform pace with the progress of population and wealth. In many respects the ratio has not been nearly so great during the last ten or twenty years as in some previous terms. Thus, the whole expenses of the Government in 1793, with the exception before mentioned, were about three millions yearly; and in 1818, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, had increased, though in a period of peace, to fifteen millions of dollars, or five fold, while our population in that people had only doubled. But, during the next sixteen or seventeen years, as in 1834 and 1835, the expenses had enlarged not twenty-five per cent. while our population had advanced at least sixty-six per cent. During the present year, though in intermediate periods, chiefly from Indian wars and removals, considerably higher, they will not exceed the amount of 1818 more than sixty-six per cent. while our population has since increased more than eighty-four per cent. Again, take the progress in the ordinary civil expenses, which include those of the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial departments, miscellaneous and foreign intercourse; all of them united were but a little over half a million of dollars in 1793; while in 1818, they had increased to nearly four millions, or eight hundred per cent. though our population had augmented only one hundred per cent.

But since the last date, that class of expenditures has not enlarged forty per cent. having been not over five millions and a half in either 1837, 1838, or probably 1839, while our population has advanced eighty four per cent. or more than double that rate. All can thus perceive where, when, and and in what, the greatest increases have occurred—the principal reasons, whether sufficient or otherwise, assigned for several of them, and the ample opportunity which still exists for further retrenchments, so far as the public interests are supposed by Congress to require them, in any or all of these large burdens on the public Treasury.

As some encouragement to hope for a continued reduction in several of them, without injury to any of the important establishments of the country, it may be observed that portions of these items of expense, and several smaller ones, must cease for ever with the temporary occasion for them, and others will not, when once completed, require renewal soon, if ever. Such are numerous special donations and grants: durable public buildings of all kinds, dry-docks, improvements at navy yards, forts, arsenals and arms, roads and harbors constructed, obstructions in rivers removed, the manufacture of weights and measures, the survey of the coast, much of the removal of the Indians, the extinguishment of Indian titles, and most of the existing pensions. But unpleasant as is the task of reduction, it may also become necessary to go farther, and diminish on a general pro rata scale or otherwise, the compensation to all officers, civil and military, executive, judicial and legislative. It is surely much better to do this, so far as the public exigencies may require and justice sanction, than to expose the Treasury to bankruptcy, by continuing to make appropriations beyond the certain means provided for the payment of them, or to resort, in a period of peace, to the spendthrift and suicidal policy of effecting permanent loans to defray ordinary expenditures. Peace is the time to pay rather than incur debts, and it would be wiser for any nation even to hoard during peace than to borrow largely, and thus encumber still more those energies and resources which are naturally crippled by war, but whose whole vigor is so conducive to its success.

The preceding remarks are applicable to ordinary expenditures. But for extraordinary ones, such as, within a few years past, the expensive removal of the Creeks and Cherokees, the Black Hawk and Florida wars, while equal caution may well be exercised in deciding on their necessity, yet, when once that is admitted, less objection exists to temporary measures for relief, like Treasury notes or short loans, provided a permanent increase of taxation is not likely to be required in the end.

In voting for extraordinary charges, as well as in sanctioning, from sympathy or justice, unexpected appropriations towards large private claims and interesting local objects, it often happens that heavy payments are imposed on the Treasury for purposes not contemplated in the ordinary estimates.

And the obvious propriety of generally making at the same time some new provision of means adequate to the discharge of such additional burdens, is sometimes unfortunately overlooked. But, when acting on these or other cases, if Congress cannot, consistently with its views of duty to the country, adopt the course suggested, and restrict the amount of appropriations, whether ordinary or extraordinary, to the certain current revenue, the only remaining courses which seem defensible are these: either to provide for recalling portions of the public money now deposited with the States, or establish an adequate system of direct taxation, or at once resort to the contingent power contemplated in the existing laws concerning the tariff when changes become necessary for purposes of revenue, and restore the duty on several articles of luxury now free.

On some permanent safeguard under fluctuations in receipts and expenditures.

Much has at times been wisely done by Congress to supply means for meeting unexpected deficiencies. But all legal provisions heretofore adopted for that purpose having expired, our financial operations will be constantly exposed to danger, unless some permanent safeguard under contingencies is established.

These circumstances must constitute an apology for once more explaining some of the grounds in favor of such a measure, and earnestly asking speedy legislation concerning it.

The principal sources of our present revenue are sensibly affected by fluctuations not only in commercial prosperity, but in the crops, the banking policy, and credit systems of even foreign nations. The influence of these causes seems to become yearly more changeable and more uncertain in its extent.

Numerous illustrations in support of these views have been referred to in former reports. Some of them show a sudden and great falling off in the regular receipts, though during peace, as the duties in 1816, from nine millions in one quarter, to only three in the next; and as the sales of public lands, from twenty-four millions in 1836, or an amount over half of all received in the previous forty years, to less than three millions in 1838. But the returns from the districts in some States during the last two years present additional facts equally striking on this subject.

In Michigan, for instance, the sales of public lands in 1836 exceeded five millions of dollars. They fell in 1838 to only $154,284; and in Mississippi, where, in 1835 and 1836, they exceeded three millions each year, they fell in 1838 to only $96,636. As before intimated, a portion of such extraordinary fluctuations results from the vacillating character of the sources from which our revenue is derived. But most of them are evils inseparable from the periodical contractions and expansions incident to the present defective system of banking, in a country so full of enterprise as ours, with such freedom in pursuits, such facilities of intercourse, and such strong temptations to rash speculation.

The fluctuations, however, are not confined to the receipts. The expenditures, which may be sanctioned by Congress annually, are very uncertain in their amount, as well as doubtful in the proportion of them, which will be called for within the year, or in any particular portion of it.

All these, and similar considerations in favor of some permanent provision on this subject, apply with still greater force than they have heretofore. The available balance in the Treasury to facilitate its operations, is much smaller than has formerly been usual. The receipts on the debts still due from banks, after two previous disappointments as to some of them, must be regarded with increased doubt, and if they should be paid within the coming year, the outstanding Treasury notes become redeemable in the first half of it, and must be discharged some months before the bond of the United States Bank falls due in September.

The introduction of steam in voyages across the Atlantic, besides the great revolution it must produce in other respects, will so expedite orders and imports, as to produce a sensible departure from the former more uniform periods of laying in stocks of certain kinds of merchandise in advance, and must thus add to the irregularity in our receipts from imports, as well as to the uncertainty in previously estimating their amount.

The practice of incurring expenses in certain cases, sometimes legislative, and sometimes military, or of a different character, in anticipation of appropriations, and occasioned by unexpected necessities or unusual delays, seems to be increasing. It augments the risk of a temporary deficiency, because large sums thus become payable in a mass, and forthwith from the Treasury, when most of the members of Congress, at the time of making the appropriations, expect that the burden will be spread somewhat equally over the whole of the ensuing year.

Why, then, should not a constant safeguard, or some permanent remedy under such irregularities, be provided? The omission to do this can hardly be considered the true check on extravagant expenditure, as that check would seem to consist rather in a forbearance to make unnecessary appropriations, than in a refusal to provide ample means for paying with promptitude, under all probable contingencies, what has already been appropriated, and has thus received the deliberate sanction of Congress. The national pride, no less than its honor and credit, appears to be concerned, in adopting some measure on this subject, stable, efficient, creditable to free institutions, and possessing a paramount influence to preserve unspotted the public faith.

The States now possess, separately, quite as deep an interest in such an arrangement as the General Government, since a blow on the credit of the latter would, like an electric shock, be felt through the whole of them, and inevitably depreciate still more their immense amounts of stocks.

It is hoped that an actual failure to furnish means to make prompt payment, under all contingencies, and thus producing the very violation of good faith so much to be deprecated, will not be necessary to awaken its guardians to the urgent importance of some such remedial provision; a measure, without which, in the shape of an investment, or large balance on hand, or authority given to postpone certain classes of appropriation, when the revenue proves insufficient for the whole, or some power to borrow money, or issue, on interest, when necessary, drafts or exchequer bills, no financial system in any enlightened country has been, or can be, long administered with safety and honor.

In our system, the provision on this subject was very uniform and permanent, till the extinguishment of the national debt in 1835. Previous to that time, a large balance beyond the expenses for ordinary purposes was generally collected, and being kept on hand till near the close of the year, so as to assist in any contingency, was then, if not thus wanted, applied towards the payment of the debt.

After that time, the first resort, in the event of fluctuations, was temporary, and consisted of the accidental and unexpected accumulation which immediately followed. When parts of that accumulation were expended, and the residue was divided among the States, instead of being invested, and held to meet deficiencies, the recall of it, as fast as needed for the latter purpose, was still sanctioned by Congress, and constituted the next permanent remedy. But this power of recall was afterwards taken from the Treasury Department, and, instead of it, the payment of one instalment was postponed, and a very limited authority given to issue Treasury notes for aid in any contingency. That authority also expired in June last, and while in force, contained requisitions immediately to receive those notes in payments when offered, and at the same time preventing the reissue of them, which proved to be exceedingly inconvenient and hazardous—which have already rendered two additional acts of Congress necessary, and which, in a moneyed crisis like the present, not only endangers all fiscal operations, but would have stopped some of the most important of them, if not obviated in a degree, by seasonable arrangements, made in anticipation of difficulty.

The Department, therefore, is now without any resort, temporary or permanent, in case of material deficiencies, and considering all the circumstances before mentioned, with the dangerous liability in law to have the whole outstanding Treasury notes paid in at any moment for public dues, without a power remaining to issue others in their stead; considering also the present revulsions in the commercial world, which affects so seriously the receips from both duties and lands; considering the disasters which are befalling the banks and rendering our collected funds in some cases wholly unavailable, and the advances necessary to be soon made for the large payments of pensions, and Treasury notes falling due in March, the earliest attention to new legislation on this subject seems highly prudent, if not indispensable, for the effectual security of the public credit.

The manner of keeping the public money, with the proper guards against losses.

During the present year, the public money has been kept in the following manner. Where suitable banks could be obtained, in conformity to the act of June 23, 1836, it has been placed in them, in general deposite. When such could not be obtained, and the amounts were likely to be permanently large, or were not collected by any public officer, the money has been placed in banks, in special deposite, either in the modified form, as explained last year, or under particular stipulations in writing. In other cases, where it was small in amount, or likely to be wanted immediately for public use, it has remained with those collecting it till drawn for.

Only two banks are now employed as general depositories, under the act of June, 1836.

In respect to the system at present in use, it is not proposed to add much to the comments, which have been submitted on its defects, in former reports. The failures among the banks within the last few months have again strongly illustrated those defects.

Without further legislation, this system cannot be made, and it certainly is not now the most safe and convenient one, whether Congress intend to continue a system of banks, or adopt one independent of banks, or employ a mixed one composed of both. But it is a system forced on the Department, by the peculiarities of the existing laws and the present condition of our banking institutions. It is believed to be the best one possible, consistent with them. Under the present arrangements no eventful losses are supposed to have been sustained, which are properly attributable to this mode of keeping the public money. Any small ones, which are likely to happen, appear to be the result of the usual risks incident to the mere collection and disbursement of the money, without reference to the manner of keeping it, and these kinds of risks are inseparable from any system heretofore in force on this subject, whether consisting of an United States Bank, or State banks, or either of those mixed with individual officers.

An exclusive use of bank corporations for collecting and disbursing, as well as keeping all the public money, could alone dispense with the employment of individual officers for the two former purposes, which has prevailed from the foundation of the Government. Such an innovation has been proposed by some, and more especially in the large seaports. But it would create a radical change in the whole theory of all our collection laws. It would subject the Government in most of its fiscal concerns to an entire and humiliating dependence on moneyed corporations. And should the latter, though increased so much in power, not aspire more to misuse it, yet a wider door would thus be opened to sinister influences as well as to great fiscal derangements and ultimate losses. Recent events have evinced the dangers of these so strikingly as to justify all in being more mistrustful, and to render the further consideration of such a plan unnecessary.

The chief difficulty under the old systems need only be understood clearly to be duly appreciated. It has not been in making large payments or large transfers, when using for deposite either the State banks or the United States Bank. Receivers and collectors have also in many places effected payments with promptitude and to great amounts, and almost every trouble in transfers by them would be obviated by the authority heretofore asked for t e Treasurer, to receive money for lands in advance at points mutually convenient to the purchaser and the Treasurer. But the greatest defect in any former system, connected with this disturbing subject, has always been of a different character. It consists in a want of an absolute prohibition to employ the public money for any private purpose whatever, and in the want of severe penalties to enforce such a prohibition, and of other adequate checks and guards, possessing a preventive operation on both the minds and acts of officers, sufficiently powerful to diminish defalcations.

This defect has exposed the Treasury to constant losses, from the foundation of the Government, and under all systems hitherto in use. It can be effectually remedied by no official regulations, as these have neither the extent, respect, nor force of laws, but only by such new legislation, both penal and prohibitory, as has been repeatedly recommended by this Department, and as experience in most other countries has shown to be indispensable to check peculations in the most effective manner.

The correctness of the statement as to the existence of these losses under all systems and all administrations of them, which have prevailed since the present form of Government went into operation, has been shown generally from official records in reports made to Congress within the last two years, and they will appear more in detail in a reply, soon to be presented, to a resolution of the House of Representatives, calling for particulars concerning defaults in "each administration," from 1789 to 1837.

It is not proposed to enter here into minute particulars concerning the results as contained and exhibited in that reply. But a few general statements from them will throw light on the topic under consideration.

Losses appear to have occurred from defaults among officers in every "administration" or Presidential term, from the formation of the present Government. Thus, among disbursing officers, they are found in every term since 1789; among collecting officers in each since 1793; and among deposite officers, or banks, in all since 1817.

The largest amount of loss from each class, within the period described, has been by deposite officers, consisting of banks, and including, as the resolution requires, the depreciation on such of their notes as were taken for public dues. The loss by this class, at the lowest estimate, has exceeded six millions and a half of dollars; and, adopting a computation made by a committee of the House of Representatives, in 1832, would equal thirty-five millions. The next largest amount of loss, as ascertained and computed by the proper bureaus, has been by disbursing officers, and has been a little under five millions. And the least loss has been by collecting officers, not much exceeding two millions. The aggregate of all these losses, taking the lowest estimate for banks, is about thirteen millions and a half. If, in connection with this subject, were considered the losses in collecting the revenue by the non-payment of bonds for duties, on which credit was given to merchants, something over seven and a half millions of dollars must be added, increasing the aggregate to more than twenty-one millions. The proportionate losses by these classes have been thus: Those by the banks and by the duty bonds amount to more than two-thirds of the whole. The losses, either by the banks alone, or the merchants' bonds alone, have been nearly as great as by both disbursing and collecting officers united; and either is more than threefold as great as by collectors and receivers, and several millions more than by them, not only from 1789 to 1837, but from 1789 down to the present moment.

The particular losses in each Presidential term being also desired by the resolution, they have been ascertained; and, as they furnish a striking solution of some of the general causes of those losses, the periods in which the largest and some of the smallest ones happened among each class of public agents may be usefully designated here. Among the banks, the largest losses were from 1813 to 1817, then consisting entirely of depreciation on notes taken, and next from 1821 to 1824, consisting then chiefly of deposites; while from 1829 to 1833, and from 1833 to 1837, they were smaller than in any period since 1813. Among disbursing officers, looking to the amount disbursed, the largest losses were from 1821 to 1825, next from 1817 to 1821, and next from 1809 to 1813; and they were smaller from 1829 to 1833, and 1833 to 1837, than in any other term whatever, except from 1789 to 1793. The loss on each $100 from 1829 to 1833 was only nineteen cents, and from 1833 to 1837 only twenty-six cents; while in some previous terms it was as high as two dollars and sixteen cents. In this class the most numerous losses, compared with all in office, were from 1817 to 1821, next from 1821 to 1825 and next from 1813 to 1817. The smallest proportion in this respect, except during the first two terms under the Constitution, was from 1829 to 1833, and except those and the third term, the next smallest was from 1833 to 1837.

Among collecting officers, if looking to the amounts collected, the largest losses were from 1797 to 1801, next from 1809 to 1813, next from 1817 to 1821, and next from 1805 to 1809. The most numerous defaults, compared with the whole number of that class in office, were from 1809 to 1813, next from 1805 to 1809, next from 1821 to 1825, next from 1817 to 1821, and next from 1825 to 1829. The ratio of them from 1829 to 1833, and 1833 to 1837, was not one-fourth as large as in some of the periods just enumerated. Indeed it was less than in any previous terms from the foundation of the Government, except four, and the number of such defaulters was less than in any Presidential term since 1804.

The accounts of the Post Office establishment being kept separately, and its officers acting in the capacities both of collecting and disbursing, are not included in the above results, but will be given in the special report in distinct tables.

On a careful review of these data it must be obvious, that in the absence of any penal prohibition to use the public money for private purposes, and of other adequate securities against misconduct, the increased losses during some of the terms mentioned must have happened more from the strong temptations to misuse the money, combined with the calamities incident to war, extraordinary expansions and contractions in the currency, and great speculations and convulsions in trade, than from any peculiar rapacity among those then in public trust, or any special neglect on the part of those who were then either accounting officers, or possessed of the power to appoint and remove unfaithful agents.

Thus, in 1831, 1832, and 1833, prosperous but not speculating years, in the interior scarcely a single loss is supposed to have happened among receivers, though some were then reported for suit on previous defaults; and the same may be said of collectors then, and in 1835, prosperous but not speculating years on the seaboard. But, in more calamitous periods of trade, like 1797 and 1798, 1808 to 1813, 1818 to 1821, and 1837, sometimes succeeding others of rash speculation, the defaults multiplied among collectors, as well as disbursing agents. So, in similar periods in the interior, like 1818 to 1821, and 1836 and 1837, they increased among the receivers and the banks much in a ratio with the inordinate thirst for hazardous investments, and the overwhelming disasters which ensued from them and overissues of paper money.

Another very strong illustration of this is to be found in the periods of the greatest losses on merchants' bonds, compared with the whole amount of duties collected. These losses were the highest, from 1825 to 1829, of any term since the commencement of the Government, doubtless in a great measure growing out of the excessive mercantile speculations and failures of that period; and the next largest were from 1821 to 1825, resulting probably from like causes; while from 1829 to 1833, a period of comparative regularity in trade, the loss was smaller than in any other term since 1809, and less than even from 1793 to 1797, and 1797 to 1801.

On the other topic, as to the feasibility and utility of additional checks and penalties against defalcations, the illustrations referred to, as drawn from examples abroad, are these: Out of twenty-seven Governments, in respect to which accurate statements have been obtained, and which include almost every important civilized country in the world, twenty-six seem to prohibit any private use of the public money, either by collecting or disbursing agents. In six cases only do the deposite agents appear to be allowed the use of public funds, and that is only when those agents are banks, and the money is placed with them in general deposite. In a great majority of these Governments, the employment of public funds for private purposes by any agents whatever, is not only prohibited, but punished by severe penalties, such as imprisonment or the galleys, the penitentiary, and in some instances death. More minute checks and guards also are introduced in most of them, and less is left to discretion or regulation, even in monarchies, than here.

That course of making full and explicit statutory provisions on all these important points, and duly restricting Executive discretion, so liable to degenerate into tyranny, has before been repeatedly urged by the undersigned, from a regard as well to correct political principles as to an increase of the public security, and a diminution of the difficulties and responsibilities he has of late years been compelled to pass through, in a period of such immense collections and disbursements, accompanied by so severe revulsions in commerce, and such harassing bank suspensions.

Dwelling no longer now on this topic, he is convinced, not only that the measure for increased security in the collection and disbursement of the public money, but all the other provisions heretofore recommended, in the establishment of an Independent Treasury, for keeping and transferring it, should be early adopted. Prominently among these last, is the separation between the banks and the principal fiscal operations of the Government. That would be likely to produce many advantages, which have been explained so fully on former occasions that only a few of them need here be adverted to, and this very briefly. It would render a bankruptcy of the Treasury impossible, by a wide if not general suspension of specie payments. To the loss, vexation and discredit of this, the Government has already been more than once subjected, and a United States Bank, judging from experience abroad and analogy at home, would form no more effectual guarantee against it, than State banks during periods of extraordinary convulsions in trade, if administered under the present imperfect system of banking; or, in other words, under similar defective charters, and occasionally similar false banking principles. Such a separation would relieve both the banks and the Government from any further exposure to mutual impotunities, embarrassments and criminations. Both, and doubtless beneficially to both, would be left more to their own resources and less to dependence on each other's favor, whether instigated by cupidity on the one hand or political ambition on the other. Instead of increasing, it would diminish, Executive power; for the latter would be stripped of all bank influence, and be allowed in its stead neither the use nor possession of the public money, except under agents not selected by itself alone, as in case of the banks; little increased in number, guarded by additional securities, and forbidden by the severest penalties to use a dollar of it for any private purpose. It would tend to check improvident paper issues, that in some degree deteriorate the exchangeable value of specie itself as well as of paper, and it would secure the best possible currency in the present state of the Constitution and laws. In fine, it would remove all inducements to hoard what could not be used for profit, to delay payment of what could not be otherwise employed, to augment taxes or tariffs for deposites that can yield no emoluments, and to indulge in reproaches or suffer inconveniences, as banks now do, at being deprived, by public drafts, of funds which, under the proposed system, would only add to the risk and responsibility of the depositary instead of his gains, and would therefore be gladly parted with.

Condition of banking institutions generally, and the kind of money receivable for public dues.

The condition of the banking institutions generally in the United States is always a topic of some financial interest. But it now possesses less with the General Government than it did when the connection between them was more intimate and extensive.

It is regretted that space remains on this occasion for but little more, concerning their condition, than a reference to the special report which will soon be submitted from the last authentic returns that can be obtained.

In the mean time, however, it may be inferred from returns not very extensive, and from some general data, that since the first of January last the circulation of those banks now paying specie has probably, on an average, been curtailed quite one-third, or between sixteen and twenty millions; that the circulation of most of the others had not been increased at the time of their late suspension: that the aggregate amount of specie in all of them is not reduced more than than eight or ten millions; and that, since the fall in foreign exchange, these institutions, with a few exceptions, originating in gross departures from correct banking principles, by embarking in trade and by making large investments and long loans, often not to business men, nor for common business purposes, are as able as ever to sustain specie payments, provided they felt disposed to exercise their former forbearance and indulgences towards each other, and the community towards them. It is a source of much satifaction to add that the recent suspension has caused far less embarrassment, delay, and probable loss to the Treasury, whether by deposites in banks or the possession of their notes, than have occurred heretofore on similar occasions.

Two reasons exist for this. The banks have of late been employed and their notes taken to a less extent than was before customary, and the suspensions among them have been less general, by not reaching, it is computed, over one-third of the whole number in the United States, though including, perhaps, more than half of the whole banking capital. Of those suspending, fortunately only three of four held any considerable amounts of public money deposited with them since 1837, and they, as well as the rest now in public employ, have made commendable exertions to meet with fidelity their engagements to the Treasury.

The admonitions, however, which the late suspension has given in respect to the importance of some new legal provisions connected with the keeping of the public money, have not been slight, and have already been sufficiently noticed.

They appear to be equally strong in favor of some new legislation or additional regulations as to the kind of currency which should be received for public dues.

In relation to this last point the Constitution and laws are now explicit enough concerning what constitutes money.

But the practices under them, in receiving other things than gold and silver as money, or rather as a currency and substitute for money, have continued so long and been at times so loose as to create much danger and difficulty. The views of the Department on all portions of this subject were so fully explained to Congress on previous occasions, and more particularly in September, 1837, as to render it unnecessary to repeat them here.

But some illustrations and confirmations of those views, contained in the transactions of the present year, are new, and are as follows:

In sundry instances banks, as well as individuals, holding the Treasurer's drafts, have insisted on specie in payment, and refused to accept the current notes of specie paying banks.

This they had an undoubted right to do, and thus the idea has been strongly corroborated, that, however much both public and fiscal convenience may be promoted by the use of a paper currency, for either large or distant payments, yet the receipt of any thing short of specie, or the notes not only of specie paying banks, but such as are convertible into specie on the spot, and at par, can never effectually protect the public credit. The practical importance of this question under our present system will be the more obvious when it is understood that near twenty millions of the twenty-five expended this year, for ordinary purposes, have been, or will be paid by drafts drawn directly on collectors and receivers, and must therefore be met, not only by them, but in specie or its equivalent. It seems impossible, also, that eventual embarrassment and occasional losses by bank failures and suspensions should be obviated, if any thing but specie is long kept on hand by public agents of any description. Nor can any system operate as a check on overissues by banks, restrain the tendency to gambling speculations, and aid gradually in improving the currency of the country, as well as preserve in purity the true constitutional standard of value, unless the notes received are speedily paid over for public debts, when acceptable to creditors, and, at brief intervals, any of them left on hand are returned for specie to the institutions that issued them.

It appears that the effect which such a course would produce in the currency at large, by permanently withdrawing specie either from banks or from circulation, would, in ordinary times, be much less than many persons have apprehended. In the collection and payment of the above twenty millions by collectors and receivers, the whole amount on hand with all of them, at any one time, has seldom exceeded one million and a half.

At New York city, where nearly two-thirds of the customs of the whole Union are collected, and where the gross receipts this year will exceed fifteen millions of dollars, the amount on hand at any one time has not averaged half a million of dollars.

As an illustration of the system of drawing for this money speedily, it may be added, that the amount left at the close of each week, subject to drafts, has seldom equalled one-twentieth of a million.

At the recent suspension of specie payments, most of the funds in the custom-houses were composed of bank notes; but nearly half of those in the land offices consisted of specie. Though the notes on hand were issued by banks paying specie, and in good credit at the time they were taken, yet even a part of them, suddenly becoming irredeemable, has caused some inconvenience, several protests, and a few injurious delays, with both receivers and collectors. At the former suspension, as specie was the only currency then allowed to be taken by receivers, most of these difficulties were obviated with them, and were confined chiefly to the deposite banks, and large collectors. The great amount of specie which the receivers then possessed, contributed much, also, to the general relief of the Treasury, and especially furnished most opportune means for making legal, as well as satisfactory payments of the heavy Indian annuities, soon afterwards falling due in the West.

Some considerations we e intend d to be next presented on the permanent deficiency apprehended as likely to happen in the revenue after 1841, under the operation of the present tariff. But the length to which this communication has already extended, and the doubt whether Congress may deem it advisable to legislate so long beforehand in anticipation of an event which possibly, but not probably, may be avoided, have induced the Department to postpone, for the present, any particular remarks on a topic involving considerations of so difficult and agitating a character.

Miscellaneous.

Some of the leading changes which this Department, during the last five years, has thought proper to urge as material in connection with the finances may, before closing, be summarily and perhaps usefully condensed, and presented together to the consideration of Congress.

They are as follows:

A new organization of the Treasury Department in such respects as to ensure a more appropriate division of labor, a stricter accountability, and a closer supervision over the collection of the revenue by officers exclusively devoted to it.

An increase of the checks and securities against defaults in all officers, whether collecting, keeping, or disbursing public money, and more especially by prohibiting its use for private purposes under severe penalties.

Some provident fund, to be formed when any occasional and accidental surplus happens to be in the Treasury, (but never designedly raising one by taxation,) which shall be employed to meet contingencies and fluctuations instead of our being compelled frequently to resort to loans or increased taxes; and, in the absence of such a fund, a permanent authority to be given for the procurement of means, when needed, under unexpected deficiencies.

A reduction in the ordinary expenditures, so as for several years not to exceed seventeen or eighteen millions of dollars annually, unless, when the revenue is abundant, the great national works, which it is intended to complete in any event, should be hastened more, and, when the revenue is smaller, be proportionably retarded.

The passage of occasional pre-emption and graduation laws as to the public lands, under judicious limitations concerning the quantity sold in any one case, and for the prevention of frauds and partialities.

To reduce the tariff, whenever the amount of revenue justifies the measure; and always regulate its provisions with a paramount regard to finance, discouraging articles of luxury, and encouraging useful and necessary ones only as incidental objects in tariff legislation.

In connection with this policy of protecting freedom of trade, to resist monopolies and exclusive privileges, whether in banking or commerce.

The exclusion of small bank notes from circulation, so as to enlarge the quantity of specie within the country; increase the use of it, and especially of gold, for common purposes, and thus protect as well the banks against runs or panics, as the laboring classes from losses and depreciations incident to every paper currency, like ours, not founded on a specie basis as broad as the paper itself. And finally, the rapid extinguishment of any national debt, and the creation of no new one of a permanent description in peace.

A prominent feature in the policy which has thus been recommended as to our fiscal affairs, has been to leave to State legislation all matters of doubtful jurisdiction, as well as all clearly of a domestic and State character, whether connected with the revenue or the currency, the exchanges and commerce, or some other exciting interests of the country less intermingled with the immediate business of this Department. The undersigned takes pleasure in acknowledging that several of those enumerated measures did not originate with him; yet they have all received his earnest official support, and he is gratified that steps have already been taken by Congress, insuring, in part, the success of some of them.

The rest, as well as those, are again respectfully commended to favorable consideration, hoping that the scrutiny of longer discussion and reflection may have satisfied its members that the full adoption of them all would promote the durable prosperity of the finances, and at the same time be in harmony with the Constitution, and favorable to most of the great interests of the country.

In respect to several remaining matter connected with the finances and the duties devolved on this Department, it is proposed to postpone the consideration of most of them to special reports to Congress, and separate communications to suitable committees.

Among the latter is a mass of questions, chiefly connected with the public lands and the custom-house establishment. Among the former are the state of the light houses; the progress in the interesting survey of the coast; the manufacture of weights and measures; the condition of the Mint and its branches; the situation of our trade with the British provinces and West Indies; the disposition made of our deposites with the several States; and various other subjects of minor importance.

In a note annexed are explained briefly a few topics still different, and some of them more urgent in their character, such as the exclusive employment of one of the present Comptrollers as a commissioner of the customs; a revision of the number and compensation of officers in the customs, and especially their pay during the past year; the requirement of official security from district attorneys; a change in the commencement of the fiscal year, making also the commercial the same as the calendar year; appropriating, in certain cases, for five quarters, and keeping and publishing all accounts and returns by quarters as well as years; new provisions concerning papers in whale ships and in vessels on the coast of Africa; a declaratory act as to the duties on silks and worsteds; and the further extension of the laws for the relief of insolvent debtors.

Within the present year, the business as to the French indemnity has been closed by distributing the additional interest obtained on the first four instalments. The sixth payment due from the kingdom of Naples has also been received and divided among the claimants.

The annual exhibit of the condition and business of the General Land Office usually accompanies this report; but from its length and importance, it will be presented separately in a few days. The very successful progress made in bringing up the arrears of business, and in the despatch of the enormous amount of current duties devolved on that office by the unprecedented sales in 1835 and 1836, deserves special notice. It has enabled the Commissioner to dispense with the employment of nineteen of his former clerks. Disagreeable and embarrassing as the discontinuance of official services usually is, a strong sense of its propriety in an economical view has led to the measure on this occasion without any special direction by Congress. It is also again urged as a proper topic for legislation, and without which it cannot be effected, that the number and consequently the expense of the old land offices be reduced, by uniting several with others adjoining, where the quantity of business has become much lessened. A similar course as to some of the collection districts on the seaboard has before been recommended, and is still considered worthy the attention of Congress. In all these, as well as in larger savings, economy is undoubtedly true wisdom.

Respectfully,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon R. M. JOHNSON,
Vice President of the United States,
And President of the Senate.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
November 30, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you the following report upon the several branches of the public service confided to my charge.

The army, as will be seen by the accompanying report of the Commanding General, has been kept on active duty during the past year. In Florida, on the western, northern, and maritime frontiers, the troops have been constantly and usefully employed. The experience of the last summer has confirmed the opinion, always entertained by the Department, that great and decided advantages may accrue to the service from keeping the troops together in as large masses as the circumstances of the country will permit. The camp of instruction at Trenton, and the concentration of the regiments of some few of the posts on the northern frontier, were attended with most salutary effects, and it affords me the highest gratification to be able to bear testimony to the exertions of the superior officers, and to the zeal and industry evinced by those of every grade in their camp and garrison duties, and in drilling and instructing their men. On this occasion, as well as in the field, the deficiency of company officers was apparent, and the injury to the service from taking so many staff officers from the line was sensibly felt. Indeed, it is manifest that the army cannot be efficient under its present organization, and that the staff ought to be separated from the line. Some further legislative enactments are required to prevent improper recruits being received into the military service, and to punish persons who knowingly and wilfully swear falsely when taking the oath required by regulations to be administered to them. Minors not unfrequently impose themselves upon the recruiting officer, by swearing that they are of age, or by producing false certificates of the consent of their parents and guardians to their enlistment, and after receiving their clothing, and otherwise putting the Government to expense, claim to be released on the plea of being under age. The commission of this crime is of so frequent occurrence as to call for a remedy. It is perjury, and ought to be so regarded and punished. Experience at some of the recruiting stations where boys have been taken into the service, with the consent of parents and guardians, as drummers and musicians, convinces me that a plan similar to that so advantageously carried into effect in the navy, might be adopted with great advantage in the army; and I recommend an extension of the law of March 2, 1837, providing for the enlistment of boys for the naval service, to embrace the army and ordnance.

The works directed by Congress to be constructed on the northern frontier, have been commenced and are in progress. It is to be regretted that, owing to some misunderstanding, the appropriation asked for to enable the Department to fortify the outlet of Lake Champlain, was struck out of the bill for the defence of the country. This work is deemed of essential importance, as likewise one at or near old Fort Covington, and barracks at Black Rock, and in the neighborhood of Detroit. Hopes are entertained that Congress will not again withhold the necessary appropriations to enable the Department to commence these works, and to complete those already begun with as little delay as practicable. The disturbed state of the Canada frontier, and the absolute necessity which exists to keep upon that line as large a force as can be spared from other points, will require the erection of permanent and comfortable barracks. One of the principal causes of desertion is to be found in the crowded and uncomfortable condition of the soldiers. I speak from my own knowledge, when I say that our soldiers are better paid, fed, and clothed, than any troops in Europe; but an equal regard to truth forces me to acknowledge that they are worse lodged. Indeed, I feel compelled to state that the comfort of the soldiers, in this respect, has been totally neglected. It is essential to their health, their morals, and their discipline, that good barracks should be constructed wherever the troops are to be permanently quartered, and that they should be decently furnished and supplied.

The causes which call for the speedy completion of the chain of posts upon the western frontier have been so often stated, that it appears unnecessary to repeat them here. But it is proper for me to add, that these dangers have become more imminent from the presence there of the Seminoles and Cherokees, who lately emigrated under circumstances not calculated to render them friendly to the whites. The turbulent and ambitious character of some of these chiefs, and the cold blooded and cruel murders, committed by their orders, upon their unoffending countrymen, whose only crimes were their friendship for the whites, their love of peace, and their devotion to the best interests of their nation, may lead to fatal consequences, in spite of the prudence and forbearance of the public authorities. In virtue of the stipulations of the treaty, and in pursuance of our duty as guardians of the red men, and of our obligations to see the laws of the country duly executed, (for one of these chiefs was murdered with circumstances of savage barbarity within the boundaries of the State of Arkansas,) orders have been issued to demand the murderers, and to take measures to extend the protecting arm of Government over the unfortunate men who signed the treaty of New Echota, and who are proscribed and outlawed by the willing instruments of the vengeance or ambitious projects of John Ross and other chiefs of the nation. It is, therefore, of the last importance that the fortresses on that frontier should be completed and the force strengthened.

The solicitude felt by you at the close of the last session of Congress on the subject of the defences of the country on our maritime frontier, led to a still closer examination into their condition. They were found, as had been before stated, unfinished, unarmed, and totally inadequate to protect the harbors they are intended to guard from the attacks of a comparatively small force. This conviction, forced upon my mind by the reports of the chief engineer, has since been confirmed by personal inspection in every instance, where it has been in my power to visit the works. Our principal cities on the seaboard are at this time exposed to be laid under contribution, and our navy yards to be destroyed, without the possibility of defending them. When the works, now in progress in Boston harbor, are finished, that place will be perfectly secure; and a small addition to those at Newport will deprive an enemy of that fine roadstead; but Portsmouth is entirely defenceless—Pensacola exposed, and the important city and harbor of New York are still very ineffectively protected, and will remain so even after all the works now in progress shall be completed and armed. It is obvious that the entrance of that harbor at the narrows cannot be defended by the works on Long Island alone; but that the opposite shore, on Staten Island, must likewise be fortified. The State of New York, in whose possession the land still remains, has erected some works there which are so entirely inefficient, that their existence in their present condition is calculated to deceive the ignorant, who might attempt their defence, and even afford facilities to an invading force in its efforts to enter the harbor. Philadelphia, Baltimore, Charleston, Savannah, and the ports in the gulf, all require further protection to render them safe from attack. In a report, preparing in reply to a resolution of the Senate, calling for information on this subject, I shall enter into all the details connected with it; but I cannot refrain from remarking here that a due regard for the security and honor of the country, requires that an effort should be made with as little delay as possible to place our exposed frontiers in a perfect state of defence. Intimately connected with this subject is the organization of volunteer corps in the immediate vicinity of the forts. The policy and even necessity of this measure have been stated in my preceding reports, and are almost too obvious to need repetition. Even under the former very defective system of keeping the regular forces in garrison within the forts along our whole line of frontier, they are insufficient for their defence. But if the army of the United States is to be rendered efficient and its discipline preserved, it must be kept together in masses, and the garrison duty be performed by small detachments, aided in case of need, by the neighboring militia. Accompanying this report is a minute detail of the number of troops required to man the forts upon the maritime and inland frontiers. These must be drawn chiefly from the people, and to be effective in war, they must be drilled and taught their military duties in time of peace. A plan for this purpose was submitted to Congress in 1837, and again recommended the following year; but not acted upon. Having understood that the chief objection to its adoption consists in its being limited to a comparatively small body of men, and that it was the desire of Congress, as well as of the nation, that a plan for the organization of the militia of the United States should emanate from this Department, I have thought it my duty to make the attempt, and although I entered upon the task with reluctance and great diffidence, I feel confident that the project herewith submitted is practicable, and that while it will diminish the burden of personal service now exacted from the citizen, it will ensure the prompt and efficient application of the national force to the national defence.

It is proposed to divide the United States into eight military districts, and to organize the militia in each district, so as to have a body of twelve thousand five hundred men in active service; and another of equal number as a reserve. This would give an armed militia force of two hundred thousand men, so drilled and stationed, as to be ready to take their places in the ranks in defence of the country, whenever called upon to oppose the enemy or repel the invader. The age of the recruit to be from twenty to thirty-seven. The whole term of service to be eight years; four years in the first class, and four in the reserve. One fourth part, twenty-five thousand men, to leave the service every year, passing, at the conclusion of the first term, into the reserve, and exempted from ordinary militia duty altogether, at the end of the second. In this manner, twenty-five thousand men will be discharged from militia duty every year, and twenty-five thousand fresh recruits be received into the service. It will be sufficient for all useful purposes, that the remainder of the militia, under certain regulations provided for their government, be enrolled and be mustered at long and stated intervals; for in due process of time, nearly the whole mass of the militia will pass through the first and second classes, and be either members of the active corps, or of the reserve, or counted among the exempts, who will be liable to be called upon only in periods of invasion or imminent peril. The manner of enrolment, the number of days of service, and the rate of compensation, ought to be fixed by law; but the details had better be left subject to regulation; a plan of which I am prepared to submit to you.

Congress having expressed a desire that an attempt should be made to terminate the war in Florida by pacific measures, and appropriated a sum of money for that purpose, the Department, early in the spring, despatched Major General Macomb to open a communication with the Indians, and, if possible, to treat with them. He succeeded with difficulty in obtaining an interview with some of the chiefs and head men, and made an arrangement which it was hoped might put a stop to this long protracted war. Its only result, however, has been the loss of many valuable lives. Our people fell a sacrifice to their confidence in the good faith and promises of the Indians, and were entrapped and murdered with all the circumstances of cruelty and treachery which distinguish Indian warfare Composed, as the Florida Indians are, of the remnants of tribes that have taken refuge there and acknowledging no common head, no treaty stipulations that are not sanctioned by each and every tribe can be regarded as binding; nor can the Government consider the country pacified until there has been a general submission of all the chiefs of the various tribes of Indians inhabiting the peninsula. The experience of the last summer brings with it the painful conviction that the war must be prosecuted until Florida is freed from these ruthless savages Their late treacherous and cruel conduct is too generally known to require a repetition of the revolting recital. It has been such as is calculated to deprive them of the sympathy of the humane, and to convince the most peaceable of the necessity of subduing them by force. With this view the regular forces have been augmented in Florida as much as the circumstances of the country will permit, and orders have been given to change, for the present, the theatre of operations. The frequent murders committed in West and Middle Florida, show that there are still small bands of Indians lurking there, and it is the determination of the Department, in the first place, to drive them from that portion of the territory and free the settlements from further molestation. In the mean time, the posts on the Atlantic and the Gulf will be maintained, in order to protect the passing trade, in which effort it is expected the navy will co-operate. For this purpose, the vessels hitherto employed on the coast have been transferred to that Department.

Until the operations of the campaign were interrupted in the attempt to negotiate with the Indians, they were conducted with vigor and ability under that zealous and indefatigable officer, Brigadier General Taylor, who accomplished all that could be expected with the very limited means at his command, spread out as they were over so extensive a field of operations. Throughout the whole of this disastrous war the officers and men engaged in it have endured fatigue and privations, sickness and suffering, without a murmur or complaint, and have, on all occasions, exhibited the qualities of brave and good soldiers. With untiring perseverance they have opened roads through the swamps in pursuit of the enemy, and whenever they could bring him to battle, displayed the utmost coolness and intrepidity; in every instance driving him from his fastnesses. But all these exertions and sacrifices have proved unavailing. Heretofore the Indian population of our States and Territories has been expelled by the gradual increase and advances of a superior race. Whereas, in Florida the attempt has been made, for the first time, to drive the aborigines from the unsettled wilderness, or, what is still more difficult, to catch them for the purpose of transporting them beyond its limits. If the Indians of Florida had a country to retire to they would have been driven out of the Territory long ago; but they are hemmed in by the sea, and must defend themselves to the uttermost, or surrender to be transported beyond it. To reduce them to that extremity, spread, as they are, over a space of at least forty-five thousand square miles of country, abounding in provisions suited to their habits, defended by a climate, benign to them, but deadly to the whites, and presenting difficulties to the march of armies, that have been often described and cannot be exaggerated, will require great exertions, and probably, other means than those hitherto tried.

The passage of the bill introduced in the Senate during the last session, and partially acted upon in Congress, for the military occupation of Florida, would, it is believed, be attended with beneficial effects; and I further recommend that authority be given to the Executive to raise one thousand men to serve during the war in Florida, who shall receive the pay of dragoons, and, upon its termination, a bounty in land. These men it is proposed to arm and equip and drill in a manner to render them equal to the Indian warrior in vigor and endurance, and to employ them in active operations during the ensuing winter. The exigences of the service at this particular juncture compel me to ask this additional force. It will be seen that the state of the western frontier requires the forces there to be increased rather than diminished, and the condition of the Canada frontier will not allow the withdrawal of the troops at present stationed there It was believed that the citizens of the United States upon that border had been convinced of the impropriety of interfering in the concerns of their neighbors, and of the criminality of violating the laws of the country; and notwithstanding the alarming information communicated through the Department of State of the existence there of new combinations and conspiracies against law and order, hopes are entertained that no real danger exists of any further outrages being perpetrated by our fellow-citizens on that frontier. If, contrary to our just expectations, those persons who have sought refuge within the territories of the United States should themselves commit any acts of violence upon the persons or property of her Majesty's subjects in Canada, or persuade others to do so, and renew the disgraceful scenes enacted upon that frontier during the last season, it may become necessary that the wisdom of Congress should devise some means of effectually restraining them from further violating the laws of the country which has afforded them an asylum.

Having twice brought to your notice the importance of establishing a national foundry, I feel some reluctance to speak of it a third time; but the necessity of our possessing an efficient train of field artillery, and an ample armament for the fortifications, is so urgent, that this defect in our system is constantly forced upon my notice. In a country situated like ours, and governed by a policy which seeks the greatest good to the greatest numbers, warlike preparations ought to be chiefly, if not altogether, defensive, and a numerous and well appointed artillery, combined with the skill and character of our light troops, together with the extent of our means to compel an enemy to keep together in masses, will constitute the most effective elements of defence throughout every portion of the United States. In attaining this end, which has been kept steadily in view for the last two years, the Department has encountered great obstacles from the want of a national establishment where experiments can be made and perfect models constructed. The small arms manufactured, or rather those which will be made henceforth in this country at the private as well as national armories, will challenge a comparison with any in the world. This desirable end has been brought about by improvements begun and perfected in the national armories; and, by requiring the same improvements in their machinery, equally good arms will be obtained from the private contractors. But we have no means of pursuing the same method in founding cannon, and the result has been an uncertainty in their manufacture, which may be attended at some future period with the most fatal consequences. There would likewise be very great economy in having a national manufactory of gunpowder, and at all events an appropriation ought to be made at the present session to enable the Department to lay in a stock of materials of the manufacture of this necessary article. In answer to its inquiries on this subject, the Department learned, with great anxiety, that there was not a sufficient supply of saltpetre or sulphur in the country, at the close of the last session of Congress, for three months' supply of our armies in case of war. This deficiency has been partially remedied; but the War Department ought to be authorized to keep on hand at least a twelve months' supply of these necessary articles, which may be stored for any length of time without risk of destruction or deterioration.

While speaking of the wants of the ordnance, it affords me great pleasure to be able to state that there has been lately an improvement in the organization of that branch of the service, combining economy with greater efficiency, and that the board of ordnance officers which I was authorized to employ last year, has been assiduously engaged and has made great progress in reducing to a system the mode of fabricating all kinds of ordnance stores and in fixing their patterns, forms, and dimensions. The construction of war rockets has been commenced, and experiments are in progress to test their effects; while those which have been tried in firing hollow shot from howizers of the largest calibre, have been entirely satisfactory. The new buildings authorized by Congress for arsenals, magazines, and depots of arms, are in progress of construction, and the works generally have been pressed on as far as the funds would permit.

At the risk of being importunate, I must again urge the expediency of selling the mineral lands. Experience has confirmed the views formerly presented on this subject, and proves conclusively that no benefit whatever results to the United States from the present system of leasing them while the advancement of that portion of the country is sensibly retarded, and the product of the mining operations much diminished by it.

The duties of the Quartermaster's department have been performed with an ability, integrity, and promptitude, which reflect the highest credit on all its officers, and their accounts have been rendered with commendable despatch and accuracy. Its present organization is sufficient to enable it to discharge all the duties which may devolve upon it in peace or war; and while it has contributed essentially to the efficiency of the service, it has introduced great economy in the administrative branches of the army.

The works under the direction of the Quartermaster General, have been carried on as rapidly as circumstances would permit. The southern section of the great western road, extending from the Red river to the Arkansas, (one hundred and forty miles,) has been completed. The middle section, extending from Fort Leavenworth to Marias de Cyzne, seventy-two miles, has also been finished, and measures have been taken to continue the work to Spring river, eighty-six miles further. One hundred and twenty-eight miles will then remain of the route to Arkansas, which will be worked upon the next season. The survey of the route from Fort Leavenworth to Fort Snelling has been completed; but as the country presents an open prairie, that may be traversed in all directions without difficulty, I shall not do more than mark out the most direct route, unless otherwise instructed by Congress.

The difficulty of obtaining laborers at Fort Smith has retarded the progress of that work. The defences projected on the Illinois river, west of the boundary of Arkansas, have been commenced by a detachment of dragoons under Lieutenant Colonel Mason, and will be prosecuted vigorously the next season.

I beg once more to call your attention to the subject of paymasters, and to repeat my recommendation that two of the present paymasters should be appointed assistant paymasters general, with the pay and emoluments of lieutenant colonels, who, in addition to their present duties, should have the superintendence of such officers of this branch of the service as serve with armies in the field; and, further, to renew my application in favor of allowing paymasters, employed in paying volunteers and militia, in active service, a small per centage, to cover unavoidable losses and disallowances in the settlement of their accounts.

It will be seen by the report of the Surgeon General, that the medical staff of the army has been actively and steadily employed during the past season. The officers of that important branch of the service deserve great credit for the manner in which they have discharged their laborious and responsible duties. The disposition they manifest to avail themselves of every opportunity to collect facts which may afford useful contributions to science, is justly appreciated by the Department, and will be encouraged. The extensive disbursements of the medical officers render it necessary that the bureau here should be able to exact the strictest accountability from them, and to examine and revise the accounts, so as to close them monthly, if possible. Owing to the want of proper assistance, they had been suffered to fall into arrears, and have only been brought up by keeping in the bureau an officer of the corps from important duties in the field. I recommend, therefore, that the office here be allowed an additional clerk.

The extensive system of river and harbor improvements, involving, as it does, a very large expenditure of public money, requires revision, both in regard to the principle upon which such improvements ought to be authorized, and the manner in which they ought to be conducted. It is apparent that too many of these works have been authorized without that detailed examination which is necessary to determine either their extent or general usefulness, and commenced without inquiring whether the advantages to result from their completion are commensurate to the cost of their construction. Many of the artificial harbors, therefore, are altogether too small for the trade they are intended to shelter. Some of them are misplaced, while others, again, have been commenced with so little judgment, that it would prove a cheaper process to move the town to a convenient position, than to remove the obstacles which obstruct the channel of the river that leads up to it; and yet large sums of money have been expended in the latter attempt. The already important and daily increasing trade of the great lakes and estuaries which encompass and indent the United States, demands the fostering care of the Government; but in order that its interference may be effectually and constitutionally exerted, it ought to be confined to such works as are of general utility, and not extended into every creek or inlet where a favored village may require easier access for a market boat. This abuse, which is calculated to bring the whole system into deserved disrepute, can only be remedied by directing a previous examination to be made by this Department into the nature of the proposed work, and a full report on the proper method of obtaining the object contemplated, setting forth the public, not partial, advantages likely to result from it, as well as the probable cost of its completion.

I beg leave, through you, to offer my objections to the restrictions sometimes imposed by Congress on the manner of conducting works of internal improvement. The appropriation is frequently accompanied by directions to expend the money according to a given plan. Now, it not unfrequently happens, that when the plan to which the Department is confined, comes to be well examined, it is found to be inapplicable, and, heretofore, large sums have been thrown away in attempts to carry them out, because the engineers did not think themselves authorized to alter or amend them in any particular. On the coast and on navigable waters, gales of wind or floods may affect, so materially, the structure of the place to be worked upon, as to require a total change of plan; or improvements may be discovered or suggested, which never occurred to the original projector, and which may require an entire alteration in the mode of conducting the work, in order to secure efficiency and economy in its execution. The light-house projected on the Brandywine shoal, is an example of the pernicious effects of this restriction. To execute this work, according to the plan adopted by Congress, will require so much more than the sum appropriated, that it has been deemed prudent not to begin the work at all until the whole estimated cost is placed at the disposition of the Department; the situation of the site rendering it very hazardous to leave a half finished work exposed to the fury of the winds and waves. Whereas, it is possible, if the Department were left at liberty to act, that the object might be attained at much less expense.

The report of the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, containing a more than usually detailed statement of the history and progress of the works under the immediate superintendence of that officer, will be presented in a few days; together with detailed estimates of the probable cost of each work, and of the sums required from year to year; the same course will be pursued with respect to the improvements and civil works under the superintendence of the Chief Engineer, so as to present to Congress, at one view, the whole subject of internal improvement. The plan of direct and general inspection and supervision, by superior officers of topographical engineers, lately adopted, seems calculated to ensure the faithful execution of the works under their charge. Many officers of this corps, have been actively employed during the past summer, in the discharge of their military duties, rendering services which justify the expectations entertained by the Department, when it was incorporated into the service. Some few works of internal improvement remain under the superintendence of the Chief Engineer, and an account of their progress will be found in the annexed report of that officer. It is highly gratifying to me, to be able to speak from my own personal observation, of the activity, order, and good management which reign throughout the works, both military and civil, which are conducted by the officers of this corps.

The present condition of the Military Academy at West Point, is very satisfactory. The importance of this institution to the character of the army, is fully understood by the Department, and its interest will be watched over with vigilance and care.

I cannot refrain from again calling your attention to the condition of the barracks at this post. The objections urged to the miserable accommodations of the soldiers, apply to the quarters provided for the cadets. A proper regard for the health, morals, and discipline of the corps, requires that a more spacious and commodious building should be erected there. I recommend to your favorable consideration, the suggestions of the Chief Engineer, in relation to the practical instruction of the cadets in field engineering, and the creation of a body of sappers and miners. No army can be considered complete, and in a condition to take the field, without a corps of well instructed engineer soldiers; which, to be effective, must be taught their important duties in time of peace. The services of such men will be highly useful and economical at all times, not only as aids to the instruction of the cadets, but in the preservation of the fortifications, when they are, as at present, stripped of their garrisons by the exigencies of the service.

Finding some deficiencies in the dragoon service, as to its regulations and details, with your permission, three young officers of the first regiment have been sent to the cavalry school at Saumur, to be followed the next year by an equal number from the second regiment. Every facility has been afforded by the French Government to carry out this arrangement.

Recent examinations of the proceedings of courts martial have convinced me of the necessity of some further legal provisions and fixed rules to render them efficient, as well as fair and impartial tribunals. Justice to the public and to the army requires that this should be done with as little delay as possible. From the want of power to compel the attendance of citizens as witnesses, of a proper guide, and a well instructed judge advocate to aid the officers composing the courts, their decisions are uncertain, frequently loose and contradictory, and too often conflict with those of preceding courts. I beg leave, therefore, respectfully to recommend that a written system for the direction of courts martial be prepared, which may be framed so as to be made applicable to the land and sea service, and that a judge advocate be appointed.

From the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, it appears that the number of invalid pensions has not diminished, but increased, during the last six years. In November, 1833, the number of invalid pensioners was 3,875. It now amounts to 4,236. This increase is to be attributed, in a great measure, to the hardships and dangers to which the troops, both of the army and militia, have been exposed during the campaigns in Florida. The number of pensioners inscribed on the rolls under the act of March 18th, 1818, for Revolutionary services, has gradually decreased from about 20,000 to 8,215. Under the act of June 7th, 1832, the number of applicants amounts to 34,918. Of this number, 31,668 have been pensioned. The lists of pensioners under this law have been reduced to 24,086. The number of persons who have applied for the benefits of the law of May 15th, 1828, which was intended solely for the relief of certain officers and soldiers of the continental army who served to the end of the war, amounts to 2,156. Those who were pensioned amounted to 1,186, of which 624 are yet on the roll. The number of widows' claims, exhibited under the act of July 4th, 1836, is 4,771, of which 3,094 have been admitted; and of this number who were pensioned, only 2,512 are now on the rolls, and supposed to be living. Under the law granting five years' pay to the widows of Revolutionary officers, soldiers, seamen, and marines, who were married prior to 1794, the number of claims amounted to 6,267, and 4,456 of that number have received the benefits of the law. During the last year few claims have been admitted under the act of July 5th, 1832, entitled "An act to provide for liquidating and paying certain claims of the State of Virginia;" a considerable number, however, yet remains unsettled. The sums paid during the past year, under that law, amount to $8,910 22. The whole amount expended the last year, under the several pension laws, is $3,090,664 69.

Great inconvenience is experienced from being obliged to intrust the payment of pensioners to corporations and individuals, who receive no compensation for transacting the business. The only inducement of the agents to continue in office, is the hope that Congress will pass a law allowing them some compensation. Should Congress, however, think proper to adopt the plan recommended by you for the safe keeping of the public money, the establishments for that purpose might be charged with the payment of pensions without any further cost to Government.

The period fixed by law for the duration of the office of Commissioner of Pensions expires in March, 1840, and I respectfully recommend that it be continued for such term of time as shall be deemed most expedient by Congress.

I cannot avoid again adverting to the very serious inconvenience inflicted upon the poorer class of pensioners, by the law of the 6th of April, 1838, which fixes the period of eight months for the return to the Treasury of unclaimed pension funds. The present operation of the law is unnecessarily burdensome to the officers charged with its execution at Washington, and very harassing to the pensioners, who frequently, after taking long journeys in the hope of receiving the sum awarded to them by Government, return to their homes disappointed and destitute.

The beneficent intentions of Government, in appropriating large sums for the education and civilization of the Indians, have, from some cause or other, been frustrated, or at best, but partially realized. If we expect to extend among these people the blessings of knowledge, civilization, and Christianity, we must establish schools within their own country; and begin by teaching their children what will be practically useful to them in after life. Having herefore dwelt fully on this topic, I shall con ent myself with referring you to the full and practical view taken of it by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his report, and recommending the early adoption of the plan proposed by him for the education of the Indian youth of both sexes.

I abstained from carrying into full effect the treaty with the Winnebago Indians this year, because I was willing to give them time to deliberate on the expediency of at once removing to the country southwest of the Missouri; a measure which, while it would be advantages to the Government, would prove highly beneficial to the Indians. From causes already stated, the neutral ground, to which they are to be removed, unless they consent to cross the Missouri river, cannot be regarded as their permanent place of residence. It is now the hunting and battle ground of two warlike nations, the Sioux and Sacs and Foxes, to whose incursions, if not active hostilities, they will be exposed; and it is enclosed within the limits of a great territory, destined, at no distant period, to become a State, from which the General Government will be expected, by friendly negotiations, to remove the Indian population. Their existence in the country they now inhabit is attended with such serious and increasing inconvenience to the white population, which encircles and hems them in on every side, that their removal will not be delayed beyond the ensuing spring. If the efforts to obtain their consent to establish their permanent residence southwest of the Missouri should unfortunately fail, they will be required to take up their line of march for the neutral ground early in the spring.

I approve and recommend to your favorable consideration the plan suggested by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the future disbursement of Indian funds. From my experience of the management of the pay department of the army, and from the similarity of the duties these officers now perform with those proposed to be imposed upon them, no doubt rests upon my mind that the scheme unites, in a high degree, economy, security, and efficiency.

As the period is fast approaching when the States will be altogether relieved from their Indian population, which presented so serious an obstacle to their advancement, and the Indians themselves be removed to a permanent and peaceful home, far from the causes which led to their degradation and were rapidly producing their ruin and extermination, it becomes a subject of grave consideration and deep anxiety to determine on the most eligible and practical mode of providing for their government. Many projects for the better government and civilization of the Indians have been presented to Congress, and one of them partially acted upon. The refusal of some of the tribes to assent to its provisions occasioned its failure, which is scarcely to be regretted. A confederation of dissimilar tribes, a majority of them utterly barbarous, might have been dangerous, and certainly would have been productive of much confusion. The experience, however, of the last summer, convinces me that something must speedily be done to prevent the Indians assembled west of the Mississippi from destroying each other. We have lately seen a council, composed of the most civilized portion of a tribe, whose long residence among the whites had, it was hoped, taught them the elements of self-government and the first principles of religion and justice, assembled together to license the most atrocious crimes, and sending forth from its bosom a gang of desperadoes to murder their peaceable and unoffending brethren; an order which was executed with circumstances of savage barbarity. The motive for this cruel deed was to inflict vengeance upon those who signed the treaty of New Echota in 1835. A new decree has since gone forth, outlawing others who have, in like manner, offended the party in power, and they are condemned to be hunted down and destroyed like wild beasts. Treaty stipulations call for the interference of the Government in all such cases; but some permanent provision is required to prevent a recurrence of similar excesses. Tribunals in the country for the prompt trial and punishment of crimes would, perhaps, prove the most efficient method of restraining these people from treacherously murdering each other. The fear of retribution might prevent a tyrant chieftain from sending forth assassins to wreak his vengeance upon those who refuse to humble themselves before him, and the certainty of punishment deter them from executing such orders. Such tribunals would contribute most essentially to ameliorate the condition and to civilize the Indians by preventing unprincipled men from introducing among them spiritous liquors and gambling tables, and otherwise seeking to take advantage of vices they themselves have fomented.

The exploring party to which I alluded in my last year's report, has, during the last summer, visited and examined with care the great valley of the river Jagues, and that of the Mayennes, which discharges its waters into the Red river of the north, as likewise the rich and fertile table land which separates these two valleys. Their researches extend to Devil's lake, situate between the 48th and 49th degrees of north latitude, which was found to be between forty and forty-five miles long, and, in places, half that width; its shores well wooded, and its waters, which are as salt as those of the ocean and abound in fish, interspersed with numerous islands, likewise covered with wood. These physical characters are common to several other smaller lakes that are found in this region of country, where salt is so abundant that in many places it effloresces on the surface of the earth. From Devil's lake the party proceeded east to the great valley of the North Red river, making a reconnoissance of the streams which fall into it on the western side. This, with the northern slope of the great prairie, is represented to be a country of surpassing fertility and beauty. The slope rises to a fine table land, about nineteen hundred feet above the level of the sea, and is watered by frequent streams abounding in fish, that, after swelling two small lakes, form at their confluence the river St. Peers. The soil of this table land is very rich, and will support a numerous population, that would enjoy the advantages of inhabiting one of the most beautiful and healthy regions of the far northwest.

When the calculations of the observations made this summer shall be worked out, the Department will possess all the materials necessary to enable it to construct a physical and topographical map of this portion of our country, which, added to that already in our possession, from the same hand, of the sources of the Mississippi and North Red river, will present, at one view, the vast region of country comprehended between the 87th and 100th degree of longitude, and 40th and 49th degree of north latitude. It is believed that these explorations, cautiously and slowly conducted, will prove much more useful in their results, both as regards the geography and natural history of that portion of our country, than the great expeditions which have preceded them, and which could not devote the time necessary to acquire the accurate information now sought for. They have been carried on steadily for the last three years; and it is believed that an equal term of time will be required to complete them, by extending our researches over the Rocky mountains to the shores of the Pacific ocean. Hopes are entertained that Congress will continue to view this enterprise favorably, and enable the Department, by an early appropriation, to despatch the exploring party in due season.

I have asked for an appropriation for surveys connected with the military defences of the country. One object of this request is to enable the Department to commence hydrographical surveys of the lakes. The great and increasing commerce of these inland seas demands the attention of Government. There exists no correct chart of them. Navigators are constantly exposed to encounter unknown dangers, and the annual loss of life and property is very great. This important work ought not to be longer delayed.

J. R. POINSETT.

REPORT FROM

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
November 30, 1839.

SIR: In the performance of a duty annually devolving on this Department, I have the honor to submit the following report:

The squadron now employed in the Mediterranean comprises the Ohio ship of the line, the frigate Brandywine, and the sloop of war Cyane—the whole commanded by Commodore Isaac Hull. No interruption to our commerce has occurred in that sea since my last report; and by the answers of the respective consuls of the United States, resident at the principal ports, to the queries or our commanders, copies of which have been received at the Department, it appears that no obstacle is thrown in its way by the authorities of any nation on its borders.

At the date of my last annual report, the force in the Pacific, under Commodore Ballard, consisted of a ship of the line, two sloops of war, and two schooners. The ship of the line and one of the schooners have returned to the United States; the other schooner is now on her way; the two sloops of war have been ordered home, the period of their cruise having expired, and may be expected early in the spring.

To supply the place of the force thus withdrawn, a frigate of the first class, under Commodore Claxton, who succeeds Commodore Ballard, sailed from New York in May last, with instructions to land our Minister, Mr. Ellis, at Vera Cruz, and thence proceed with all diligence to her destination. She has been followed by a sloop of war and a schooner, and the squadron now consists of a frigate, a sloop of war, and a schooner, all of which, it is presumed, are now on the station. By the latest accounts, affairs in that quarter continued in a state of great confusion and uncertainty. Revolutions of rulers rather than principles still agitate these regions so favored by nature, and the commerce of neutrals continues to require the protection of a competent naval force.

Commodore Claxton has been directed to employ one of his vessels in cruising within the gulf of California, and along the northwest coast of America; and, if circumstances will permit, to despatch another to visit the Sandwich and Friendly islands, with a view to afford countenance and protection to vessels of the United States employed in the whale fisheries.

The squadron on the Brazilian station, under Commodore Nicolson, comprises a razee and a sloop of war; the brig Dolphin having been ordered home for repairs, and to convey to the United States the seamen whose term of service had expired, or was about to expire. The frigate United States, under Commodore Ridgely, appointed to succeed Commodore Nicolson, is fitting out for the purpose, of relieving that officer, and is now on the eve of sailing.

The sloop Marion has preceded the United States, and the brig Enterprise is also destined for that station. The squadron will consist of a frigate, a sloop of war, and a brig, and will be increased as occasion requires.

Internal dissensions still agitate the states bordering on the river La Plata, apparently with increasing violence; the novel system of a war of blockade, so vexatious to neutral commerce, continues to be prosecuted by France, and the necessity for a naval force in that quarter is increased rather than diminished.

The squadron operating in the gulf of Mexico and the West Indies, was reinforced by two sloops of war, and the whole placed under Commodore Wm. B. Shubrick, appointed to succeed Commodore Dallas, who retired from the command. The misunderstanding at that time existing between Mexico and France having since been adjusted, and the latter having relinquished the blockade of the ports of the former, two sloops of war and a schooner, which were ordered to the north for repairs, have not been replaced by others.

The schooner, after undergoing the necessary repairs, was employed on special service. She has since returned, and is now destined for a cruise on the coast of Africa.

Subsequently to the withdrawal of these vessels from the West India station, a third sloop of war, requiring extensive repairs, was ordered to the North, and has arrived at Norfolk. The squadron now comprises a frigate and four sloops of war, which may be increased should circumstances indicate the propriety of such a measure.

The force employed in the Indian and China seas consists of the frigate Columbia, and corvette John Adams, under Commodore Read, who arrived at Macao the 28th of April last, and continued there, by the last accounts, at the earnest solicitations of the American consul and citizens resident at Canton, who considered themselves in a somewhat critical position, in consequence of the decisive measures taken by the Chinese Government for the suppression of the illicit trade in opium carried on by English residents at that place. These apprehensions were, however, subsiding, and it is presumed that Commodore Read has long since proceeded in fulfilling his general instructions.

While at Columbo, having received information that a daring act of piracy, accompanied by the murder of two American citizens, had been recently committed by the inhabitants of Muckie, in the island of Sumatra, Commodore Read, acting under his general instructions, promptly proceeded to the scene of outrage. Here having vainly sought redress by the restoration of the plundered property and the surrenderer of the murderers, he inflicted a severe and merited chastisement on the barbarians.

The South Sea Exploring Expedition left the island of Madeira on the 28th of September, 1838, and arrived at Rio Janeiro on the 23d of November following. After replenishing his stores, and refreshing his crews, Lieutenant Wilkes then proceeded, in the execution of his instructions, to survey the mouth of Rio Negro and its neighboring coasts. Thence he proceeded to Terra del Fuego, where, leaving a portion of the squadron and scientific corps to prosecute their researches, he stretched into the Southern ocean, between the 105 degree of west longitude on the western coast of Palmer's land; returning, he joined the vessels left at Terra del Fuego, and arrived at Valparaiso on the 15th of May, 1839. During the passage, the squadron separated in a severe gale, and did not join company till the 25th of March.

A portion of the squadron penetrated to the 70th degree of South latitude, where it encountered vast masses of ice, and narrowly escaped being frozen up. Lieutenant Wilkes became satisfied that, owing to the lateness of the season, it was impossible to make any further progress, and the undertaking was relinquished with the intention of resuming it at a more favorable time of the year.

The expedition, with the exception of the Sea Gull, which separated in a gale, arrived at Valparaiso on the 15th of May last; left that port for Callao the 6th of June, and sailed thence for the Sandwich islands, since which time no despatches have been received from the commanding officer.

Thus far the expedition has not been without benefit to commerce, having ascertained beyond all reasonable doubt, that various shoals and obstructions laid down in charts have no existence.

The officers, whether employed in professional duties or scientific pursuits, are stated by Lieutenant Wilkes to be ardent and indefatigable in their exertions; and there is reason to believe, that if no new discoveries are made of unknown lands or islands, it will be because none exist in that region of the globe.

The steam frigate Fulton has been employed during the past season under Captain Perry, who is charged with their superintendence, in prosecuting various experiments with Paixhan guns, a circumstantial report of which is daily expected. There is little reason to doubt that the results will be highly interesting and important.

The surveys directed by acts of Congress have been prosecuted to the extent of the means placed at the disposal of the Department. Under the act of the 3d of March, 1837, the United States schooner Experiment, and steamer Engineer, loaned by the War Department, have been employed under the direction of Lieutenant Glynn in surveying the harbors of Beaufort and Wilmington, North Carolina. These surveys have been completed, and will be laid before Congress at the present session.

The United States brig Consort is now fitting out under Lieutenant Glynn for the purpose of completing other surveys, directed by the same act, which were relinquished in consequence of the sickness of his officers. It is confidently anticipated that the whole will be completed and a report made to Congress previous to its adjournment.

In compliance with the provisions of the second section of the act making appropriations for the naval service of the year 1839, two steam frigates have been commenced, one at New York, the other at Philadelphia. The engines and boilers have been contracted for, and are now in progress. These two vessels will be built on the same model, one to be propelled by vertical, the other by engines on an inclined plane of the same power, with a view to test their respective advantages and disadvantages, there being a great diversity of opinion on this question among practical engineers. The third steam frigate authorized by the act aforesaid, has not yet been put on the stocks, it being in contemplation to adopt a model presented by a distinguished officer of the navy to be propelled by a different description of machinery.

By your direction, the schooner Grampus, under Lieutenant Paine, sailed from Norfolk in September last, for the coast of Newfoundland, with instructions to inquire into the nature and causes of the seizure and condemnation of certain American vessels engaged in the fisheries. Lieut. Paine has returned, after performing this duty in a satisfactory manner, and reported the result of his cruise.

The frequent and increasing violations of the laws for the suppression of the slave trade on the coast of Africa, by vessels owned by foreigners, but prostituting the flag of the United States to their nefarious purposes, induced you to direct that two fast sailing vessels, of the smaller class, should be fitted out, for the purpose of arresting these violations of our laws and of the rights of the people of Africa. One will probably have sailed before this report is received, and the other is only waiting the completion of some necessary repairs to follow with all practicable despatch.

Navy pension fund.—The number of invalid pensioners is 456, and the sum annually required to pay them is $38,844 74. The number of widow pensioners is 330, and the annual amount of their pensions is $62,064. The number of minor children pensioners is 115, and the amount of their pensions is $14,314; making an aggregate of 901 pensioners, and $110,122 74.

The amount of stocks to the credit of the Navy pension fund, 1st of Oct. 1839, was	$390,832 25
On the 1st of October, 1839,	251,139 00
Difference - - - -	$137,693 25

Which sum was applied to the payment of pensions granted by acts of Congress, and accounts reported by the Fourth Auditor and Second Comptroller.

About $55,000 will be required to pay pensions, which will become due the 1st of January, 1840, and to meet arrearages as they may be reported.

The whole amount of the fund having heretofore been invested in bank, State, and corporation stocks, which are now greatly depreciated, the sum above stated cannot probably be realized by the sale of less than $80,000 or $90,000 of stocks. In the hope that they may in some degree recover from this state of depression, and unwilling to make so great a sacrifice, I would suggest that the subject be brought to the early attention of Congress.

On the 3d of March, 1837, the capital of the navy pension fund was $1,115,329 53; and previously to the act of Congress of that date "for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund," the annual interest and dividends were sufficient to defray all the expenditures. Under this act the navy pension fund has decreased with increasing celerity, a large portion of the pensions granted in conformity with its provisions involving arrearages commencing many years anterior to its passage.

The pensions to invalids now on the list are for life, and not during the continuance of disability, as was the case before the passage of the act of the 14th of July, 1832; those to widows until they shall marry or die; and those to children until they attain the age of twenty-one years. It is therefore certain that at the end of two years, at farthest, the navy pension fund will be exhausted. Under the existing laws there is not the least prospect of any decrease in the number of pensioners or the amount of their pensions; and, consequently, Congress will be called upon to redeem the pledge contained in the ninth section of the act of 23d April, 1800, to make good any deficiency in the navy pension fund arising out of its own legislation.

The first section of the act of 3d March, 1837, provides that pensions to widows or children shall be paid from the date of the demise of the husbands or fathers. The only condition is, that the demise shall have happened in the naval service. No distinction whatever is made in regard to the cause of manner of death, or the period of service of the deceased; all are placed on the same footing, and all alike partake of the national bounty.

Arrearges of pensions for more than thirty-seven years, in one instance involving the payment of more than $20,000, have been paid under this section, which has mainly caused the rapid diminution of a fund originally constituted for the sole purpose of providing for officers and seamen only, disabled in the naval service.

A claim has been presented on account of an individual who died in 1800, about a month after his entry into the service, and if allowed, a large sum will be required to pay it. But not being certain that this first section was intended to authorize such profuse expenditure of the navy pension fund, I have suspended the payment, and now refer the claim for the decision of Congress.

The second section of the same act provides that "pensions which may have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted to officers, seamen, and marines, in the naval service, disabled by wounds or injuries received in the line of their duty, shall commence from the time when they were disabled." It has been found impossible to discriminate, with any degree of accuracy, in cases occurring at such remote periods, as to the precise time at which the disability commenced, and the date of the wound or injury has necessarily been assumed, as that of the commencement of the pension, although, in many cases, there were strong circumstances indicating that the disability did not occur until long afterward. It may also be remarked that under this section of the act of 3d of March, 1837, in connection with the 8th section of the act of 23d April, 1800, persons wounded, or otherwise injured, thirty or thirty-five years ago, may receive pensions, commencing from the time when the injuries were sustained, although they have remained in the service ever since, in the enjoyment of full pay, and must continue to do so until Congress shall otherwise direct.

Under the liberal construction given to the navy pension laws of the United States, it has been heretofore assumed that full pensions and full pay may be allowed at one and the same time, to the same persons; and sometimes it has not been considered necessary, or even discretionary, in executing these laws, to exclude persons afflicted with diseases and infirmities, to which mankind are subjected in every situation, and under all circumstances of life. It is at all times difficult to discriminate between disabilities occasioned by hereditary or constitutional predisposition to disease, and those that are the direct and immediate consequence of the peculiar exposures incidental to the naval service.

A similar difficulty occurs in cases of disabilities occasioned or aggravated by habits of intemperance and dissipation. Yet all these seem equally comprehended in the various provisions of the pension laws; and no matter what may have been the term of service, whether years, months, or days, all claim a share of the navy pension fund during life, under a liberal construction of the statutes. It is true that these laws declare that the proof must be satisfactory to the head of the Department. Yet, what may satisfy one man, may not operate in like manner on another differently constituted; and hence has arisen much diversity of practice under the administration of different persons.

Accompanying this report is a document exhibiting a statement and analysis of the various public acts of Congress, in relation to navy pensions and the navy pension fund. The multiplication of these laws, and the various constructions placed upon them at different times, seem to indicate the propriety of adopting a less complicated system. I would also take the occasion to state, that whatever disposition may be made of the subject, it has become necessary to relieve the head of the Department from the labor and responsibility of this portion of his duties.

Almost every application for a pension involves the necessity of a close and critical examination of testimony, together with a reference to various laws, and the time required to do this as it ought to be done, materially interferes with other and indispensable avocations.

The act of 3d of March, 1837, on which I have thought it my duty to offer these remarks, has been the principal source of the decline of the navy pension fund. Under its operation, that fund has sunk, in little more than two years, from $1,115,329 53, to $253,139; and, as I have before stated, about $55,000 will be required to meet demands, which will become due on the 1st of January, 1840.

I again take occasion to invite your attention to the appropriation for a dry dock at New York.

The sum of $100,000, assigned in the year 1835 to that object, having, with the exception of a small amount for surveys, been no part of it expended, in consequence of difficulties in the selection of a site, has reverted to the Treasury. I earnestly recommend its reappropriation.

The discovery of a new and more capacious entrance into the harbor by Lieutenant Gedney, which, if ever known, had been long since forgotten, has removed the only plausible objection hitherto urged against the expediency of a measure which appears to be recommended by so many considerations.

The central position of this port, the facilities resulting from its two entrances and outlets, at a great distance from each other, and the ample means the city affords for repairing, manning, and supplying vessels of war, all point it out as a station deserving peculiar attention. As an additional reason, it is proper to state that two ships of the line are now lying at the navy yard in a state of rapid decay, which cannot be repaired without going into dock, and cannot be removed without almost a certainty of total loss. A very few years will place them beyond the reach of recovery, and they must be either broken up, or sink where they now are.

I deem it proper, also, to bring to your notice an abuse of great importance to the interests of the service. Numerous instances occur of the enlistment of minors; and it is obviously impossible to discriminate between those who are, and those who are not, of legal age.

After receiving the advance of pay, and becoming, perhaps, indebted to the purser in addition, they apply to a lawyer or magistrate, procure a habeas corpus, and obtain their release without any legal obligation to pay the debt thus contracted. The instructions to recruiting officers authorize them to cause an oath to be administered in cases of doubt; but it has been decided that its violation does not subject the offender to legal punishment. Cases analagous to these frequently occur in the enlistment of apprentices authorized by act of Congress. They are occasionally presented by persons claiming to be their parents or guardians, and received accordingly. After remaining until they are sufficiently educated, and capable of being useful to their real parents, the latter come forward, prove the whole case a fraud, procure a habeas corpus, and release the apprentice after he has been maintained and educated at the public expense.

I would, therefore, respectfully recommend the passage of a law authorizing recruiting officers to cause an oath to be administered to persons offering for enlistment in cases where their majority is doubted, and, in every case, to parents or guardians presenting boys as apprentices to the navy, the violation of which should be declared a perjury, and subject the offender to legal prosecution and punishment.

Should this system of apprenticeship be carried to the extent of which it is susceptible, I look forward to it as a source of great and lasting benefit to the navy. There is every reasonable prospect of its becoming a nursery for the supply of petty officers, one of the most important constituents in the service, nor can I doubt but that it may be made the means of supplying a large number of capable, intelligent seamen, more strongly attached to their country by the benefits she has conferred on them.

The result, thus far, has been highly encouraging. A spirit of excitement and emulation prevails among these boys; their conduct, with rare exceptions, is correct and exemplary; examples of profligacy and cases of desertion seldom occur; commanders of vessels of war are, without exception, anxious to have at least one tenth of their crews composed of them; and the reports from receiving ships give uniform testimony to their general deportment, their habits of order and industry, and their capacity for the acquisition of those branches of learning, and that practical knowledge of their profession, which fit them for future usefulness.

I have endeavored to call the attention of magistrates, parents, and guardians, to the means afforded by this system, of providing for that large class of unfortunate children which has become so numerous, most especially in our large cities, and which is without the means or the prospect of a comfortable maintenance, or of acquiring even the rudiments of education. If, instead of permitting them to live in idleness, exposed to every temptation, and plunging prematurely into every vice, they were apprenticed to their country, they would receive such an education as benefits their station, and acquire those habits of sobriety, honesty, order, and industry, which would go far to render those who are so apt to become the bane of society, efficient supporters of the honor and interests of their country.

Under the act of Congress which directed a revision and extension of the rules and regulations of the service, approved 19th May, 1832, a board of naval officers was convened by the Department, and their proceedings communicated to Congress. No action, however, was taken by that body, in consequence, and as by the provisions of the law, those regulations were not to be carried into effect until they had received its sanction, they have remained ever since a dead letter, never having been promulgated.

Believing, however, that a revision of the old regulations, with a view to their adaptation to laws subsequently passed, and for the purpose of taking advantage of the results of experience, would conduce to the good of the service, the Department has directed the Board of Navy Commissioners, under the authority of the act by which it was constituted, to attend to that duty. The board is now engaged in its performance, at such intervals of leisure as the multiplicity of its other labors will permit. This revised system will probably be laid before Congress before the expiration of their present session, and it is believed that, with some modification of the law "for the better government of the navy," passed in the year 1800, the whole will form a system, which, if administered with a firm, steady, temperate perseverance, will, so far as its influence extends, sustain the navy of the United States on that eminence which it has attained in the estimation of all nations.

I feel confident, however, that the only sure and effectual means of maintaining the character and discipline of the service, is to keep in commission as many vessels, and employ as many officers in active duties, as is compatible with the resources of the country. This, after all, is the vital principle of professional excellence, and it is on this I rely as the only solid basis for a naval establishment, not formidable from the number of ships in ordinary or on the stocks, but for its experience, its discipline, and habits of hardy endurance. For this reason no diminution of the force in commission has been contemplated in the estimates herewith presented. All the retrenchments will be found in other branches of expenditure, and the current service of the ensuing year has been left untouched and undiminished.

The estimates of the Board of Navy Commissioners, for the naval service of 1840, have been made with every regard to economy deemed compatible with the great interests of the country. Whenever variations occur between the present estimates and the preceding ones, short explanatory notes are appended, giving the reasons for the change.

I take this occasion respectfully to recommend the passage of a law, for bringing under one general head all the special acts which authorize the building or rebuilding of particular vessels, as well as those relating to their repairs. A bill for this purpose was reported during the last session of Congress, and is presumed to have failed to become a law in consequence of inability to reach it in time. I conceive it will be highly advantageous to the service by placing materials for building, repairing, and equipping vessels generally, at the disposal of the Department for all such purposes, at the precise period they are wanted, and before they deteriorate by time and exposure.

Another advantage would be, greatly simplifying accounts at all the naval stations by disbursing officers, and at the Treasury.

These, and other minor results of convenience and economy, in my opinion, all unite in recommending the measure.

Should the further sum of $340,000 be transferred from the appropriation for the gradual improvement of the navy, towards completing the two steamers as proposed in the estimates, the remainder of that appropriation, amounting to $410,000, which would become available in 1840, by the existing laws, will not, in all probability, be necessary, as the balance on hand will be sufficient to meet all expenditures under that head for the ensuing year. That portion of the appropriation may, therefore, it is believed, be postponed until 1841, without injury to the service, should it be thought expedient, provided the whole amount of transfers is eventually returned.

It will be perceived that the Board of Navy Commissioners has again submitted an estimate for additional clerks, which are daily becoming more indispensable to the prompt discharge of the public business committed to its superintendence. The multiplication of records, the labor of investigating past transactions, so often necessary to refer to, and which increases with the lapse of time, combined with the progressive expansion of the country, and growth of the navy, all call for additional labor and additional means for its performance. The plan for a reorganization of the Department, prepared in pursuance of a resolution adopted at the last session of Congress, contemplates such addition to the number of clerks, as is deemed essential to carry it into operation should it be adopted, and will render any further action on this point unnecessary.

Believing that the creation of a higher grade of rank, than is now recognized in the navy, will be advantageous to the service, for reasons which have been too often presented to require repetition, I again offer the subject to your consideration.

Respectfully submitted,

J. K. PAULDING.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

REPORT FROM THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
November 30, 1839.

SIR: The post roads of the United States covered by mail service on the 30th day of June last, were, as nearly as can be ascertained, 133,999 miles in extent. The rate of annual transportation on that day was about 34,496,878 miles, and its cost $3,285,622, viz:

	Miles.	Cost.
By horse and sulkey	11,447,147	$964,569
By stage and coach	19,653,676	1,980,453
By steamboat and railroad	3,396,055	520,602
Total,	34,496,879	$3,285,622

This is exclusive of transportation by steamboats and other vessels, under the fifth and sixth sections of the act of 1825, which costs about $16,300 more.

The lettings of the year have generally been at lower prices than for some preceding years, but not so low as the same routes were let four years ago.

Most of the service which was last year suspended has been restored; and the new routes established by the act of 7th July, 1838, with few exceptions, have been put in operation.

The speed of the ordinary mail having been so increased as to reduce the time of transit between New York and New Orleans to nine days, the express mail, which ran in seven, has been discontinued, and the southwestern branch, which yielded but a small portion of its cost, fell with the main trunk.

It is possible that the recent suspension of specie payments by the banks, in a large portion of the Union, may again check the increasing revenue of the Department so as to make retrenchments necessary; but, in any event, they will be inconsiderable.

On the 30th June last, the number of post offices was 12,789, showing an increase of 261 during the preceding year. The number established was 601, and the number discontinued was 340. The number of postmasters appointed, including new offices, was 2,838.

The number of post offices this day is 13,028.

The number of mail contractors in service during the last year, was about 1,838. Of this number, 489 have been fined, or had deductions made from their pay, for sundry delinquencies. The aggregate of fines is $57,738 64, and of deductions $22,066 04, excluding remissions, the whole amounting to $79,804 68.

A great majority of the contractors have performed the service with the most exemplary punctuality.

The revenue of the Department for the year ending the 30th June, 1838, was -	$4,235,077 97
The expenditures were - -	4,621,837 16
Excess of expenditures - -	$386,759 19

This excess was made up by surplus funds of preceding years.

The revenue of the year ending on the 30th of June last, was - - -	$4,476,638 56
The engagements and liabilities of the Department for the same year, were - - - -	4,624,117 86
Excess of engagements and liabilities - - - -	$147,479 30

The surplus still on hand has prevented embarrassment.

The cash on hand, according to the latest reports of postmasters, is $206,701 95. There is also remaining in banks $33,453 72, of which only $2,907 03 is available. More than half the available funds on hand will be required to pay balances due for the services of the last quarter.

Compared with preceding year, the revenue has increased about 5½ per cent. and the aggregate increase was $241,560 59.

From a comparative statement, embracing the returns of post offices yielding over $100 per quarter, it appears that the revenue of the quarter ending the 30th September last, exceeded that of the corresponding quarter of last year about 8¼ per cent. It is feared, however, that in consequence of the derangement produced by the suspension of payment by so many banks, this rate of advance will not be maintained through the year.

The accounts of postmasters are rendered with a promptitude which can scarcely find a parallel in the business of mankind In a list of so many thousand post offices, there are necessarily many incidents, such as sickness, deaths, resignations, absences, removals, changes in mail routes, &c. &c. which prevent the regular rendition of accounts, the new appointments alone averaging last year 722 per quarter. Most of the accounts are forwarded to the Department by the first mail after the termination of the quarter, and out of a list of 12,780 post offices, for the quarter ending 30th June last, there were but 217, the accounts of which were not received before the termination of the next quarter; and of this number about 40 had been very recently established, or had not been supplied with mails.

The moneys received by the postmasters are, in general, paid over with equal promptitude. It is believed that about 11,000 of the whole number paid over the proceeds of each quarter to contractors within two weeks after its close. Of that class of postmasters, the proportion of delinquents is remarkably small. The draft offices in general pay, when drawn upon, with equal punctuality. Two cases have occurred, within the year, indicating the necessity of further legal restraints upon postmasters intrusted with large sums of money.

When it is extensively inculcated as a principle, that the public money, instead of being retained for the public service, ought to be made use of in private operations, it is not surprising that some of the postmasters, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the Department to prevent it, should practise upon the precept. Nothing is likely to make them all duly sensible of the heinousness of the offence but an act of Congress, declaring it to be a crime, punishable according to the magnitude of the sum thus applied.

Congress have heretofore fixed the maximum of compensation to be paid for the transportation of the mails upon railroads at $300 per mile. It was obviously their intention, that, where the maximum of compensation is given, the railroad companies shall afford the public, in return, the best practicable mail accommodation.

Under existing arrangements, the great mail for the South and West is detained six to eight hours in Philadelphia. Desirous, in the renewal of the contracts to take effect in January next, to put an end to this detention, the department offered the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad company, the maximum of compensation allowed by law, on condition that they would carry two mails a day, one connecting with the night line from New York, and the other with the morning line. It is the night line which brings on the great mail, and to carry it forward without interruption, it would be necessary for this company to leave Philadelphia not later than one o'clock, a. m. This the company declined doing for the compensation offered, and were willing for the $300 per mile, only to continue the present service, running one daily mail, and that at hours most convenient for their other business. Deeming it essential to the interest of the public that a connected mail line should be had on this great thoroughfare, I have not felt myself at liberty to accept any service which would longer admit of the present injurious delay at Philadelphia. Minor considerations it was proposed to waive; but without effect. The consequence is, that the Department may be deprived of the use of that road for the next contract term.

Railroads cheapen travel and the transportation of produce and merchandise, and no reason is perceived why they should not also cheapen the transportation of the mails under the same circumstances. When the mails are carried in stages or on horseback, the Department exercises an absolute control over the hours. But the proposition of the company in question more than doubles the ordinary cost of such service, and denies to the Department the control of the hours. If even the sum demanded were not the highest the Department can lawfully pay for any railroad service, it would for these reasons be deemed much too high for the service propored.

Nor is the sum of $300 per mile deemed too small a compensation for the service required. The travel would still go with the mails as it does now, and many passengers who do not travel at all, or take the Pennsylvania lines to the West, would leave New York in the evening, if this company would convey them to Baltimore by the next morning, there to take the established lines to the South and West. The Department, therefore, asks them to do only what it is believed to be their interest to do.

Experience has proved that travel is increased in proportion to the reduction of its cost. This has been illustrated on steamboat routes. But railroads have an advantage over steamboats, because they can reduce the cost of travel without reducing their own charges. By running in connection with each other, and enabling travellers to proceed on their way by night as well as by day, they save tavern bills to the traveller, and greatly reduce his expenses. A great increase of travel is the certain consequence. In this close connection, therefore, consists their highest interest. All railroads in connection with each other, will ultimately find their profit in considering themselves parts of one system, in submitting to the inconveniences of their respective positions, and in so arranging their hours of running as to make connected travelling lines, and not impose on travellers the necessity of stopping at intermediate points in their journey. And it is this close connection, most favorable to railroads in reference to travel, which the Department requires for the transmission of the mails. Ought the companies to ask, or the Department to pay, exorbitant sums for that which it is their own interest to render?

Certain it is, that if the demands of railroad companies are to be satisfied, most of whom are not willing to serve the public as they serve individuals, and seem to think that the Government is bound to make their investments profitable, there will be little left of the means of this Department to pay for the conveyance of the mails on other lines, much of the interior of the country must be deprived of them altogether, and the rates of postage, instead of being reduced, must be increased.

Hopes are entertained, however, that the company in question will yet accept the provision which Congress has made. It appears to be so obviously their interest to avail themselves of the additional travel which a well connected line would bring them, and to prevent the withdrawal of a large portion of the western travel which would inevitable follow the organization of a line for the conveyance of the great western mail upon the Pennsylvania roads, that perseverance in their refusal cannot reasonably be expected. In the mean time, the Department is proceeding to make the best arrangements it can, for the mail service, without reference to the use of that road, and with the determination in no event to make any contract with the company which shall not secure a close connection with the mail from New York. If circumstances should hereafter require it, this matter will be made the subject of a special report.

A difficulty somewhat similar has arisen upon the steamboat route between New York and New Haven. Formerly, the mail was carried six times a week on that route, for $4,000 per annum. At the last regular letting in that section, it was let for daily service at $6,000, with a proviso that if the company should be dissolved, the contract should be at an end. Last spring they gave notice of dissolution to the Department. Their successors refused to continue the service for less than $30,000 per annum. The Department offered $6,000 for six times a week service, and $8,000 for daily; but the new company would only reduce their exorbitant demand to $15,000, with the privilege of selecting their own hours for the service. The Department then withdrew its propositions, and made an arrangement for the transportation of its mails by land.

Subsequently, a temporary arrangement was made with a gentleman of great energy to charter boats and put on another line for the purpose of conveying the mails. After making several efforts, he reported to the Department, that although boats could be procured for any other service, so great was the fear of the principal owner upon the New Haven line, or so extensive a combination existed, that no suitable boat could be chartered on any terms, to run on that line in opposition.

The Department is consequently powerless, under existing laws, to give the country the best practicable mail service in that direction, without submitting to palpable extortion. Rather than submit to the latter alternative, I have deemed it my duty to continue the mail upon the land route, and refer to Congress for a remedy.

In these days of combination and monopoly, that which exists on one steamboat route may be expected on others of more importance, unless prevented by timely precautions. An effective remedy in this case, and a preventive in all others of a similar character, may be found in putting it within the power of the Department to run steamboats temporarily in such emergencies, to be discontinued as soon as reasonable contracts can be secured. The case in question shows that the Department cannot rely upon chartering suitable boats. The only effective means appears to be, to authorise the Postmaster General to purchase, or build, two or three boats suited to the service, or direct the War or Navy Department to add a few such boats to their present force, with a view to aid the Post Office Department when occasion may require it. The existence of the power and ability of the Department to put on a line of steamboats in cases of attempted extortion, would undoubtedly avert the necessity of its exercise.

Great difficulty is found in bringing to justice mail robbers in some cases, on account of the inadequacy of the present laws to secure the attendance of distant witnesses. The compensation allowed to them is not sufficient to pay their expenses, without reference to the value of their time. Cases of extreme hardship have been presented to the Department, and allowances asked for out of its funds, but in cases where the process of the court could reach them, it has been decided that the Department could not lawfully add to the allowance provided by act of Congress. It seems but just, that men who are required to devote their time to the public, should be paid not only their actual expenses, but a fair compensation.

The radical change in the rates of postage on letters, recently adopted in Great Britain, has attracted much attention in the United States. To enable me to furnish Congress with information on that subject, and all others connected with the post establishments in several of the most considerable European countries, I have despatched one of the special agents of this Department to Europe with instructions to visit them in person, and furnish me with minute details of their organization and operations. Many documents, and some interesting particulars, have been received from him, but he has not as yet been able to prepare himself to make a detailed report. As soon as such a report shall be received, it is intended to submit to Congress all the information it may contain, for their consideration.

With the highest respect,

AMOS KENDALL.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SPEECH OF MR. RANDOLPH, OF NEW JERSEY.

In the House of Representatives, December 6, 1839—On the attempt to organize the House of Representatives, by excluding five of the New Jersey claimants.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that it was not his intention, originally, to have participated in this discussion. He knew that the case from New Jersey presented a fair subject for a contested election, and he had supposed that it would have been permitted to take the ordinary course of such matters, when, upon full investigation, he could, with more satisfaction to himself, and perhaps more dispassionately, have endeavored to perform his high and responsible duties, as well to his colleagues and to the gentlemen claiming their seats, as to his constituents and to the country. But we have, from the extraordinary state of affairs here, been hurried into a premature debate, in which an effort has been made to place the constituted authorities of New Jersey in a most unjust and unenviable attitude before the nation, and I therefore claim, as a duty which I owe as well to myself as to the people of New Jersey, whose sole acknowledged Representative it seems I am, to be heard now before the assembled Representatives of the nation. Various propositions, sir, have been made during this discursive debate, which now lie on your table, and which, according to your decision of incapacity to put questions, they must continue to lie. The commissions of my colleagues having been read, it was proposed to read the law of New Jersey and the certificates of the gentlemen contesting their seats. I am in favor of both, and will endeavor to dispose of those propositions before I sit down. It is also proposed that you, sir, [the Clerk] be permitted to make a statement of your reasons for not calling the members from New Jersey. Of this, too, I am in favor, if you simply desire to make your statement and give your reasons; but if, as I understand, your friends ask that you, under a permission to make your statement, are to read to us a long and labored document, prepared in anticipation of the present state of affairs, not by you, but for you, by a certain committee sitting in this city, after weeks of investigation, I am opposed to it. Your friends may find some other mode of communicating it to the public than by placing it on the journal of the House.

But, sir, there is another question before us of great, of vital importance, which is not, as some honorable members seem to suppose, whether my colleagues shall ultimately, after all the evidence has been heard, be entitled to their seats, but whether now, at the first call of the members, they shall be recognised as members, presenting, as they do, commissions from the Executive of the State, made out pursuant to its law. This, sir, is a grave question, and for the first time raised in this country, or, as I believe, in any other. Sir, the Constitution has reserved to the States the power of prescribing "the times, places, and manner of holding elections," and has directed that the "House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members." The election laws of New Jersey have given the mode of holding elections and making returns, which is by commission from the Governor, under the great seal of the State. If my colleagues have presented such a commission, then are they entitled in the first instance to their seats on this floor, and the investigation of the contest cannot be had until after the House is organized. The Constitution gives that power to the House, not to the unorganized members who are to constitute the House. When Representatives assemble for the purpose of organizing a House, they must, from necessity, adopt some rule by which they are to recognise each other in order to organize themselves, else they must continue disorganized. That rule hitherto has been to recognise the individuals holding the regular return, made out under the State laws, and in no instance to go behind that return, until after the House is organized and it proceeds to try the matter of contest; any other rule must lead to inextricable confusion, fraud, and revolution. It was formerly the doctrine that even the House, after organization, could not go behind the State returns, on the ground that it would be impairing a State law, made under the Constitution. Under this rule the New Jersey case, in the first Congress, was decided. In that case the Governor's commission was based on the returns received from twelve counties, leaving out the county of Essex, which came in too late to be counted; a petition was presented after the House was organized, setting forth the facts, and it was solemnly decided that the State law and the regular return under it was sacred, and the House could not and did not go behind it; and this was the settled law of the House of Representatives until the case of Spaulding vs. Mead, which arose in the 9th Congress, in 1805. Mead had the regular commission from the Governor of Georgia, under the laws of that State, which are almost identical with those of New Jersey; Spaulding petitioned the House after it was organized, setting forth that the votes of three counties had not been taken into the account by the Governor in consequence of their being detained after the time by a hurricane; the facts were admitted, and Mead and his friends put the case solely on the sanctity of the State law, and the return under it; but it was decided that the House, in trying the matter of contest, might go behind a regular return, and that has ever since been the rule. But there is not a solitary case to be found in the records of Government, or, as I believe and am informed, of the State Legislatures, or the British House of Commons, where the individual holding the regular commission or return has not been permitted to take his seat in the first instance, no matter what was the ground of contest to be tried after the House was organized; and the person contesting the seat has always been compelled to petition the House after it was organized, instead of walking in and taking his seat at once. Twice only has this question been mooted in this House. The first time, in the case of Letcher vs. Moore: the former had a majority of votes, evinced by the poll books, presented, and a certificate from two of the five sheriffs; the latter had a certificate from three of the five sheriffs, alleging that he had a majority in four of the five counties in the district, and the proclamation of the Governor; neither party had the legal return, but the Clerk, conceiving that Moore had the better return of the two, placed his name on the roll; this the friends of Letcher resisted, in the first call of the House, and they all took the ground that, although Letcher had a majority of votes, yet, if Moore had a return made out according to the laws of Kentucky, he must, in the first instance, take his seat. On the other side, it was contended that Moore should take his seat on the return, such as it was; and in the arguments of distinguished gentlemen on that side, authority may be found for almost every section in the Union. For the benefit of the honorable members from Indiana, I will read from the speech of Mr. Lane, of that State, who "contended that the question before the House was not who had or who had not received a majority of the votes given, but who had produced the best prima facie evidence of his right to a seat." Mr. Beardsley, of the empire State, "maintained that the question was to be settled solely on the face of the certificate." Governor Polk, of Tennessee, argued in favor of Moore's taking his seat, and cited various precedents. And for the benefit of the honorable members from New Hampshire, I will read from Mr. Hubbard, who contended "that the only authority by which the House should be guided must be the return itself." He considered Moore's sufficient. In consequence of an agreement of the parties, the House made no decision. The next was the case of Claiborne and Gholson, in the last Congress. Their election was unconstitutional and void, yet, having the regular return, I voted with a large majority of the House for their taking their seats in the first instance. In New Jersey, there have been numerous cases of contested elections, but in none of them did the party contesting come into the House until a decision had been made in his favor. The idea of a person contesting a seat going into either House of the Legislature and taking possession of his seat at once, was never dreamed of there, and would never have been endured. In the case of Cox vs. Reynolds, in 1814, Stafford township made her returns for James, instead of for Thomas Cox, and it being thrown out, of course, by the clerk under the statute, Reynolds got the certificate, took his seat, and was qualified. Afterwards, Cox petitioned the organized House, and was subsequently admitted to his seat, and Reynolds ejected therefrom. In 1815, Board and Lydecker petitioned the Assembly after it was organized for the seats occupied by Colefax and Van Houten, who had the certificate, on the ground that the returns of Franklin having come in after 3 o'clock, p. m. were not counted by the clerk. They were admitted, I believe, unanimously. Franklin, it will be observed, was rejected for the same grounds, in part, that Millville was, and Board and Lydecker had as much right to take their seats at once as the contesting gentlemen have in this case. In 1817, Reid and Pierson got the returns to the Legislature, in consequence of the certificate of a special election of an inspector in Hanover township not having been filed within three days, according to the statute—the same reason, in part, why South Amboy was rejected. Nugent and Stockton had a majority of the votes, and petitioned and got their seats. It will be observed that the last two cases turn on grounds similar to Millville and South Amboy, only that in the former cases there were no frauds or illegal voters, as in the two latter. In the Cumberland contest, decided by the Legislature last year, arising out of the rejection of Millville at the same election now under consideration, counting Millville, the gentlemen on the Administration ticket had a majority, but, it being rejected for fraud and irregularity, their opponents received the return; the other gentlemen petitioned for seats, two of whom, on purging the polls, obtained them. They were aided on that occasion by the ablest counsel that their political friends could obtain. An honorable Senator in the other end of the Capitol labored incessantly for them. He knew all their rights, and, knowing, dared and did defend them, and yet they never attempted to take their seats until the contest was decided in their favor. One other case from New York, and I have done.

About the year 1814, a case similar to that of the New Jersey members occurred in that State. A dispute arose between two persons, each claiming to represent the county of Ontario in the Assembly. It may be recollected that under the Constitution of that State, as it then existed, all the officers of the Government were chosen by a council of appointment, selected by the Assembly from the Senate. Under this regulation, the party having a majority in the Assembly had, of course, the power of filling all the State offices with their own partisans. Among the candidates for Assembly, in Ontario, at the period referred to, were Henry Fellows, Federalist, and Peter Allen, Democrat.

By the law as it then stood, the inspectors of election were to make return to the town clerk of the number of votes cast for each candidate; and that officer was to make return to the county clerk, whose duty it was to add up the votes returned from the several towns, and give a certificate of election to the candidate or candidates having the greatest number. In fact, Henry Fellows, (Federal,) was elected by a heavy vote over Peter Allen, (Democrat;) but the clerk of one of the towns where Fellows had a large majority, in making his return to the county officer, abbreviated the christian name of the Federal candidate, and returned so many votes for Hen. Fellows. The clerk of the county, under the advice of Mr. Van Buren, then Attorney General of the State, refused to count the votes thus returned, and, rejecting the votes from that entire town, declared a majority for Peter Allen, to whom he presented a certificate of election. The vote of Allen gave the Republican party the preponderance of one in the Assembly, and of course prevented the Federalists having the same majority. Allen and Fellows both appeared, and, at the organization of the House, claimed the seat. Mr. Van Buren, the Attorney General, had the management in the affair on behalf of the Republicans, and the late Elisha Williams acted for the Federal party. Mr. Van Buren claimed that, as Allen was the certified member, he was entitled to his seat in the first instance, and that Fellows, even if the rightful claimant, could only obtain it by a vote of the Assembly after it should be duly organized. This, the correct constitutional doctrine, prevailed. Mr. Allen took his seat—assisted in choosing a council of appointment, by which Mr. Van Buren retained the office of Attorney General, and then was ousted, Mr. Fellows's right being conceded by the unanimous resolution of the House. Here, then, is a weight of authority which cannot be overcome.

The next question then, sir, arising in this case is, have my colleagues the regular commission or return? The statute of New Jersey requires that the Governor shall "commission, under the great seal of the State, to represent this State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States," "six persons." He has done so—here are the commissions given to my five colleagues and to myself. It will not be proper, sir, at this time, to go behind them to investigate any questions that may have arisen before the Governor and Council; when that time shall arrive, I shall be prepared to sustain the Governor and Council in all their positions. The commission then, sir, is given pursuant to law by the Executive of the State, under its great seal, the only means by which the people of a sovereign State can communicate with another State or with the nation. This seal, sir, is dear to Jerseymen, as well from its Revolutionary reminiscences as from its being the medium through which the people send forth their authority or speak their will. Twenty-six times has it been affixed to the commissions of Representatives to this House, and never before has its validity been questioned; never before have the sons of New Jersey, and, least of all, those who had been honored with the keeping of that great seal, been placed in a situation to deny its authenticity. Sir, these commissions are made out in due form. I hold in my hand an authority which cannot and will not be denied by the gentlemen claiming seats—it is my commission, sir, as a Representative to the Twenty-fifth Congress—literally a transcript of the present commission of my colleagues: it has affixed to it the same seal and the same Secretary's name; but the signature of the Governor is "Ph. Dickerson," one of the gentlemen claiming seats on this floor; and this, sir, has been the uniform practice of the State for more than half a century. But, sir, the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. CRAIG] intimates that there is some fraud here that he wishes to get at. Sir, if that honorable gentleman's information is derived from the source I fear it is, I wonder not that he suspects fraud. The great Upas of the Government has spread its poisonous vapor throughout the nation. For more than a year it has been mystifying and misrepresenting this case. Not satisfied, sir, with misrepresenting my State and constituents through the ordinary channels of political communication, the cloak of literature also has been sought to cover its deformity. I allude to an article published in a certain Review, and circulated in pamphlet form through this Hall. Sir, I know that pamphlet well; it was but lately circulated throughout New Jersey; but the people of that State have passed their judgment on it merits. I know not, sir, the author. I hope and trust he is no Jerseyman, for a baser attempt to misrepresent a case was never conceived. The law is misquoted, the facts are misstated, and the entire production is a gross perversion of the whole matter. I have much charity, sir, for honorable gentlemen who derive their information from such sources. But, sir, the honorable member from Virginia is correct; there has been fraud, base fraud—not, though, where he suspects, but at the ballot-box. There, sir, where the most evil could be done with the least liability of detection, was the attempt made to sap the foundation of free government. The ballot-box, sir, the palladium of liberty!—preserve that pure, and we are safe. The overgrown power and corruption of the Government can only be tried and humbled there. Corrupt the ballot-box, and all is lost; and if ever, sir, our political Eden is subverted, there, sir, there the destroyer will enter. The honorable gentleman and myself agree, then, to discountenance the fraud; but he would jump at it at once upon mere suspicion, where it does not exist. I would wait till we get proof where it does; he, sir, would investigate it now, when we have no evidence—when we are powerless, and can get none. I would wait till we are organized, when we can send the Sergeant-at-Arms for witnesses to prove the fraud. But another honorable member [Mr. VANDERPOEL of New York] says my colleagues are claiming their seats by a mere technicality. Sir, did not that honorable gentleman hear my friend and collegue [Mr. MAXWELL] say yesterday on this floor that he would scorn to hold his seat by a technicality, or by any other means than a majority of the legal votes? I appeal to all who know my colleagues here if they can conceive them capable of such conduct. Sir, high and honorable as is a seat on this floor, rather than to hold it by a technicality or a majority composed of illegal votes, I would suffer my right arm to perish from its socket. Sir, is the holding the regular commission from the Executive of the State, made pursuant to its law, backed by the conscious belief, sustained by evidence, that they have a majority of the legal votes polled—is this claiming by a technicality? Is the voice of a sovereign State, speaking through its constitutional organ, the "small squeaking voice of technicality?"

But sovereignty, says another honorable member, [Mr. PICKENS of South Carolina,] is in the people, not in the Governor and Council. Sir, I agree with that honorable member, that sovereignty is in the people; but how, let me ask him, with due respect, is that people to manifest the acts of their sovereignty? Are they to proclaim it like the Democracy of Athens, or through its Executive? Sir, I should like to know whom that distinguished member considers the people of a sovereign State? Is it her citizens only, or does he include aliens also, and every inhabitant, without distinction? An effort was made some years since by an emissary of a foreign prince to draw the distinction between the people of this country and the Government of the people; but his distinction met with little encouragement then.

[Here Mr. PICKENS rose to explain, and was understood to say he meant to draw no such distinction, or to give any opinion on the case from New Jersey; but simply to insist that the House had a right to go behind the Governor's commission, and investigate the allegations of the parties.]

I understood the honorable member to go further; but if by the House he meant the organized House of Representatives, then the gentleman and myself agree. Much has been said by that honorable member about technicalities and forms; I think, sir, that I have as much contempt for mere forms and technicalities as any member on this floor, but, sir, it is only through the forms of the Constitution and the law that liberty itself can be preserved; if necessity can be urged to abolish one form, "to-morrow, and to-morrow the fatal precedent will plead," until the Constitution itself is frittered away, and we are at sea, without chart or compass. Sir, it is this very observance of forms—the sanction of the law—that is our watch by day or guardian by night; it converts the peasant's hut, though wretched and shattered it be, into a castle that the strong arm of the Government cannot enter; in solitude, it is our security; our panoply abroad; and in every situation and relation of life, our protection and reliance. And what is it, sir, that guides us here? Not the few officers of the House, but the sanction of the law and its forms, that surrounds us, like an invisible wall, and protects us in the discharge of our high and responsible duties. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina told us about the "thunders of Heaven from an indignant people." Sir, I have heard in New Jersey much about the indignation and the thunder of the people, but as yet, sir, it has been but mere brutum fulmen; and here stand my colleagues, "unawed, unsubdued, unterrified;" and there sit the Governor and Council, unscathed by the lightning, and unmoved by the spirit that rode upon and directed the storm.
